What We Stand For.

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

Current Events

That the outcome of the recent German elections is a substantial victory for Socialism—or, more exactly, for the Social Democrats—is universally admitted. That party, which represents the anti-monarchical tendencies within the empire, has made a gain of at least twenty-five members in the Reichstag, and the re-balloting in the close districts where this was necessary is showing even larger Socialistic gains. Together the Social-Democrats and the Liberals will have a delegation of one hundred or more and will constitute an opposition wing large enough to command respect and to give Chancellor Von Buelow no little trouble if it feels disposed. And it is just the sort of legislative group that does feel disposed to make trouble. It is significant that the success of the Socialists at this election was won on a platform of very moderate principles. Abandoning the extreme positions which we know under the name of Socialism, they stood for such mild reforms as these: "One vote for every man and woman; a holiday on election day; payment of members of Parliament. Responsibility of the government to Parliament; local self-government and the referendum. Substitution of militia system for great standing army. Freedom of speech and the press. Legal equality of the sexes. Disestablishment of the churches. Free non-sectarian schools, with compulsory attendance. Gratuitous legal proceedings. Free medical attendance and burials. Progressive income and inheritance taxes."

When Peter I, the new king of Serbia, entered Belgrade, it was in the midst of a friendly demonstration (perhaps spontaneous, perhaps carefully worked up; nobody knows) but the diplomatic representatives of the powers were conspicuously lacking. Only the ministers from Russia and Austria, the two rivals for influence in Servian affairs, graced the occasion with their official regalia. The others had pressing business elsewhere. There has been no very general agreement among the powers yet as to their attitude toward the new king. They are waiting to see what will happen. If Peter settles down to the business of kingship and lives a decent life—which will be in striking contrast to his last two predecessors—they will gradually recognize the new regime and forget the bloody episode with which it was inaugurated. The journalistic casuists have been busily discussing our government's duty in the premises. Our government "should take the lead in disclaiming acquiescence in the Belgrade enormity," says one paper; it "should refuse to recognize the blood-stained crown," says another. But alas, what crown is not blood-stained? What dynasty did not originate in crime? What monarchy can say that its annals are free from the record of political murder? The Servian slaughter was a wretched, dastardly crime as every murder is. In its details, it was worse than most murders. In its motive, which was to rid the country of a king and queen who misgoverned and disgraced it, it was not nearly so bad as many murders. It is for public opinion and the moral sentiment of the people, rather than the government, to condemn the crime. The government is called upon neither to approve nor to disapprove, but only to recognize the present de facto king. This does not involve moral approbation. If it did, there would have been as good reason for recalling our minister from the court of Alexander as for refusing to recognize his successor.

In response to the urgent request of many prominent Jews in this country

backed by a considerable body of public sentiment among the non-Jews, President Roosevelt has agreed to transmit through the State Department the protest against the Kishineff massacres which has been prepared and signed by many representative American Jews. This is certainly the humane thing to do; whether or not it is the diplomatically correct thing, is another question. It is very likely true, as has been stated, that the Kishineff affair is purely a matter of internal administration in which our government has no more right to interfere than the Russian government would have to protest against our lynchings. We may have our own private opinions about the connivance of the Russian government at the atrocities perpetrated upon the Jews, but our government is certainly not prepared to charge the Russian government with complicity in actual crimes. A formal diplomatic protest originating with the President or State Department would amount to such a charge and would lead inevitably to a rupture of friendly relations with Russia. But in agreeing to forward this unofficial protest, our government only expresses in a general way its sympathy with the sufferers and its reprobation of the crime against humanity, without committing itself to any theory as to the responsibility for the episode. On the whole, the President's action seems proper and justifiable. Its consequences are not apt to be very considerable, one way or another. The petitions will probably be returned unopened—which is a way Russia has of dealing with popular protests and petitions—and there the matter will drop.

Only one character looms up large as a certain factor in the presidential campaign of 1904, and that is President Roosevelt. His nomination is already guaranteed and a very large majority of both parties consider his election as certain as any political event in the future can be. It is stated that Mr. Roosevelt has asked Senator Hanna to manage the campaign and he will probably do so. But who is to be Mr. Roosevelt's running mate, and who are to be his opponents, are the vaguest kind of political uncertainties. Nearly every Republican politician of more than local fame has been informally nominated for the vice-presidency by his friends—or his enemies. The trouble is that nearly all of the men who are active enough and able enough to go through the campaign, are also young enough and ambitious enough to have aspirations for the presidency four or eight years hence. Men of this sort—like Senator Beveridge, of Indiana, for example—do not care to go into the honorable oblivion of the vice-presidency, or to sell their presidential birth-right for a mess of vice-presidential pottage, for it is realized that a term of service as vice-president takes a man out of the public mind almost as completely as a foreign consulate. As to the Democratic candidates, the subject is inscrutable and very full of mystery. In commenting on Mr. Cleveland's alleged statement that he does not want the nomination, Mr. Bryan in the Commoner says that for once Mr. Cleveland is in harmony with the party on one point.

In various cities, notably in St. Louis, there have been discovered recently astonishing cases of bribery and fraud in the securing of franchises. Some of the guilty parties have been sentenced to the penitentiary and, unless the courts of appeal stumble over the technicalities, the chances are that some of the rogues, both bribers and bribees, will see the inside of prison walls. But the corporations which got the franchises by corruption still enjoy them, while their agents and tools pay the penalty of their dishonesty. The thief is caught, but the stolen property is not returned. Perhaps this is good law, but it is not good sense or good morals. We doubt whether it is even good law. The New York Supreme Court once decided in a case where a franchise had been secured by the grossest sort of corruption, that the validity of a franchise was not affected by the manner in which it had been obtained. But there is more sense in the old common law principle that the rightful owner of stolen property is entitled to recover it even if it is found in the hands of an innocent party who has bought it from the thief in good faith. A franchise secured by bribery is stolen property. When the rascals are caught and convicted, the public's sense of justice is satisfied, but the public's stolen property is not restored unless the franchise so obtained can be declared invalid. Such a provision would be a powerful deterrent to those who propose to make stolen privileges the foundation of their fortunes.

It is generally admitted that a man is justified in taking a life to save his own life if he is murderously attacked. The question now is whether a public official is justified in practicing bribery to save his salary when a legislative attack is made upon it. Sam B. Cook, Secretary of State for Missouri, thinks bribery is justifiable under such circumstances. A bill was introduced in the Missouri Legislature four years ago to reduce the fees of the coal-oil inspector in St. Louis, which amounted at that time to over $10,000 a year. Mr. Speed, as he has recently confessed, paid an influential state senator $800 to defeat this bill. The transaction took place in the presence of Sam B. Cook, who is now Secretary of State for Missouri. Mr. Cook's estimate of this procedure is that Speed did "what many honest men have done—permitted himself to be held up by a legislative sand-bagger." The epithet applied to those who introduce bills for the sake of being bought off is highly appropriate. "Legislative sand-bagger" is a just and accurate title. But we think Mr. Cook errs very grievously when he describes as "honest men" those who allow themselves to be held up in this manner and practice bribery to save themselves from loss. They may be respectable men, church-going men, prominent and influential business men, but honest men—no; not honest men according to any definition of honesty that is worthy of the name. Especially absurd is it to define Mr. Speed's procedure as a virtuous resistance to a nefarious assault, when it is remembered that the fees of his office which were in danger of being reduced were considerably too large and needed to be reduced. Unfortunately this view of honesty is not uncommon among Missouri politicians of both parties.

An accurate record of all lynchings reported in the United States since 1885 has been kept by the Chicago Tribune. During these eighteen years there have been lynchings in every state and territory in the Union except Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island and Utah. Delaware was on the list until last week. The total number of lynchings during this period was 2,516, or almost three every week for the eighteen years. Of the total number 2,080 occurred in the south; 1,687 of the victims were negroes, 801 whites, 21 Indians, 9 Chinese and 7 Mexicans. The death penalty has been administered at the hands of mobs for 114 different offenses. The figures year by year show wide fluctuation between 90 in the year 1881 and 235 in 1892. In general, taking the whole country together, there are more lynchings than legal executions.

Already the Fourth of July is in the air. Perhaps it is too late to offer any effective suggestions as to the manner and spirit in which the day should be celebrated, but one may at least express his sentiments on the subject. When the Fourth falls on Saturday, as it does this year, we enter about Monday upon that penumbral margin of noise and excitement which portends the coming of the great day, and not until the following Saturday will we quite emerge from the shadow into the clear light of reason and sanity. This is unfortunate. The day contains such possibilities for the genuine culture of patriotism and even of religion, that one cannot but regret that it has been and is being so baselessly abused. What should be a halo of glory about it has become an aura of foolish disorderliness. There is no more patriotism about the average Fourth of July celebration than there is about a snow-fight or a football game. We are not pessimistic and we do not think that patriotism is on the decline, but the generality of people have less patriotism on the Fourth of July than on any other day in the year. They are so busy dodging fire-crackers and keeping out of the way of "nigger-chasers" and calming their nerves after the shock of an unexpected torpedo explosion at their feet, that they have no time to think about their country or to be grateful for its independence. There are beginning to be signs, however, of a public sentiment in favor of a quiet Fourth. The sentiment is not likely to bear much fruit this year, but it has our hearty approbation for the future. Surely by this time our nation has reached a point where it can be joyful without being barbaric and can express its appreciation of our laws and institutions without over-riding the same in a carnival of reckless and lawless disregard of public comfort and public safety. For those of us who live in cities and cannot get away even for that day, the problem is becoming a serious one. Welcome the quiet Fourth! Let us have peace!

The Philippine opium concession bill has not yet been finally acted upon. It has passed its second reading before the Philippine commission, but will not be definitely enacted until advices are received from Washington. The administration is receiving many protests against the plan of authorizing an opium monopoly and selling the privilege at auction.

At the dedication of a $100,000 Salvation Army barracks in Cleveland, O., Senator Hanna made an address and said if he had time to preach he would do it in the Salvation Army.

The German federation of Catholic societies is fighting the plan to furnish free text books in the public schools, and have won the first round of their fight in Chicago by securing a decision of the court that the board of education has no right to use school money for this purpose unless authorized by special legislation. That the Catholic societies are opposed to free text books need occasion no surprise. Nearly everyone now admits that free text books increase the effectiveness of the public schools. Of course they are against it.

Sir Thomas Lipton is again in American waters with a new challenger, Shamrock III, with which he will make another attempt to capture the cup in the international yacht race. The experts say that the new boat has, in her trial runs, shown much better speed than Shamrock I and II. Sir Thomas is a most persistent sportsman. Considering that it costs in round numbers about $1,000,000 to build a yacht of this class and to meet all the heavy expenses which the race involves, it will be agreed that his three attempts amply prove his devotion. He has paid the bill for a great deal of pleasurable excitement enjoyed by an immense number of people during the yachting season.

Freedom, Education and Religion.

These are the great words which have made our nation great and given it the high place which it occupies to-day among the civilized powers of earth. We are inclined to forget this in dwelling upon the greatness of our national domain and resources, and the Fourth of July is a good time to remind the people of the real source of our greatness. When Queen Victoria was asked the source of England's greatness by one of her subject princes in India, she handed him a copy of the Bible. The good Queen was right. That Book contains the secret of all true national glory and power—the germs of civil, religious and intellectual liberty.

It seems altogether fitting that this, our Fourth of July Number, should be also an educational number. The patriotism which contented itself in former years with recounting the struggles which our forefathers had with England and with boasting of our superiority as a nation and our ability to defeat any foreign power, while natural enough to the period of our national youth, is not adequate to the demands of our time. The newer patriotism must take heed of other perils than that of a foreign foe, even those which have assaulted and have overthrown many of the great powers of the world. We are not in danger to-day from the encroachments of any foreign power, but there are evils at work among ourselves that must be controlled or eradicated if we are to perpetuate our national life and maintain the supremacy which we have gained among the nations of the world. Greed for wealth; the spirit of speculation growing out of this haste to be rich; the unscrupulous methods which are resorted to to increase profits; the lust for political power, for selfish ends; the corruption which prevails in public life; the low standard of morals which is set up in municipal government and in many of our state governments and which finds exemplification in many branches of the public service; the lack of public spirit and the willingness to subordinate the public good to private ends; the ravages of the liquor traffic,—these are the perils which confront us to-day and to which the newer patriotism must address itself.

Our colleges and universities, together with the common schools and academies which prepare the young for the higher courses, are really the bulwarks of the nation—its truest and highest defenses. Not one of the colleges presenting their claims to the public in this number stands for mere intellectual training. Every one of them understands that the development of the moral and religious nature is essential to freedom in its largest meaning and constitutes the most important part of education. The same may be said of all the colleges established and supported by the churches.

It is more or less true of all other institutions of learning. The men who are at the head of our state universities do not regard education as complete without the culture of the heart and the building up of character, and they are doing what they can to bring their students under the influence of religious teaching. It is in this view of the case that the public must realize its obligation to our colleges and give them that generous support which will enable them to accomplish the high tasks which are set before them.

On the other hand, colleges and other institutions of learning must lay more and more emphasis upon that sort of training which will fit their students to meet and overcome these national perils to which we have referred. The college that does not inculcate true patriotism—the patriotism which is willing to sacrifice personal gain and personal ease for the good of our common country, and that does not ground its students in those principles of morality and religion which will enable them to resist the temptations and perform faithfully the duties of public and private life, will not commend itself to the sympathy and support of the people. If our institutions of learning are not to lift up higher ideals of citizenship and of public life, and furnish from among its graduates those who will embody these ideals, where shall we look for the needed help? Never was there a time when greater responsibility rests upon our higher institutions of learning than to-day. To them we are compelled to look for the leaders in the conflict which we must make with those evils to which we have referred. There is, of course, a corresponding responsibility resting upon the people and especially upon the churches to so endow and equip our colleges as to enable them to accomplish this work.

The Wesley Bicentennial Celebration.

Last Sunday, June 28, was the two hundredth anniversary of John Wesley's birth. A celebration of that event was held at the Odeon in this city in the afternoon at three o'clock. The large hall was packed, and on the platform sat the representatives of the various Protestant bodies in the city. The addresses were delivered by Rev. N. Luccock, D.D., of this city, and Rev. F. W. Gunsaulus, D. D., of Chicago. Both of the addresses were able, while that of the principal speaker, Dr. Gunsaulus, was masterly. The chairman, Mr. Crawford, in some introductory remarks said that Mr. Wesley made $150,000 during his life by the sale of his works, and dying "left two teaspoons, a silver teapot, a well-worn preacher's cloak, a much-abused reputation—and the Methodist Church." The balance he gave away while he lived. Dr. Luccock said of Mr. Wesley that from his father he "inherited that strenuous moral fiber that enabled him to hold the sky-line of his convictions, and to bring his craft instantly into line with any polar truths that became fixed in his moral horizon." He said "Wesley's message to the age was the witness of the Spirit to the fact of personal salvation." Speaking of Mr. Wesley's leadership he said:

"It is essential to any leader of a mighty movement that he be capable of great emancipations. Most men are not. They anchor early and stay anchored. The throbbing sea of life and thought may rock them, but it never moves them on and out. Now, nothing in John Wesley's character is more interesting than this capacity for emancipation, growth and new adjustment."

Referring to Loyola and John Wesley as representatives of Roman Catholicism and Protestantism, Dr. Luccock said that "without doubt in the religious world the supreme rallying cries of the future will be two—that of the Roman camp 'Around the Ancient Church' and that of the Protestant camp 'Around the Living Christ.'" We are sure Dr. Luccock is correct in this statement, and Protestantism is fast coming to the point when everything except the living Christ and utter submission to Him, will be cast overboard so far as conditions of fellowship are concerned.

Dr. Gunsaulus said that if Mr. Wesley had been a man of such striking genius or of such unusual gifts as to lift him above his fellowmen, we would not have been here celebrating his two hundredth birthday. It was the fact that being a man of no extraordinary genius in any particular direction yet, under God accomplishing such stupendous results, that made his life significant and his birth worthy of celebration. It was the fact that God was with Wesley, working in him and using him, that gave this occasion its significance. No condensed account can do justice to this able address. The following extract, however, may serve as a sample of some of his glowing sentences:

"He made orthodoxy vital and liberal. The Holy Spirit is the guarantor of sound doctrine. Christ never expected the faith to have safety or power except as the Spirit should take things of his and show them unto his disciples.

"The worst heresy is unbeyed and unused truth. Wesley was a true liberal, for his mind, filled with the infinite Spirit, had as much range upward and downward as it had to the right or the left.

"Slowly but surely, philosophies and theologies have learned that the pure in heart see God. They come to this man of flame and utter their wisdom to find it a commonplace of his mind and method. His idea of God was not the discovery of genius, but the revelation of life to life. Its hold upon scholarly men is not dependent upon learning from books, but the simple obedience and love which cobblers and miners and all common folk may yet have."

Dr. Gunsaulus argued that Mr. Wesley belonged to the twentieth century as much as to the eighteenth, for his idea of religion, experimentally verified, is in harmony with the latest word of science, and his idea of education, as a development of individual personality, through the religious nature, is that to which the best minds of the age are now coming: "If anything has been demonstrated, it is that morality can not live without religion; that a gospel which does not reach and transform the masses will not refine and exalt the classes; that faith in man and his improbability will die without faith in God; and that God is a power to be experienced by love because he is love eternal."

No doubt Mr. Wesley served his age and generation. He had a message from God to the people of his time and delivered it with utmost fidelity and marvelous power. Hence his name and fame will endure.

A Word to the Friendly Reader.

In another place we print a number of commendatory statements from well-known brethren concerning the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. We do not ordinarily occupy much space with this kind of matter, but we feel that the circumstances warrant us in doing so now. Those who have felt it their duty to oppose the policy of the paper have been far more industrious in circulating evil reports against it, than we or our friends have been in presenting its just claims on the brotherhood. But no paper has truer friends than the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, and all they needed was to know that there was occasion for speaking their mind. Some of them have done so elsewhere in this number. Any paper might well congratulate itself on receiving such high testimonials from such men.

We assure these brethren that their words of appreciation fully compensate us for the incessant labor which the paper has cost us, and for the heartaches which we have endured because of the misrepresentations of ignorant or evil-minded persons who have done what they could to bring to nought the labors of a life-time. We would not continue the work of editing a religious journal that did not have the approval of such men. These, and hundreds of others like them, are men whom the brotherhood delights to honor as leaders.

And now we are entering upon a six-months' campaign to increase, by many thousands, the circulation of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Our plan is to work through our present readers who know the paper and who believe its wider circulation would tend to the advancement of our cause. The premium is offered to them as an expression of our appreciation of their assistance. Our specific request, therefore, to every friendly reader of the paper is, that he make an effort to send us at least one new name for the remainder of this year, and as many more as possible. Your response to this appeal will be the best evidence you can furnish us of your appreciation of the paper, and your interest in the campaign to increase its circulation between now and the close of its fortieth volume.

Poor Demas!

There is a touch of pathos in Paul's reference to his erstwhile fellow-worker, Demas, in his last letter to Timothy. To this beloved son in the gospel, writing from his prison cell in Rome, he says: "Do thy diligence to come shortly unto me: for Demas forsook me, having loved this present world." Poor Demas! [He had been, not only a disciple of Christ, but a preacher of his Word, and had been associated in service with the great apostle. His heart had felt the warming and renewing influence of the grace of Christ, and had no doubt thrilled with tender emotion as he presented his claims to his fellowmen. What an opportunity opened up to him for great usefulness and for immortal honor! A fellow-laborer with Paul, he might have shared his chains, his imprisonment, his martyrdom and his "crown of righteousness." He might have stood through all the ages as a shining example of undying friendship and of unwavering fidelity to Christ and his truth. But, instead of that, he "loved this present world"—its allurements, its prizes and its pleasures—and so turned his back upon that glowing future which opened before him, to be immeshed, and lost forever, in the net of worldliness!

Demas might have withstood persecution, and even martyrdom, without surrendering his principles, but when "this present world," with its glitter and pomp, its fleeting honors and gains, presented themselves to him, he fell a prey to them as many another has done since his day. And so he fell from the high position of companionship with Paul, and fellowship with Jesus Christ, into the mire of selfish gain and temporary pleasure, forfeiting his soul and his crown of eternal life for the glitter of the world's wealth and pleasure. He parts company with the noble and immortal group of heroes and apostles, and goes out into the world with this brand upon him—"Demas forsook me, having loved this present world!" What excuses he made for himself we may not know. He may have argued the insalubrity of the climate of Rome, or the pressing needs of his business, but whatever excuse he made for himself, the apostle has no doubt assigned the true reason for his desertion—"he loved this present world."

Again, we cannot but exclaim, poor Demas! How much he forfeited in turning his back upon Christ, and upon his most faithful servant, to pursue the phantoms of earthly gain or renown! But has he any successors in our day? Are there any now living, with their names on the church roll, who once "tasted the good word of God" and felt "the power of the world to come"—who have become engrossed in selfish aims and pursuits, "having loved this present world"? We fear the number is by no means small. Oh, the alluring power of "this present world" over the human soul! How enticing sin is made! How stealthily does covetousness, or the greed of gain, steal upon the human soul, stifle all its finer powers and sensibilities, undermine its faith, quench its zeal, and paralyze its religious life!

Paul was alone, poor, in prison, awaiting death because of his fidelity to his Lord and Master. How much he needed a friend, and how his great heart hungered for friendship and sympathy! And yet Demas, hardened by the love of the world, turned his back on the aged apostle, and left him to loneliness, to heartaches and to martyrdom! But are there not others, true and loyal souls, who have caught something of Paul's spirit, and are standing to-day for great enterprises associated with the advancement of the kingdom of God, whose hearts are hungering for the fellowship, sympathy and aid of their brethren? Are there not still Demases turning their backs upon these holy causes, and these heroic men, pleading the urgency of business, or some other reason, but loving this present world more than Christ and his cause? May the example of Demas cause an earnest searching of heart on the part of us all, as to whether we are in danger of being ensnared by "the love of this present world," to the sacrifice of our souls and our crown of righteousness!

Editor's Easy Chair.

June was at its best. The blue sky and gentle breeze seemed to woo us to the wild woods and to the wilderness. We yielded to the wooing. The place of rendezvous from which the journey proper was to begin, was itself a Lodge in the wilderness, with no rattling, banging railroad in sight or hearing. A stout wagon, two spring seats, four folding cots to be used in emergencies, three passengers from the city and one—the guide and driver—a native of those parts, a "yellow hammer," as the natives are called, a tin cup, and a supply of fishing tackle made up the outfit. It was three in the afternoon when the party set out from the Lodge to explore the wilds of Crawford and Washington, a part of the hill country of Missouri, and especially to explore the piscatorial possibilities of a small mountain stream, known as "Indian River," a tributary of the Meramec. The term river is rather an ambitious name for so diminutive a stream, but the primitive inhabitants along its winding course, no doubt felt, as did the founders and promoters of some of our "universities," that it would grow in time to be worthy of the name. After fording the Meramec, whose waters came into the wagon bed, and following the valley of Brazil creek for a few miles, we had a steep mountain climb, which brought us to the summit, beyond which, in the valley, flowed the little "river" whose fame as a bass stream had attracted us thither. Through these wild woods a few deer are yet found and wild turkeys abound. It would seem to be a paradise for the squirrel, the coon and the opossum. Down the steep grade of the mountain range we pass rapidly, and soon we hear the musical gurgle of Indian River.

The sun had now set, going down like a ball of fire behind the western hills. The shades of evening were deepened by the dark forest, lending a solemn stillness to the scene. Nothing lay between us and a bedless and supperless night but the hospitality of some inhabitant of this region. But we were not uneasy, for Missouri hospitality, in the backwoods, can be relied on. Just as twilight was deepening towards darkness we halted in front of a rather large frame house with a portico in front, when a portly, middle-aged man came down to the fence to greet us. Explaining our needs and wishes to him, he replied, "Gentlemen, I am not rich, but you are welcome to the best I have. Come in!" On inquiry we learned his name was Bass—an auspicious omen! That supper, consisting of fried ham and gravy, coffee, hot biscuit, etc., we would better pass by, as we do not care to say anything to reflect on our traveling companions! A sound night's rest in good beds, and a hearty breakfast in the morning, put us in good plight for the day's fishing. We found we had struck the stream too high up and must descend several miles to strike the best fishing. So following the clear, sparkling stream and pausing only where it formed deeper pools, for a cast, we soon discovered that there was a basis of fact for its reputation as a bass stream. The Easy Chair secured the first trophy, and soon we were all sharing in the good luck. By evening time we had secured a string long enough to satisfy our ambition and began to think of the return trip. And thereby hangs a tale.

Supposing we had shortened our journey homeward by dropping down stream during the day seven or eight miles, we were a little surprised to learn, on inquiry, that our Lodge was fifteen miles away across the mountains, and the sun was nearing the horizon. After a hasty council of war we decided to make as much of the journey as possible before night overtook us, and take our chances on finding the same hospitality we had met with on the previous night. Our guide told us of a place seven miles on the way, but as the family was one of the wealthiest in that part of the country he did not believe they would entertain us. We did not share this doubt, but pushed on in hope. There were neat little valley farms and humble cabin homes along the route, but we did not care to embarrass them by asking entertainment for four hungry, tired men. Many of these humble homes looked to be the abodes of peace, and of plenty to meet their simple wants. But at last the statelier mansion loomed up in the evening twilight, located on a hill with a fine view of hills and valleys. Our guide was still incredulous and wished to press on to the Lodge, but we laid our case before the landlady, who is a widow now, and she and her family bade us welcome for the night, giving us supper, lodging and breakfast—a breakfast in which our bass appeared to good advantage and then disappeared. It does not mar the character of the hospitality extended to us on both nights that the people were willing to receive modest compensation, and it made it easier for us to ask it and enjoy it. And when we came to make that last seven miles across the mountains, the next morning, we were doubly grateful for the hospitality that had saved us from the perils of such a journey in the darkness. The guide had warned us that it was a bad road. The only thing wrong in this characterization is the word road. It was a dim mountain trail, with more ups and downs, loose boulders, fallen trees, and irregular grades than we had ever seen before in the same distance. Of course there were broken traces and brakes to be mended, but out of all these perils we were safely delivered, and reached our Lodge in time to assume the outward appearance of gentlemen before dinner.

Such is life in the hill country of Missouri, in the counties of Crawford and Washington. Do we pity the people who live there? We are more inclined to envy them. It is not a farming country, to be sure, though there are many productive valley farms, but it is a stock raising country, with fine timber and purest of water. The springs we saw, gushing out of the foot of some hill or mountain, with the spring house below, through which the cold water flows among the crocks of creamy milk and solid, yellow butter, brought back the memories of boyhood days. We were pleased to notice an excellent quality of stock in the country, both hogs and cattle, and there was no evidence of want among the people, so far as material blessings are concerned. There seems to be a dearth of church privileges in many communities. Here is a good field for home missions, and there would be little competition. Sufficient attention has not yet been given to fruit-growing in that section of the state, but increased railroad facilities would no doubt stimulate that industry. It is good to get away from the city to the unsophisticated country life, where one comes in closer touch with nature and nature's God, and learns to know and love the "common people," for as Mr. Lincoln said, "God must love the common people, because He has made so many of them."

Notes and Comments.

Attention has been called to the relative cost of battle-ships and colleges. The "Oregon" cost $6,575,000, which is probably more than the cost of the material equipment of any university in this country. It costs as much to maintain the "Oregon," even in time of peace, as it does to operate a first-class university. A dozen good colleges could be built and maintained for what it costs to build a battle-ship and keep it in commission. Perhaps battle-ships are still necessary in the present stage of the world's progress; we do not argue that point. But the comparison shows how much cheaper the higher forces of civilization are than the cruder forces. No investment is more profitable than a college.

One R. W. Rogers, of Hennessey, Okla., sends us some printed matter warning the people of the near approach of Christ's second advent. As evidence of his infallible knowledge on the subject he says: "I say to you all that I know Christ's coming is nigh at hand, even at the door, for I have a Bible that shows me all about it. . . . I sound the alarm again that Christ's coming is at the door." Our prophet cannot "alarm" us by such an announcement as that, for we do not look upon Christ's coming as a calamity, but as a blessing greatly to be desired.

Not the least of the good fruits of the recent Congress is the fact that it became evident that the brethren occupy common ground on the subject of federation. The misunderstanding and consequent contention grew out of applying the name of a vague and indefinite something to a condition well understood, generally endorsed and of long standing among us. The vague something is called "Federation," and the other thing is co-operation. Brother Garrison discussed co-operation under the name of federation, and he went about it with an earnestness—even resorting to exhortation, sometimes—that indicated that he supposed that some in the audience were hostile to the thing he was advocating. We have had the thing he was contending for ever since the denominations would allow us to co-operate with them. We were a little surprised that his paper did not deal with questions pertaining to division of territory, thinning out churches, supplanting a "church of one denomination with a church of another," and the like. We were gratified, however, that in answer to questions propounded, he repudiated all these things, and expressed himself as opposed to them. When this was brought out all ground of difference disappeared, and it became manifest that, so far as we are concerned, the whole contention has been about words and names.—Briney's Monthly.

Now that the address in question has been published in full in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, our readers can see for themselves whether or not it "deals with questions pertaining to the division of territory, thinning out churches," etc. We have said from the beginning of the discussion that federation was only co-operation systematized, made more permanent, and directed to more clearly-defined ends. It is gratifying, however, now that "the mists have cleared away," that there is little or no honest difference of opinion among us on the subject.

The Army of Enthusiasts

Commencement Address at Drake University

By Frank G. Tyrrell

It is sometimes said that liberal learning paralyzes; that it makes men cold, arrogant, disdainful. Said a professor to a noted lecturer, "You'll never be a reformer; you know too much!" If the insinuation in that jest were true, that a measure of ignorance is necessary to a noble, soldierly life, then may we evermore be blessed with ignorance. But it is untrue; it can be only the proverbial "little learning" that is dangerous to a man's moral nature. Both in the pursuit of knowledge and its use, we need enthusiasm.

There is no word in the language of nobler pedigree, en theos, inspired or possessed by the god; what is it but the incarnation, the Christian theory of life, that God dwells with us and shall be in us? We have lower words that convey a similar idea, vim, courage, intensity, but if a man has enthusiasm he has all these and more. He has hope, resolution, patience, energy, cheer.

The enthusiast is sometimes ridiculous in other's eyes. Poor old Archimedes was so charmed with his siren geometry that he neglected his meals, and took no care of his person. He was often carried by force to the baths, and when there he would make mathematical figures in the ashes, and with his finger draw lines upon his body when it was anointed, so much was he transported with intellectual delight. Although the author of many curious and excellent discoveries, he desired his friends to place on his tombstone only a cylinder containing a sphere, and to set down the proportion which the containing solid bears to the contained!

To be of real value, enthusiasm must be genuine; it cannot be successfully counterfeited. That was a fine enthusiasm which burned in the hearts of Wesley and Whitefield, and sent them like charioteers of a new-born millennium whirling through wildernesses and city centers. And it was infectious; it kindled the same sacred fire in other hearts. But there came times and people that counterfeited it, and the poor, miserable counterfeit injured the holy cause and discredited its promoters.

The world's great hearts have always been enthusiasts. Realizing that there is somewhat of divinity about it, Phillips Brooks exclaims: "Let us beware of losing our enthusiasm. Let us ever glory in something and strive to retain our admiration for all that would ennoble, and our interest in all that would enrich and beautify our life."

Enthusiasm is indispensable to all worthy achievements. Of course, one may live without it, toil without it, die without it; just as he may live without ambition, or energy, or skill. But it will be a poor and wretched life, a sort of apology for existence. When it comes to high and noble living, to honorable service, to heroism and sacrifice, then whatever we have or lack, enthusiasm we must have.

Put your finger on great events, those milestones of human progress, those Ebenezers to the devout soul, and tell me where there is one which was not conceived, shaped and set up by enthusiasts. Abram was an enthusiast when he left Ur of the Chaldees; Jacob was more enthusiast than renegade, when he slept on his stone pillow under the great dome of an open heaven, as he still was when he served twice seven long years for Rachel and deemed them short for the love he bore her. Enthusiasm is the essence of prophetism, and there can be no forked, flaming tongues without it. Nehemiah, rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem, was an enthusiast. David was an enthusiast, whether leading his sheep by the brookside or tuning his harp or breathing his penitential psalms.

Every great invention scores the triumph of enthusiasm. Palissy, the potter, by chance saw an enameled vase; he determined to produce a white enamel. For sixteen long years he wrought in vain. Finally he consumed his last bit of fuel. Laughed at by his neighbors, overwhelmed with reproaches, wife and children around him crying for bread, he fed his household furniture into the furnace, piece by piece. He won! as the enthusiast always wins. Such a man would have burned the very marrow of his bones rather than confess a failure. Huguenot as he was, he was assigned a place in the Tuilleries, and by the cruel Catherine personally exempted from the bloody St. Bartholomew.

The elastic, enduring heat-and-cold-defying rubber garments we now wear we receive as the spoil of enthusiasm, from Charles Goodyear, another inventor who reduced his family to beggary before success smiled upon him. Wars are abominable; yet out of the bivouac, the alarm, the onset, the murder, have come, by the strange mercy of an overruling Providence, victories, revenges, rights, emancipations, liberties: and every honest, manly blow, every gleam of campfire and roar of cannonade and clash of conflict is part of the ceaseless roll of the drums in the march of the army of enthusiasts.

Even in the mimic world, enthusiasm is indispensable to success. Charlotte Cushman, Rachel, Mary Anderson, Booth, Barrett, Irving, every one was a child of quenchless enthusiasm. Still more when you leave painted tragedies and tinsel and fustian, and descend into the world's valleys of tribulation or climb its mounts of anguish, you march with the army of enthusiasts.

Enthusiasm sustains and communicates itself. Nothing the world needs more than sustaining power. Many an athlete jumps well, but he lights too quick! We have learned some things which we hardly dare to practice. We feel the brunt of the fight evermore between the real and the ideal, the profitable and the sacrificial. The world has learned the Ten Commandments; but it daily breaks every letter and syllable, word and spirit, of both those awful tables. It has learned the Beatitudes, but go down into the pits and mills and mines and say, has it learned how to translate them from the Greek of the New Testament into the vernacular of daily life?

Is there anything left to be enthusiastic over? There is yourself, first, last and forever. Who and what are you? Dust standing erect, a living man with a heart to adore and a brain to understand God and his works—is there any other miracle? Time, the universe, eternity, all are wonderful. But most of all, the world's work invites.

Most of all, we need enthusiasm for growth. An egg is good, but a fledgling is better, and a bird soaring aloft on strong wing filling the air with music is better yet. The utilization of divine energy is yet to be learned, the gospel to be applied. The π and aim of commerce, manufactures, government and religion is a godlike man, You may boast of your learned professors and your fine museums and laboratories, but what kind of men*and women are you sending forth? God Almighty cares little for the fine fabrics you are weaving in your mills, but he does have regard to the kind of characters your workmen are weaving. Courts of justice, halls of legislation, libraries, exchanges, must be approved or condemned according to their fruits in sovereign manhood.

Go forth into a world yet young, into a world still swinging through tumults and battles and Gethsemanes; a world which still lifts its crosses, and waves its silken banners at the crackling fires of its martyrs. Go with the spirit of the old Norse warriors, whose one great humiliation was to die a natural death. They would sever their own arteries rather than brook the displeasure of their gods in the hall of Odin. The old king, dying, was put into a ship; the sails were set, the rudder lashed, the anchor lifted, the prow turned seaward, and then the ship was set on fire. And out into the wide sea, out into the sunlight and sunset, floated the funeral pyre, like a galleon rich with a cargo from spice lands, and thus the wild, heroic king died. How better can we die, than swept up on fiery chariots of enthusiasm for life, its problems and infinite possibilities?

The College and the Masses

By W. E. Garrison

It would be an interesting topic for some student of the history of education to study the relation of higher education to the common people in successive periods. Where and when have the colleges and universities drawn fastidiously apart from the life of the men who toil, and made to themselves an aristocracy of learning, and what has been the result of such academic superciliousness? When and where has the calm, colorless, scientific spirit prevailed so completely that scholarship forgot its mission of service, divorced itself from human interests and enthroned science for science's sake? And when have the institutions of learning most fully realized that learning finds its justification only in life, and that colleges and universities are not ends in themselves, but are agencies for public service? The development of educational theory has concerned not only the method, but still more the very purpose of education. Better and larger ideas have been developed regarding the real object of educational discipline, and for nothing should we be more grateful than for this.

In the mediæval universities half a dozen centuries ago, there was a turbulent rabble of students organized on the most democratic lines, but recognizing no relation to the communities in which they were located except one of hostility. It was "town against gown," and the broken heads and gory features, which told of fierce encounters between the ignorant ruffians of the town and the educated ruffians of the university, were types of the then current idea of the relation of education to the masses.

A less barbarous but equally narrow view is seen in that attitude of intellectual exclusiveness, of which one might find illustrations without going to so remote a period as the Middle Ages. Cloistered virtue is half a vice, and cloistered scholarship is but a scant half of education.

We Protestants are ready enough to condemn that monastic withdrawal from the world which characterized nearly every phase of mediæval Catholic civilization. Taking it as a whole and in its most palpable forms, we can see its folly and futility. We can easily see that a saint who was satisfied to immure his sainthood in a cell or who fled to the desert that he might be sure of keeping his sanctified person untouched by the contaminations of an evil world, was a saint with very grave limitations. That type of fruitless sanctity has fallen out of favor in these practical modern times. No one who cannot harness his virtue to the world's needs or put his saintly shoulder under some corner of the world's burden and lift, need apply for canonization in the conclave of public opinion today. We have learned that piety, like money, is something not merely to get, but to use, and we give a man credit not in proportion to the amount he has, but in proportion as he makes it useful to the world.

We have learned the fallacy of cultivating religion for religion's sake, and in the light of that discovery, the monastic ideal of the religious life is seen to be a hopeless anachronism. But is it so sure that we have applied the principle as rigorously in the field of education? Is not education for education's sake the implied, even if not expressed, principle which governs much of our thought about education and—what is more serious—much of the attitude of the college toward the general public, and of the general public toward the college? In how far is our educational program still vitiated by the idea that culture is a kind of intellectual fastidiousness, an æsthetic squeamishness, which must needs call for its smelling-salts if confronted with a verbal infelicity, and can only withdraw, shocked and fainting, from the presence of a rude and unpleasant fact of life?

The nineteenth century was a time of wonderful educational advance. Methods were improved, colleges multiplied, standards raised, curricula enriched, endowments enormously increased; above all, education was popularized in a hitherto unprecedented degree. All of this has laid a solid foundation for the movement which I believe is to be the distinguishing honor of the twentieth century—viz., a more perfect co-ordination of this improved educational machinery with the social, commercial, political and religious life of men, until neither in academic nor in popular opinion shall there remain a vestige of the consciousness of that embarrassing gap between the college and what is commonly called "practical life."

To me, that alleged gulf between the life of the college and the life of the world even now seems vastly overestimated. Whatever may have been the case in other days, the college man of to-day is not an impractical theorist, not a rattle-brained doctrinaire, not an embodiment of erudite incompetence. Unquestionably the feeling of the aloofness and impracticalness of the college graduate, especially the recent graduate, has been—as Mark Twain said of the rumor of his own death—greatly exaggerated.

And yet that feeling still exists. But it is taking a somewhat different form. That the graduate is abundantly able to take care of himself in the world's battle, and that his college education is a valuable asset in compassing his own personal advancement, is now pretty generally conceded. But this, after all, is not the main issue. The question is not whether education is a useful tool in the hands of selfish ambition, but whether it makes a man a more valuable member of society, a

The Chosen Three.

By John S. Martin.

When Jesus heard the Jewish Ruler's cry
And went to still the stricken parent's moan
He took but Peter, James and John alone.
So too we find the same disciples nigh
To view His change upon the mount. And why?
Had they been with Him till their lives had grown
In harmony and love so like His own
That on their faithful hearts He could rely
For that He needed most—their sympathy?
Ah! yes, it must be so—they're called upon
To linger near, in dark Gethsemane,
And watch while He should pray till hope was gone.
For such as they He yet hath need:—ah! me,
Am I of stuff like Peter, James and John?

From Tent to Marble Palace in Fifty Years

Denver, The Beautiful.

The land of gold, sunshine and swear-words will soon be the center of interest to thousands of Christian Endeavorers. No state in the union needs the impulse of that mighty throng more than does Colorado; no state can offer more charms for a brief, or even an extended summer holiday.

When the glitter of Pike's Peak gold first drew throngs of adventurous spirits who toiled across the plains of Kansas and Nebraska, some with wheelbarrows, or push-carts, as they were called, some with ox-wagons or mule teams, such a city as Denver—now one of the most beautiful in America—was beyond all dreams. Fourteen miles from the foot-hills, out on the prairie, at the juncture of a river that is not worthy of that title, and a creek that once engulfed cabins on its banks, but ought now to be watered artificially during four-fifths of the year to keep it from blowing away, the site of Mac Gaa's cottage gave no promise in 1858, of the one hundred and seventy thousand of the Queen City of the Plains that is now the business mart and pleasure focus of a great region of peaks, passes and plains. Had a prophet told the men of '58—for the first actual settlement of Denver was made on June 24, 1858, of the great business blocks, the miles and miles of finely paved streets, the beautiful homes, the magnificent capitol, third finest among the states, the telephones and the railroads to and right across the Rocky mountains, they would certainly have voted him insane and taken steps to see that he did no harm.

It was my good fortune, when in Denver, to happen upon one of the men who ever put up on Cherry Creek, and it was right along side of the creek that I met him. There was nothing else to do but to take him up on the top of the lofty warehouse now standing where he camped and talk with him about the frontier days as we looked down upon the spot he had not visited for over fifty years. Then I took a sky line photograph of the city of to-day. Mr. J. F. Chavileer is now a prosperous Nebraska farmer. Born in Ohio, it was in 1856 that he got the gold fever, and with fourteen other men, started out from St. Joe, Mo. They were the first wagon party to reach the site of Denver, though some push-cart men had found Cherry Creek before them. When he set out to return home three weeks later there were ten acres of tents around the spot where his had whitened the plain alone.

But the actual settlement of Denver was due to Dr. Levi Russell, a Georgian, who, with a group of Kansas men in search of the golden fleece, came to a standstill on Cherry Creek, June 24, 1858. Entering upon negotiations with the Indians, through John Simpson Smith, a "squaw man" and William MacGaa, son of an English nobleman, and husband of a dusky Indian beauty, a square mile of land was set aside for a town-site, the first stake being driven at what is now the corner of Larimer and 15th streets. The city that was not yet, received the name of St. Charles and the American genius for organization set to work. Though there was but one double cabin, town officers were elected, and a constitution and by-laws adopted. But by the latter part of the year many had become discouraged over the lack of the yellow metal and returned east. A new constitution was adopted, and after some contention the west side of Cherry Creek was settled by 300 people in 1859, as Auraria. Shares, consisting of land lots were offered to anyone who would establish a newspaper and everything was done to encourage thrift, enterprise and permanent dwelling.

Then the arrival of a party from Leavenworth, Kansas, who took possession of St. Charles, deeding lands to those quiescent, and before the eyes of those who raised objections, led to the establishment of a perfected organization and a united town under the name of Denver, in honor of the Kansas governor. Then the dawn of the new day was heralded by the whistle of the locomotive, which entered the city of five thousand souls on June 15, 1870, over what is now known as the Union Pacific railroad. The dissolution of the union armies had turned the faces of thousands of veterans toward the trans-Missouri region and with the wonderful era of railroad building and the discovery that the highest forms of agriculture would flourish with irrigation, these western settlements took on the appearance of permanency.

A few other dates are of interest. In 1859 the Rocky Mountain News was published. The same year the first coach bringing express mail from Leavenworth arrived, the journey taking ten days and the cost being 25 cents per letter. The first telegraphic communication was on Oct. 10, 1863, when the rates for messages of ten words were: to Boston, $9.25; New York, $9.10; St. Louis, $7.50. In 1865, flour was selling in Denver at from $15 to $20 per 100 pounds; corn at $10 a bushel, and beef at forty cents a pound. At this time the fare from Denver to Salt Lake City was $350 and to California $500.

Potatoes at $15 a Bushel;

With over 5,000 miles of railroad track in the state itself the Colorado of to-day offers as remarkable a field for social achievement as it has already proven itself to be for material achievement. It may be called the nation's treasure house as well as its sanitarium. Colorado's climate is as famous as its valuable mineral deposits. Its scenic attractions are perhaps more varied and more grand than those any state possesses. One misses the weirdness of Norway, and the charm of Switzerland's combination of water, mountain and sky effects. But if there is a little lacking in Colorado there is something added. Here we can see a nation in the making—developing raw resources, changing the very aspect of nature's fastnesses, planting new industries, experimenting with political theories.

Colorado's Greatest Need To-day is Christian Endeavor. Out there they will tell you it is water, that is, distributed water. Irrigation is the talk. But the Christian man who travels in Colorado is grieved at the lack of Christian sentiment. Outside of a few cities, the evidence of its influence is much less than we ought to expect to see it. If a great big band of some of the best speakers and singers among the Christian Endeavor forces could be chosen and could spend a month in visiting the smaller settlements in Colorado just after the convention, holding open air services, the amount of good done can not be measured. Political parties know the value of this kind of a campaign. I view with pleasure the visit of the united societies to Denver. That city, the emporium of the Rocky Mountain district, elevated exactly one mile above the level of New York harbor, is as deep in the mire of sin and moral degradation as almost any large city I have ever visited either in Europe or America. In my student days I lived for six months in the Latin quarter of Paris. Many years of newspaper experience in London familiarized me with almost every inch of modern Babylon. In neither of these great cities is life more at loose ends than in Denver. Until Jan. 1, 1903, when I left, it was a greater or distribute a circular on the street without a license than it was to run a gambling house. The new governor of the state, Mr. Peabody, has declared his intention of leveling things up to the standard of the law. But he will need all the help he can possibly get from the Christian forces.

The invading hosts of Christian Endeavor will have a tremendous effect on the whole Rocky Mountain district, where there are probably fifty saloons for every church. The first minister of the gospel to enter Denver was Rev. W. H. Good, a Methodist, who drove a four-mule team 600 miles. He was

Bethany — The Mother of Us All

By F. D. Power

The sixty-second annual commencement of this time-honored institution has passed into history. The session just closed has been a prosperous one. Two hundred and twenty-one students have been enrolled. This number exceeds by 45 that of any previous year in the history of the college. The class of young people, too, has been exceptionally good, not a serious difficulty of any kind having occurred during the session. The president has steadily grown in favor with the people, and the faculty have done excellent service. For the first time in a number of years, no indebtedness was reported on current expenses, and an increased income and enlargement of the endowment funds could be announced. Improvements of a necessary character were made in the buildings and grounds, and an electric light plant and water works for the college and town provided for. The $20,000 promised last year on the second block of $50,000 endowment, conditioned upon the raising of that sum by June 16 of this year, was made good, the full amount having been secured, and $13,800 is pledged upon the third block of $50,000 which the trustees have determined to raise. When a quarter of a million is in the fund, we shall feel that Bethany has a secure foundation.

The trustees were greatly encouraged by the work done during the session. Those present were, Robert Moffett, J. W. Mulholland, Alexander Campbell, George Anderson, J. A. Campbell, W. H. Graham, M. M. Cochran, W. R. Enett, W. A. Dinker, J. J. Barclay, G. B. Scott, A. L. White, J. E. Curtis, Oliver S. Marshall, T. E. Cramblet and F. D. Power. Mr. W. H. Vodry, of East Liverpool, O., was added to the board. The trustees approved the action of the executive committee in undertaking the change of commencement hall into a young men's dormitory. This hall was erected in 1870, at a cost of $35,000. It has always been a failure on account of the wretched acoustic properties. The trustees resolved to erect an up-to-date gymnasium on the campus which will provide everything needed for athletics, and a roomy hall for commencement exercises in case of bad weather, the closing festivities being held in fair seasons upon the campus. A handsome sum was subscribed toward the gymnasium by the trustees, alumni and friends present at commencement, and its erection, which is already assured, was received with enthusiasm by the student body. Old friends of Bethany cannot do better than to send on to President Cramblet an offering for this enterprise. Among the gifts received the last year toward the endowment was a generous one from Gov. B. B. Odell, of New York, an old student of the college. O. G. White, who has rendered excellent service as financial agent, is continued.]

Commencement began Sunday, June 14, with the baccalaureate sermon by J. G. Slayter, of Akron, O., and the president's annual address. Monday was the last chapel service, with farewell words from the faculty, the exhibition of art students' work under Miss Keith, and the elocution recital of the professor of elocution, Miss Cogswell. Tuesday was given to Field Day exercises and the annual exhibition of the American Literary Institute. Earl Wilfley was the speaker for the society and delivered a strong address on "Culture." Wednesday was devoted to the class day exercises, which included the usual features of history, grumbling and prophecy and the musical department under Professor Moos. Thursday, as usual, was the great day of the feast.

Bethany commencement weather is always fair. In the memory of the oldest Bethanyite, there have been favoring skies for her graduating classes. The sixty-second commencement was not an exception. The day was an ideal one. In the finest of natural amphitheatres the seats were arranged on the campus at the north end of the building, with a covered platform for those having a part in the exercises. The Wheeling band discoursed sweet music, and the robins, cat birds, wrens and blue birds, with the occasional whistle of a partridge, or coo of a dove in the distance, filled in the intervals. A large audience gathered on the grass under the trees, and received with marked attention the well prepared and gracefully spoken addresses of capped and gowned graduates. Twelve were honored with the bachelor's degree—six young men and six young women. The honor graduates were, Julia Elizabeth White, Odessa Klief Scott, Margaret Vaughn Curtis, Summa Cum Laude; Frank Downey Barger, Magna Cum Laude; and Willis Elmore Pierce, Cum Laude. Five of the young men are preachers. Three post-graduates received the M. A. degree—George B. Evans, Arthur M. Growden and L. N. D. Wells, and the honorary degree of A. M. was conferred on Harry G. Hill. There were six graduates in the department of music, four in the commercial department and one in the school of elocution. One member of the class, Mr. A. G. Israel, of Ohio, died during the year, and a scholarship in memoriam was endowed by his parents for the education of young men for the ministry. Altogether, the class was a strong one, and the program was well carried out from the beginning of the procession from Pendleton Heights to the president's congratulatory address at the close. The festivities were all the more enjoyable because held in God's great out-of-doors, and the host of friends and commencement goers were made happy in the rich promise of better things for old Bethany.

The alumni meeting was well attended and enthusiastic. Earl Wilfley was chosen president and O. G. White secretary. A generous sum was raised toward the new gymnasium. The usual old stories, reminiscences and pledges of fealty were heard from the old boys and the new graduates admitted to the ranks. Among the old students in attendance, besides those named, were, V. H. Miller, S. T. Martin, P. B. Cochran, W. H. Oldham, W. H. Fields, R. L. Strickler, C. C. (Continued on page 25.)

What Keeps the Flag Afloat?

By J. M. Lowe.

What keeps our country's flag afloat,
In heaven's air o'er land and sea?

The flag that cheered the heart of braves,

Who sleep to-day in nameless graves,
The emblem of the free.

It floated o'er the ship of state,
That, trembling from its bow to keel,
Passed safely through the surging sea

Of civil strife and slavery,
With Lincoln at the wheel.

Our flag that led the forces on,
When Yorktown's field was won,
Is not kept floating on the breeze
By boasting of our liberties,
Or deeds of valor done.

What keeps our country's flag afloat,
The pride of this fair land?
Not roll of drums, nor fife's shrill notes,
Not shouts from half a million throats;
Not "music by the band,"

We men who walk the paths of peace,
Must still keep up the fight.
Columbia's flag will keep afloat,
By loyal deed and honest vote,
By standing for the right.

This is a day of crying need
For true men both of heart and brain;
Men who by love of truth are led,
For when the love of truth is dead
All effort is in vain.

What keeps the Stars and Stripes afloat?
The watchword of a chosen race,
A man of strength and tenderness,
A man who scorns that false success
Accomplished by disgrace.

This keeps Columbia's flag afloat,
The flame of virtue in the heart,
A tongue that dares to speak the truth,
A life with love as strong as youth
That bears a noble part.

PIATT: A College Sketch By Edgar D. Jones

Donald Ethelbert Piatt was one of the many new names enrolled in "Central's" register at the opening of the fall term in 1890. We had heard of Piatt before. He and "Bishop" Wallace lived in the same town, and when "Central" had gone down to defeat in the oratorical contest for the third consecutive time the ire of Wallace was fully aroused. And since the "Bishop's" hair was of a most brilliant hue, his ire meant something.

"I tell you, fellows," he said one day, "I am going to bring Don Piatt to 'Central' and put a stop to this thing." With this declaration he confided to his bosom friends, of whom I, his roommate, was one, that Don Piatt was a born orator, that he had won a number of local contests and was much in demand at patriotic assemblies. We learned, too, that Piatt was preparing for the ministry, having disappointed some of his friends who desired him to study law. Wallace had also told us that Piatt was preaching successfully for two village churches not far from "Central." So Piatt came to us and was popular from the first. He was a manly looking fellow something over six feet in height and straight as an Indian. He had a big, firm mouth, that somehow always reminded me of that feature of Washington's familiar portrait. His hair was as black as night and he wore it rather long. His eyes were dark and flashed fire when he was animated, while his voice was music in itself. Then he was much given to the wearing of a big black slouch hat with the crown crushed, in a style peculiarly his own.

Soon after entering college Piatt joined the Union Literary Society, for the very good reason that "Bishop" Wallace was high in its councils. He at once made a fine showing in his society work. At the first session of the U. L's he declaimed "The Chariot Race" so effectively that it brought him an encore. This was significant; for to my certain knowledge in the preceding three years, five different men had essayed the same thing with little success.

The time drew near for the primary that was to select "Central's" representative in the annual contest. The U. L's, without a dissenting vote, elected Piatt. The Athenians chose Powers, while the Webster Debating Club elected "Fatty" Thomas.

We of the U. L's kept our eyes open and our ears cocked. We had no fears of Thomas. Powers was a new man, a junior, who had come to us from a sister college. Just what he had done we failed to learn. What the Athenians expected him to do we heard daily.

"Piatt stood facing the storm."

Piatt, Wallace, "Buck" Willis, "Balbus," and Lynn Clarke and I all boarded at the same place, and a happy lot we were, I tell you! Just ten days before the primary, measles broke out among the students. Five days later, to my utter disgust, I fell a victim; the only one of our crowd who had not been through the mill. The evening of the primary I was unable to be up and had to content myself by watching Wallace dress, and listening to the other fellows talking and singing in the adjoining rooms. When all were ready to leave Piatt came into our "den," as we called it, looking splendid in evening dress.

"De, this is tough," he said, as he sat down on the bed by me, "but if I win to-night you shall be my usher at the inter-collegiate contest. I did intend selecting Wallace, but we'll have to even things up, eh, 'Bishop?'"

"Take 'De' by all means," grunted

Wallace, as he gave a few finishing touches to his patent leathers. Then they left me. I made a strenuous effort to keep awake until the boys returned, but failed signally. About midnight I was awakened by a familiar yell. It was the U. L. boys' cry of victory. Piatt had won the primary!

It was the night of the Inter-Collegiate Oratorical Contest. Harrison

Chapel was filled with noisy beribboned delegations; set off here and there by fair allies, who waved streamers of gold and crimson and blue. Five institutions were represented: "Bacon," "Wycliffe," "Centenary," "Harper" and dear old "Central." Since the contest was held at home that year our delegation was the largest, yet scarcely more enthusiastic than the visiting ones.

As the hour for opening the exercises approached, the din became deafening. Banners were borne aloft. Canes decked with flaming ribbons wildly waved. Hats were tossed in the air. College yells were given with a vim. Now and then snatches of song mingled with bandying sallies were sung. In an ante-room we who were to occupy the stage waited our cue to go on. Piatt and I, in common with several of our company, studied the program. It is pretty generally conceded that the first and last speaker are handicapped, though not always seriously so. The order for the evening ran as follows: 1. Mann, "Bacon." 2. Merrill, "Wycliffe." 3. Gardner, "Centenary." 4. Piatt, "Central." 5. Peckham, "Harper."

"You have not fared badly for place, Piatt," I said.

"No, I think"—but the sentence was not completed. Just then the orchestra struck up an overture.

"Let us go," said the chairman of the evening, and from out the ante-room we came, and on to the stage we went, an even dozen of us, counting the chairman and his usher. Our entrance was the occasion of a tremendous demonstration. Before us stretched out the sea of faces. "Balbus" and Lynn Clarke, "Buck" Willis and Wallace were seated in the midst of our contingent, and well down to the front at that. I said "seated," but only for a portion of the time. Every few minutes with some twenty others they got up and shouted themselves hoarse with this:

"Where is he at! Where is he at!
Where is the man! Where is the man!
Where is the man to beat Piatt!"

"Balbus" had at least three yards of crimson ribbon knotted to a cane with which he was continually describing circles over head. Wallace held aloft a splendid crimson banner with "Central College" emblazoned in gold lettering on either side. "Buck," whose voice was like a fog horn, seemed to be leading the chorus when the yell was given. Indeed, every loyal son of "Central" was helping to swell the general tumult of fervid college spirit. A few words from the chairman and the first orator, Mann, from "Bacon," was introduced. Then the "Bacon" boys arose and ranted:

"Bacon! Bacon! Bacon!
Ham! Ham! Ham!
We'll win! We'll win!
Mann! Mann! Mann!
Bacon Rah! Bacon Ree!
Bacon College yes-sir-ee!"

Mann's theme was "The Power of a Purpose." His delivery was only ordinary and his thought not especially good.

"No fear of him," I said to myself as he took his seat midst applause.

Next came Merrill, "Wycliffe's" representative. His effort was better in every way, still we of "Central" felt thus far Piatt had clear sailing, so much superior was he to the two who had spoken. Gardner, of "Centenary," was next to speak. From the moment he faced that audience I saw he was the man with whom we must reckon. He was fully as tall as Piatt and much heavier, but withal as graceful a man as ever stood on a platform. His oration was on "The Message of Alfred Tennyson," felicitous in quotation, poetical in imagery, beautiful and fanciful in construction, it was attractively delivered. In gesture and attitude, Gardner was almost faultless. When, with the poet's own lines "Crossing the Bar" he concluded, it was amidst what was up to that time the wildest demonstration of the evening. There was only one apparent weakness in the speech to me. It was elegant, but soulless. Gardner's performance was like a splendid piece of statuary, polished, stately and beautiful, but lacking the warmth of life. I glanced at Piatt. He was pale, but smiling, and said to me earnestly,

"Beautiful! He spoke in blank verse." Then Piatt's turn came. His subject was "The Uses of Adversity." Of course "Central's" boys fairly shook the chapel with the reception they accorded their idol, and I came dangerously near forgetting my position for the evening and joining in with them as they sent up a mighty shout:

"Huh Gah Hah!
Huh Gah Han!
Central! Central!
Rah! Rah! Rah!"

Mingled with the applause I thought I heard hisses. Then certain of it, for rising above the handclapping, came a full chorus of them like that which ensues from a serpent's den when its inmates are disturbed by an intruder. Louder and clearer they cut the heated air and I felt something arise in my throat.

"He's a parson," some one yelled. "Rule the preacher out." "Take him off the platform." These and kindred cries filled the chapel. Piatt stood facing the storm straight and calm, but not smiling. There was a momentary lull and his musical voice began:

"There is an angel called adversity whose"—then the disturbance broke out afresh and rose louder and fiercer than before. The chairman was on his feet by this time and with raised hand called for order.

"Gentlemen," he almost shouted, "Gentlemen, are you beside yourselves? Let us have order! Let the speaker continue." Piatt calmly stood his ground, but his jaws were set and the red color was in his cheeks now. Somehow as I sat there and took in the situation, there came into my mind the incident in Wendell Phillips' life when the Faneuil Hall mob tried to cry him down. Piatt stood like a marble statue. The tide was coming back. There were cries of "Shame! Shame!" "Let him go on!" "Go on, Piatt, go on." Gradually the audience became quiet. The disturbers saw their blunder. They had only succeeded in rousing sympathy for the young orator whom they had sought to arouse prejudice against, and disconcert, if possible. Piatt waited, waited till the hall was so still one could have distinctly heard a pin hit the floor. Then he began. Like oil on troubled waters his measured sentences fell on the listening ears. The uses of adversity he declared were many and exceeding fruitful. He traced the careers of famed men. Their toil, bitter tears, afflictions—all of which were in the end but stepping stones to victory. Now his voice was full of pathos, now aflame with indignation, now deliciously soothing in apt quotation. Thus he swayed us with his eloquence, bringing tears more than once, and I felt my spirits rise with him as he rose on the wings of his talents. Perhaps he was more than two-thirds through when he suddenly halted abruptly—only a few seconds of hesitation, but the torrent of language was broken, the limpid flow interrupted. I held my breath! Had Piatt's memory played traitor? Was all to be lost? Quickly and dramatically he took a step forward and, as it seemed to me, involuntarily, drew out with his right hand the white silk handkerchief from his shirt bosom and crumpled it in his palm. At the same time he swung his left arm upward, and catching instantly the thread of his theme went right on. I drew a long breath and glanced at the faces in front of us. I knew Piatt had dropped a half dozen sentences, but I saw at once that few if any realized it. But the slip was as a spur to Piatt. Perhaps he coupled with it the remembrance of the hisses. However that may have been, he was now at his very best and at the most critical time, too. Splendidly and with consummate eloquence he concluded with his final thought, expressed in that fine anonymous poem, "The Water Lily":

"O star on the breast of the river:
O marvel of bloom and grace!
Did you fall right down from heaven,
Out of the sweetest place?
You are white as the thoughts of an angel,
Your heart is steeped in the sun:
Did you grow in the Golden City,
Of my pure and radiant one?"

Nay, I fell not down out of heaven;
None gave me my saintly white:

Slowly it grew in the darkness,
Down in the dreary night.
From the ooze of the silent river
I won my glory and grace:
White souls fall not, O my poet,
They rise to the sweetest place."

Piatt took his seat and O how the boys did cheer and yell and call! I could scarcely keep from making some demonstration myself, but he restrained me, saying:

"The thing isn't over yet. I came very near losing clear out."

"Few noticed that slip, Piatt," I assured him. "You hid it most effectively."

"I am not so sure about that," he replied; "as I stepped forward I am pretty sure one of the judges made a note against me."

Then came the last speaker, Peckham, of "Harper." He was fairly good, too, but the pace had been set, and the audience was getting weary. Still, he received a goodly round of applause as he finished his speech. The contest was between Piatt and Gardner, we all saw that. The committee withdrew for consultation.

The orchestra began again. The noisy demonstrations were taken up anew.

During the trying wait Piatt and I found diversion in reading the congratulatory messages sent up to him. Some of them were characteristic of the writer. This for instance:

"Old man, you have done yourself proud," "Balbus." This from the "Bishop." "Don, you'll win in spite of that lapsus and attitudinizing." No name was signed to the following: "Say, Parson, didn't you deliver one of your old sermons to-night?"

From Prof. Goldwin, of "Central's" English Department, came this:

"Accept my congratulations. Your oration was most excellent."

We were getting nervous now. The climax was close at hand. Gardner looked confident. His delegation was trying to out-yell our own and was succeeding pretty well. A burst of applause! The judges had made their decision. One of them, a middle aged lawyer from the state capital, came on the stage to announce the winner and present the medal. The chapel became quiet again. I could feel little quivers running through my body. The moment was intense.

"I have a boy at home," began the lawyer. But the crowd thought they scented a long winded anecdote and the patience of such an audience is anything but proverbial.

"We don't care if you have a dozen," some one cried.

"Let him stay there," yelled another.

"Give the medal to Gardner." "Give it to Piatt." "Let the preacher have it."

The lawyer laughed, but he was bent on finishing that sentence.

"I have a boy at home and I never like to disappoint him. I regret that I have to disappoint a good many boys to-night."

Here an uproar and cries of "Out with it." "Who won?" "Let us have the name."

"In the judgment of the committee, the medal belongs to Mr. Donald E. Piatt, and then—Bedlam vied with Pandemonium and everything was crimson.

Our Colleges

Berkeley Bible Seminary.

Berkeley, Calif.

The Berkeley Bible Seminary has had the best year in its existence. The year opened with the summer school at Santa Cruz in which Pres. J. W. McGarvey and Dean Hiram Van Kirk gave each a series of lectures on the Acts of the Apostles, with enrollment of 119.

At Berkeley the regular seminary work has been conducted as usual. Also Dean Van Kirk gave two courses as lecturer in Hebrew history in the University of California.

Thus the institution has been able to do three grades of work. 1. Regular seminary classes with an enrollment of 15. 2. University classes reaching in all 143 different students. 3. A Sunday Bible-class of the Bible-chair grade reaching 20 students.

In addition to the above, Dean Van Kirk has served as chairman of the committee on religious work in the two universities under the state federation of churches under which a course of lectures has been conducted and other work done. Thus a great open door has been providentially set before us among a body of 3,000 students coming from every nation and tongue under the sun. Now is the time for entering in. There ought to be no halting between two opinions among the Disciples of Christ in laying hold of this opportunity. Hence the seminary has grave needs. There are

1. A building to stand on the well situated lot as a permanent home for the work.

2. An increased endowment in order to support at least two additional teachers to care for the great variety of students who come to us.

3. A prompt emergency fund to make good losses in finances caused by the late unjust attack of the enemies of the cause of true education on our seminary.

With thanks to God for his loving care and with keenest appreciation of the kindness of the great host of our brotherhood.

HIRAM VANKIRK, Dean.

Bethany College.

Bethany, W. Va.

Bethany College has just closed one of the best sessions in her long and honorable history. A year ago, our board of trustees unanimously voted that an effort be made during the summer to increase the enrollment of the college to two hundred. This effort was entirely successful and the enrollment for the present session reached the unprecedentedly high mark of 221.

This does not count the summer school students, which would make a total enrollment of students, for the year 260. During the past year more than $60,000 was secured for our endowment fund. We now have $100,000 of productive endowment and eighteen thousand dollars that belongs to the college from a bequest which does not bring any revenue for the present. We have about $15,000 subscribed toward a third block of $50,000 and we are making heroic efforts to complete this block within the next year. Our funds are invested permanently through the Mercantile Trust Co., of Pittsburg, Pa. Only the interest can be used for current expenses. The principle is not liable for any obligations that may be contracted.

Commencement Hall is being transformed into a boys' dormitory of 40 rooms. The rooms will be large and airy. There will be baths and water on each floor. The building throughout will be lighted by electricity and every convenience and comfort to be found anywhere will be provided for the students. Prof. W. D. Turner and wife will reside in this hall and will have personal supervision over the young men. One floor will be given up to boys in the preparatory department. A large study room will be maintained and these boys will be under the direct supervision of Prof. Turner. We believe that this plan will provide such care for boys as is not offered in many of our educational institutions. We shall give special attention to the preparatory department, and parents who have boys to prepare for college will find the arrangement at Bethany very satisfactory.

A system of water works and electric lights for the college and village of Bethany is now being installed. This will be in operation by mid-summer. The long desired and long expected railroad to Bethany is now in sight. Several hundred men are at work upon the road and two and a half miles of this road will be ready for operation by the first of September, and the promoters announce their intention of completing it through Bethany in the very near future.

The outlook for Bethany College grows brighter constantly. Never, in years have there been so many inquiries from prospective students as at present. We confidently expect next year's enrollment to far exceed that of the past session.

T. E. CRAMBLET, President.

Christian College.

Columbia, Mo.

The Renaissance of Christian College, which began with such earnestness some few years ago, is still going on. Many ideals having been realized, the goal is set forward, and there are greater achievements just before. The three splendid new buildings, which have been erected in the last four years, are but a beginning of what we hope for in the future.

Last session 210 students were enrolled, and of these 140 were in the boarding department. There were 34 academic graduates and 9 in the special departments, making 43 in all. Twenty-three gold medals were given in various departments as a reward of special merit. Nearly 100 girls identified themselves with the Christian College Daughters' League and the Christian College Auxiliary to the Christian Women's Board of Missions. The League is banded together for increase of spirituality and Christian work. The Orphans' Home in St. Louis has been the principal object of interest, and this benevolent work has reacted upon the lives of those engaging in it. Our auxiliary to the C. W. B. M. contributes regularly to the missionary cause and spends one Sunday evening of each month in the study of missions. A fine missionary library is freely consulted. Year by year the course of study has been constantly improved. It now admits without further examination into advanced standing in our State University. A practical course in cooking, food-values, home sanitation and needle work has been introduced, so that nothing is neglected in the entire education of the daughters sent to Christian College.

There is no reason why there should not be built up here, as a permanent landmark, a great western school for young ladies like the best of those in the east. Our western daughters should be educated in their home surroundings, and for life in this great Mississippi Valley. The friends of school days are the friends for life, and the associations of those days carry an indelible imprint into the future. There is something more in a college education than mere scholastic training. There is a cultus from association and surroundings that is worth more to a young lady than all else. This is obtained only in a first-class college atmosphere and is what we claim Christian College offers. For a young woman to be really educated, she must grow in all the elements of refinement, as well as in intellect. A proper environment is, therefore, absolutely essential to the development of an all-round education.

While expressing deep thankfulness for what has been accomplished in the past, and while profoundly grateful to all our friends for their help in scholarships and donations, we trust there are still others who will liberally contribute toward expanding our work so that it may be equal, in every respect, to the demands made upon it. Christian College has a right to claim a generous support. It has won this right through 52 years of unbroken usefulness. The property is all in the hands of trustees for the benefit of woman's education forever. In order to its highest usefulness the college should be liberally endowed, and we trust the great brotherhood of the state will furnish the means necessary to this end. MRS. W. T. MOORE.

Cotner University.

Bethany, Neb.

In nearly all respects the year just closed has been the most successful for the past eight years. The total enrollment, including the colleges of medicine and dentistry, has been three hundred and twenty-five. Of this number, one hundred and fifty-two were enrolled in the literary department. While the class receiving bachelor's degrees was smaller than for a number of years, the increase in the number entering regular college classes was marked.

Much interest was taken in the department of biblical study. Thirty-three were enrolled for Bible study with a view to the ministry. Many are already successful ministers of the gospel. A newly arranged course, called pastoral helpers' course, promises much good. Many who do not expect to engage in the ministry desire preparation for Sunday-school work and such other practical drill and instruction as is needed for pastoral help. A course of one year is arranged to cover this demand. A certificate will be granted at its completion. Not only the efforts of the faculty will be given, but other experienced and practical workers will be called in to aid in making it successful. Many students are seeking preparation for a business education in connection with general culture. In order that this want may be more fully met, the commercial department has been considerably strengthened. A suite of rooms has been furnished with desks, office fixtures, typewriters and all other modern appliances. The attendance upon this department more than doubled last year, and it is expected to be much increased in the coming session. A normal course is sustained, and teachers are not only trained in theory, but in actual teaching. In fact, an effort is made to meet all wants of parents who wish their sons and daughters educated under Christian influences and in an atmosphere of safe and refined culture. No better or more thorough schools of music and expression are to be found in the west than those connected with Cotner.

The former members of the faculty remain. One, a teacher of English, is added—Miss Rilla Lane. She is a graduate of Drake, has recently traveled and studied in Europe, and has had considerable experience. Professor Young is now in the University of Chicago, taking special work in modern languages. J. W. Hilton received the master's degree in philosophy last week at the State University of Nebraska. All are ambitious to do the best work.

Special efforts this summer and during the year will be made to arouse the attention of the brotherhood in this part to the need of loyally sustaining the school, not only financially, but by sending their sons and daughters here. With such help, great advances may College Days.

By Clerin Zumwalt.

[Written for the banquet of the Gamma Sigma Literary Society at Washburn College.]

The days may go as waters flow,
In shadow or in light,
But on the shore we nevermore
May find a scene as bright
As the gladsome scene of college days,
For the stream oft flows in darksome ways.

We love to pass through the campus grass,
'Neath the elm and cedar shade.
We love to stroll on the grassy knoll
And watch the daylight fade,
And the college bell as the shadows fall
Proclaims a victory won at ball.

The moonlight gleams with its silver beams
On the vines and rugged walls,
And the soft lights stray like a dream of day,
Through the leaves where the night bird calls,

And on the breeze, from the farther side
Of the "Shunganung," the echoes ride.

But years must pass and scenes must change,
And the campus elms must die,
And newer days with faces strange,
Must pass where the shadows lie,
While Washburn's halls grow old and gray,
Where the mosses cling and old vines stray.

Those halls themselves must pass away,
And newer buildings rise,
And ages pass and stones decay,
With broken human ties.
While generations come and go,
As the tides of ocean ebb and flow.

But the mind that in these halls gave birth
To genius, ne'er can die,
For knowledge rules the lords of earth,
Tho' centuries may fly.
And the soul that lives for its fellow-men
Can never sink to the dust again.

be expected in the halls of Cotner during the coming year.

Christian University.

Canton, Mo.

For fifty years the school has been educating the sons and daughters of the church. The results have been most gratifying. More than 500 ministers of the gospel have received instruction, while those students who did not become ministers are usually leaders in the congregations of which they are members. The student preachers, while still in college, usually report from 700 to 800 conversions annually and the good they are doing is incalculable.

Christian University, like all our schools, has had its periods of depression and hardships, but all these have been safely passed, because of the loyalty of the students, faculty and board of trustees.

Last year was a striking example of this. The session opened under the most favorable conditions. The University building had been thoroughly renovated and refurnished at an expense of about $4,000. The attendance was 50 per cent larger than during the preceding session, 37 of the students were in the ministerial department and confidence had been completely restored, when, on the afternoon of March 23, fire completely destroyed the noble building that had done service for just fifty years. Within ten days after the fire, the citizens of Canton had subscribed $15,000 for a new building; the insurance had been collected, other subscriptions had been and are being secured from the friends of the university, plans for a larger and more modern structure were made and sadness gave place to hope. The old building contained 16 rooms, the new one will contain 27, including a chapel with 400 seats, a library, a museum, three laboratories for biology, chemistry and physics respectively; a gymnasium for women, a gymnasium for men, social rooms, study rooms and enough class rooms to accommodate our present faculty of 14 members. The build-

BIT HIM.

If It Had Been a Bear.

Sometimes it is good to be in a position where you can turn around to your shelves and take down food that is a rebuilder and life saver. A prominent grocer of Murrysville, Pa., had heard so many of his customers praising the food Grape-Nuts that he finally gave it a trial himself. He says: "For several years up to 16 months ago I was hardly fit for business from indigestion which also affected my head. My brain was dull and I could hardly keep my books.

"One day I heard one of my customers praising the food Grape-Nuts so highly that I wondered if it would fit my case, so I took a package from the shelf and said that I would use it, and even if it failed I would not be much the loser.

"But before I had finished that one package such a change came over me that I thought it wonderful, and by the time three packages had been eaten I had changed so you would not believe it if I told you about it. My head grew clear and my mind strong, and my memory was very much improved and I was well in every respect. I can only give you a faint idea of all the good the food has done me. It is all I eat for supper nowadays, and the rest of my family think as much of it as I do. Truly it is a great food, and if it were not a great food it would not have done me so much good and have such a tremendous sale in my store." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

ing is to be heated by steam, lighted by electricity, thoroughly equipped with electric bells, speaking tubes and all other modern conveniences. The contract for the entire building was let more than a month ago, and we expect to occupy the new structure early in the fall.

The work of the university was not interrupted for a single day by the fire. Four of the churches in Canton were generously tendered us, and the work went on as if nothing had happened. Not a single student left us because of the fire. Seven students were graduated from the full course in June. The next session will open on Sept. 22. CARL JOHANN, President.

Disciples' Divinity House.

University of Chicago.

The total attendance of ministerial students in the Disciples' Divinity House for the year just closed was 50. Of this number three graduated with the D. B. degree, and one with the A. M. The income available for operating expenses amounted to about $1,500. New gifts to the institution for the year amount to $1,500; $500 was given to reduce indebtedness.

The institution is hopeful that at least $50,000 will be given for endowment, and $50,000 for fellowships and buildings before the centennial celebration.

ERRETT GATES, Secretary.

Eureka College.

Eureka, Ill.

The attendance of students in Eureka College during the past year was eleven per cent greater than that of the year before. There has been a steady gain in the attendance for the past four years. Of the graduates from the collegiate department this year seven are ministers of the gospel. One of them is a colored man, Henry A. Cotterell, who goes back to his native Jamaica to preach and teach among his people. He is able, energetic and scholarly, and we expect to hear a good account of him in that field. Another, John M. Horne takes up the work with the church in Brockton, Mass. Wm. H. Kindred goes to Michigan to enter the service of the state missionary board. Robert H. Newton, who won the prize in the Illinois Intercollegiate Oratorical contest last year, goes to take the pastorate of the church in Chester, England. Orlen L. Smith becomes the pastor of the church at Flanagan, Ill., and B. S. Wray, of the church at Lanark. Rollin D. McCoy will enter upon a year of special study, and will then go to the foreign field as a teacher, under the direction of the F. C. M. S. Another of the class, J. D. Deihl, goes to Germany for a two years' course in the German language and literature, to prepare himself for teaching.

It will be seen by the above that a large proportion of the class, 14 in all, go at once into the work of preaching or of Christian education. This is true of the classes of former years in a remarkable degree. Space will not allow the mention of all who are filling pulpits, or of those who are occupying important positions as teachers. More than eighty of the alumni of Eureka College are now actively engaged in preaching, and scores of others are so engaged who received their education in her walls, but did not, for various reasons, complete the course. Seven of her graduates and several other of her children are laboring as missionaries in the foreign fields.

The work during the past year was satisfactory, both as regards the industry and progress of the students, and the freedom from insubordination and rowdiness. "College spirit" manifested itself in most honorable and amiable ways—such, for example, as the voluntary making of about eighty dollars worth of cement walk on the campus by the senior class. The work of the literary societies is carried on with an enthusiasm which has put Eureka College first in the intercollegiate oratorical contests almost uninterruptedly for the past seven years.

The prospect for attendance next year indicates that there will be a larger increase over this year than was the attendance of this year over that of last year. More friends of the college are bestirring themselves in her behalf than ever before. The membership of the Illinois Christian Educational Association is rapidly growing, and the entrance of J. G. Waggoner upon the work of its field secretary inspires universal hope and confidence.

B. J. RADFORD.

Hamilton College.

Lexington, Ky.

Hamilton College has just closed a most successful year, having had a fine attendance and graduating an academic class of 36 students—the largest in its history.

Beginning with July 1, 1903, the interests of Hamilton College and Kentucky University will be allied. This does not mean that Hamilton College is to be merged into Kentucky University. It does not mean co-education for Hamilton in any sense. Hamilton is to remain a separate institution, distinct and apart, with its own buildings, its own faculty, its own graduating class. It simply means co-operation between two established institutions.

By this combination both colleges can be greatly strengthened in their work. A far higher grade of instruction can be given at Hamilton College than has ever been given before. University professors will offer courses of instruction at Hamilton to the young ladies of that institution, professors who are able to command salaries that could never be paid at Hamilton College.

The young ladies will have these advantages without additional expense. They will also have access, always under the strict chaperonage of their instructors, to the libraries, laboratories, gymnasium, and other equipment of a large university plant. This will give the opportunity of a high grade of collegiate instruction, always under the close supervision of their professors and always with the additional advantages of the same strict seclusion which they have hitherto possessed.

This plan means that the standard of work done will be elevated and the young woman who finishes the course at Hamilton can take full credit for what she has done if she desires to pursue more advanced work in the University or in eastern colleges.

The outlook for the future of Hamilton under the presidency of Mrs. Luella Wilcox St. Clair, is most promising. The school has just issued its

The Truth About Coffee.

It must be regarded as a convincing test when a family of seven has used Postum for 5 years, regaining health and keeping healthy and strong on this food drink.

This family lives in Millville, Mass., and the lady of the household says: "For eight years my stomach troubled me all the time. I was very nervous and irritable, and no medicine helped me.

"I had about given up hope until 5 years ago next month I read an article about Postum Cereal Coffee that convinced me that coffee was the cause of all my troubles. I made the Postum carefully and liked it so much I drank it in preference to coffee, but without much faith that it would help me.

"At the end of a month, however, I was surprised to find such a change in my condition. I was stronger in every way, less nervous, and at the end of 6 months I had recovered my strength so completely that I was able to do all of my own housework. Because of the good Postum did us I knew that what you claimed for Grape-Nuts must be true, and we have all used that delicious food ever since it first appeared on the market.

"We have 7 in our family and I do the work for them all, and I am sure that I owe my strength and health to the steady use of your fine cereal food and Postum (in place of coffee.) I have such great faith in Postum that I have sent it to my relatives, and I never lose a chance to speak well of it." Name furnished by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Ice cold Postum with a dash of lemon is a delightful "cooler" for warm days.

News From Many Fields

Louisiana.

The seventh annual convention of the Disciples of Christ met in Baton Rouge June 16-19. This was the largest and most enthusiastic convention ever held by our people in this state. The growth of the work in Louisiana during the past year has been marvelous, and there were abundant grounds for rejoicing. Over 500 additions, and nearly $15,000 raised for all purposes. This is a glorious report for such a difficult field as Louisiana, and where we have only about a dozen churches. When the convention last year adjourned to meet with the Christian church at Baton Rouge (where we at that time had no congregation) some of our brethren in other states asked if it were presumption or faith. Later developments have shown that it was unbounded faith, for we sent our evangelists there, and when the convention assembled it found them holding the fort with 62 additions and the meeting only in the height of its interest. A splendid, centrally located lot has been purchased with the assistance of the church extension board for $3,000, and the individuals in attendance upon the convention made the young congregation a present of over $1,800 as a starter on their building fund. Our program was splendid, such persons as Benj. L. Smith, G. W. Muckley, G. A. Faris, Jno. Dearborn, Geo. L. Snively, and Miss Bertha Mason delivering addresses.

According to precedent and now established policy, the convention adjourned to meet next year with the Christian church at Alexander, where we have at present no congregation at all.

New York Notes.

While we have not as many churches in the empire state as in some others, yet we rejoice in the fact that every church in the state save one, is a missionary church and in co-operation with the New York Christian Missionary Society. A church planted in New York means something for our cause, and the large growth of our brotherhood here in proportion to the membership shows what may be done in the east. It is not because the east is too conservative, but because we have been too conservative that we have not more churches here. This state has one-tenth of the population of the United States and is the grandest mission field in America. We send missionaries to heathen lands and pay their expenses (God speed the day when we shall send tenfold more). The Lord seems to look upon our solicitation for the heathen with great favor, for he is putting it into the hearts of millions of them to come to this country at their own expense. But when they are at our door we forget we have a duty to them. There are thousands upon thousands in New York state who are as ignorant of the gospel as the Hottentot. There are many thousands more who are ignorant of the simplicity for which we plead. To neglect a great, strategic and needy field like New York with its teeming millions, for fields with one-tenth the population is as irrational as for a woman to sacrifice a good, warm winter coat that she may wear a boa about her neck. There are 104 towns and cities in New York with a population from 3,000 to 100,000 that have no congregation of Disciples.

We could fill both Chicago and Philadelphia with people in New York who have no opportunity of hearing our plea. The city of New York contains one million more inhabitants than the state of Missouri. That great city has but six congregations of Disciples of Christ, while Missouri has nearly seventeen hundred. If our plea is right, it is rightest where there are the most people to be reached by it. Let us not become self-satisfied with the growth in the central states. May our eyes be opened to the great Macedonian cry of the east! Come over and help us!

Your correspondent is making a tour of the churches in New York in the interest of an onward movement in aggressive evangelism.

We rejoice to learn that the receipts for foreign missions have gained $15,000 during the first eight months of the year. If $7,000 more is gained between now and Sept. 30, the coveted $200,000 will be reached. It ought to be reached. With the resources we have it ought to be doubled. I received a letter from a friend who is pastor of a United Presbyterian church the other day. His congregation averaged $4.50 per member for missions last year. The missionary spirit ought to increase in proportion as people attain more of the truth. We believe we have our vision cleared for the truth. Let us remember that the New Testament church was on fire for the evangelization of the world. For clear vision to see that truth I fear we can neither claim originality nor pre-eminence. If we could the members of our faithful home board, would not now have such a great burden of anxiety on their hearts for fear the home work will have to suffer retrenchment.

The June meeting for central New York was held at Pompey, June 12-14. Both the meeting and the fellowship were exceptional. It was a two days' feast of good things. Bro. A. B. Chamberlain, our pioneer preacher who has been in the ministry 40 years, was the life of the meeting. He is a young man of 72 summers and can preach the gospel with power and freshness. We were greatly edified by his splendid sermon on "Be ye Perfect."

The church at Syracuse, W. D. Ryan, pastor, began a mission last Lord's day with 53 present at Sunday-school. This looks like a good opening for a new church.

The church at Gloversville is in a good meeting with W. J. Wright, eastern evangelist.

The South Butler church where F. H. Reed is pastor, reports nine additions recently.

The writer is visiting the churches of the state in the interest of a new evangelistic effort and increased loyalty to state work. Will begin a meeting at Cato July 5.

All aboard for Wellsville for the state convention, Sept. 24-28.

STEPHEN J. COREY, Cor. Sec.

Ohio.

Accusation was made in a recent letter against West Virginia, for getting two of our Ohio preachers. We have "got back" at them once. J. F. Stone, of Huntington, W. Va., has packed his effects and told the railroad to take them to Findlay, O., where he will begin his pastorate July 12. We congratulate Findlay and heartily welcome Brother Stone.

Geo. A. Ragan, our new state evangelist, closed the McConnellsville meeting June 22, with 48 additions, thus making 72 members in the new church. He goes to Byesville July 12, to begin a tent meeting, in which J. E. Hawes will donate the singing. After this a similar effort will be made at Caldwell. Building enterprises will be launched at both places.

R. W. Abberley and C. A. Freer preached farewell sermons at Columbus last Sunday. They came to Columbus at the same time over five years ago. Then there were two churches with about 650 members. Now there are four churches with about 1,100 members. Next Sunday Brother Abberley will begin at Portland Avenue, Minneapolis, and C. A. Freer at Collinwood.

H. C. Boblitt, who preaches half time at Wellston, will give the other half to the church at McArthur.

Bellefontaine recently entertained the national German Baptist or Dunkard Conference. The attendance ran into the thousands. These people are simple and whole-hearted Christians, but they have some very peculiar notions. Much time was consumed discussing the orthodoxy of a sack or frock coat, bonnets, beards, etc. High collars for men were "turned down." Life insurance was branded as dangerous. Photographs were condemned as steps toward idolatry, yet the local papers had no trouble in finding half-tone cuts in the preacher's grips. The poor working men of Denmark were advised not to join labor unions till the standing committee could investigate trades unions. Just what these men are to do for bread during the year of investigation was not settled. These people are honest to a fault and pay as they go, but spend no money unnecessarily. They are in the world, but not of the world, and glory in the fact till it almost becomes idolatry. Missouri gets the next conference.

A. Martin, of Muncie, Ind., will supply at the Central Church in Columbus during July.

C. A. FREER.

Collinwood, O.

South Dakota.

The Lord's work at Miller is in good condition at present. There has been one confession since our last report; four in all since we began our work. Our Bible school is taking up the second revival plan, having completed the first, with its membership doubled. The C. E. is wide awake. The ladies' auxiliaries are doing good work. Our audiences are encouraging. Bro. J. A. Seaton, of Brookings, delivered one of his splendid lectures, "That Boy," here recently, which was well accepted by those who heard him. The writer delivered the memorial address in the Opera House to a large and appreciative audience. We are improving our parsonage and will soon begin remodeling our house of worship.

I have been absent in a two weeks' meeting at Highmore, closing June 21. The church is without a pastor, as Bro. H. B. Baldwin has resigned his work there. Notwithstanding a smallpox scare, sickness and three deaths, and a commencement exercise we had a good meeting, and left the brethren in good spirits; one confession. They will call a pastor soon.

Bro. Burt Dawson has taken up the work at Wessington. The brethren are well pleased with his labors, and we expect good reports from that church in the future.

Bro. Howard Sweetman and wife are visiting Mrs. Sweetman's parents here. We are planning for an early meeting this fall.

Miller, S. D.

A. O. SWARTWOOD.

Nebraska.

G. J. Chapman reports additions at York every Lord's day for six weeks last past. Number not given. Brother Chapman was re-elected corresponding secretary of District No. 6. Out of a district apportionment of $21.30, he collected $19.34. No. 6 is the only district that has paid more than the apportionment of the churches for state work.

Edward Clutter is working in the interests of Corner University this summer. He baptized a lady at Blue Springs on the 18th. J. E. Wilson, of Wilber, will visit Wymore soon. E. J. Sias and F. McVey are in a rousing meeting at Exeter. They had to leave the church and go to the opera house for room.

District No. 6 held a very interesting convention at Exeter, and No. 5 the same week at Belvidere. Both districts are asking for some changes in missionary districts. This is needed in all the western part of the state. Bro. D. G. Wagner, of Chester, is the new corresponding secretary of No. 5. Work was planned for the early fall or late summer. No. 4 will be in session at Magnet, beginning June 26.

The secretary assisted at the dedication at Overton on the 14th. Attended both conventions of Nos. 5 and 6. Presented state work at Broken Bow on the 21st. Will attend Iowa state convention and be at Magnet on the 28th.

June 30 will close the missionary year 1902-3, and another will be opened July 1. It has been a good year. There has been much work done, and yet there was more to be done. The cry for work to be done has not abated. Apparently the demand will never be satisfied. But in the meantime we are doing the Lord's will. Send up an offering for state work. We have paid our bills throughout the year. We want to go up to the convention with a report that says no debt hangs over us. The pastor of the church at Beatrice says that if other churches will join them, that congregation will assist in bringing up the deficit that now seems pending. This church has already given the most of any church in the state. This double giving will not be necessary if the churches that have done nothing or only a portion of apportionments, will come to the front and do their duty. It is a sad situation when congregations will allow other and often weaker churches to do a work that they should do.

Now for the state convention. Let us keep talking about it. The date is Aug. 4-9. The place is Bethany Camp Grounds. The railroad fare will be as follows: For all places within 200 miles of Lincoln, one fare plus 50 cents. Where this extra 50 cents would make it one and one-third fare, that will be the rate. That is, from all points 50 miles and less from Lincoln the fare will be one and one-third for the round trip. No certificate required. On sale Aug. 4-12, and good to return till the 14th. Transfer to the grounds from Lincoln will cost 15 cents each way. Baggage at reasonable rates. Tents and cots at the usual price for the week. The program is going to be fine. The grove is in excellent condition, and the outlook is for good weather.

The ministerial institute begins July 20 at Cotner. W. J. Lhamon and W. P. Aylsworth are the principal lecturers. Preachers and others interested in Bible study will find this a most profitable place to be. Tuition is $2 per week. Board will be 15 cents per meal at the dormitory. Room rent will be as reasonable as one could ask. W. A. BALDWIN.

Indian Territory.

Our last notes left us at Purcell, the last congregation on the Santa Fe road to the north. Across the river from Purcell, is Lexington, O. T. This congregation is out of our territory; but the peculiar conditions seem to us to make it our duty to look after this work. There has been a congregation at this place for years, but it has always had more or less dissension, and of late years become more intense, and that about questions that ought not to trouble the church. Now, in view of this, it was decided to see what could be done. The first of April it was arranged to hold a meeting here. The C. P. Church was secured and the meeting began. It resulted in the organization of an active church, not only on the apostolic foundation, but with the apostolic spirit as well, and now all seems to be harmonious. They will have a new house of worship. We have at Lexington some of as good people as can be found anywhere; one by one we are bringing into line our churches in the Indian Territory. We are hoping and praying for the time to come when we will know no more of this spirit of strife and contention, for nothing stands so much in the way of the progress of our church as the unholly bickerings among ourselves.

In the country lying between the Santa Fe and Frisco, we have a great many good people, but most of them are what we call "antis;" oppose all our efforts to extend the truth in any co-operative way, and this adds greatly to the burden of building up the work in the territory.

At Madill, on the south, is our first church on the Frisco. Here we have a great many good people. They were organized about one year ago, and have lately employed Brother Walker, of Texas, to preach for them half the time. This church is cooperating with the church at Roff in the employment of Brother Walker.

At Roff is one of our young churches, but very active. They are in perfect harmony, and have perfect confidence in their leader, and he will do them good.

At Ada is our next church on this line. Bro. H. O. Breeden, of Arkansas, preaches for this congregation, and all seem to be doing well. He has only been there about six weeks. We have many good people here, and with the right conditions will grow into a strong church.

We come now to Holdenville, a good town, a good church house, and many good people. This is the home of our brother, M. T. McConnell. He is one of our Indian Territory bankers who ought to be preaching; but making himself very useful in the establishment of the church at this place. This is one of the congregations of the territory now looking for a pastor.

On this line of road we have eight churches, but only two houses of worship—the ones at Ada and Holdenville. Besides the towns named above, we have churches at Weleetka, Okmulgee, Mounds and Sapulpa. At the first we have a man, Brother Teener, preaching for the congregation all his time. He is a good man and the kind we need in our Indian Territory churches. He is not afraid to soil his hands if it is necessary to make the work go on. He is a success now. The churches at the other three places are at this time without pastors; but we hope soon to have them supplied, and when they are, will have some good work. In the church at Weleetka, we have the Blackman family, late of Marysville, Mo. They are bankers. At Okmulgee, we have a Brother Smith, one of the prominent bankers of the territory. We also have at this place, Bro. W. W. Wood, from Warrensburg, Mo. At Mounds we have many good people. The same is true of Sapulpa; but we will have more to say of these churches when we have pastors located, which we hope to have soon.

Prof. Erwin W. McDiarmid, a son of the lamented H. McDiarmid, of Hiram, Ohio, and Miss Allie May McCorkle, were married at Eminence on Thursday afternoon, June 18. Both are teachers in the school at Morehead. We join with their many Kentucky friends in congratulations and best wishes.

W. M. Baker, of Glasgow, recently closed a good meeting at Burkesville. He is now being assisted in a meeting at home by Mark Collis, of the Broadway Church, Lexington.

The church at Owingsville is in the midst of splendid meetings with home forces. W. Kent Pendleton is their efficient preacher.

Our central Kentucky preaching force has recently been greatly strengthened by the addition of two well-known preachers, viz.: Carey E. Morgan, who has recently come from Richmond, Va., to the Paris church, and Philip F. King, who comes from Henderson and Carlisle. Both have begun work under favorable circumstances. We welcome them to the Blue Grass.

Twenty-five young preachers from the College of the Bible will spend a part of their vacation in special evangelistic work in the mountain portion of our state. A number are already at work. We look for splendid results from their labors.

E. L. Powell and wife, of Louisville, left this week for a three months' trip through Europe. We understand the trip is a gift from his congregation.

Pres. J. W. McGarvey, of Lexington, will supply the pulpit of the Broadway Church, Louisville, at the Sunday morning service during the months of July and August.

A strenuous effort is now being made by the friends of our College of the Bible to raise the amount necessary for the endowment of the McGarvey chair of sacred history within the next 90 days. The faithful financial secretary, M. D. Clubb, should have the hearty support of all the "old boys" in this glorious work—in fact, every member of our great brotherhood should make a contribution to this fund. Have you subscribed as yet? If not, send a contribution at once to Bro. M. D. Clubb, Midway, Ky., and get others to do the same.

A rally was held in the Broadway Church, Louisville, on the 14th inst., in the interest of the College of the Bible endowment. Over $1,000 was subscribed for the McGarvey chair of sacred history.

We are glad to see the increase in our foreign mission offerings this year. If the preachers and members of our various congregations and our Sunday-schools will put forth a little extra exertion, the coveted $200,000 will certainly be raised.

W. S. Cash has resigned at Bardstown.

D. F. Stafford, of Louisville, recently assisted A. T. Felix in a very helpful meeting at Springfield. GEO. W. KEMPER.

Dedication at Long Point, Illinois.

Long Point is a thriving town on the Santa Fe railroad, located in one of the richest farming communities in the rich garden state of Illinois. The church has just completed a beautiful modern house of worship, which on Lord's day, June 21, we dedicated to almighty God, free from debt. Bro. M. L. Pontius, a young man of great worth, is the very acceptable pastor of the church.

Brethren Spencer and Robertson, of Ancona, Smith, of Flanagan, and Dean, of Taluca, were at the dedication. They report their respective churches as flourishing. Brother Parvin, pastor of the U. P. Church in Long Point, took up his services both morning and night, and attended the dedication.

The weather was ideal; the attendance very large; the singing and music excellent; the giving generous, and the joy at the success in providing for the debt was great.

Saul Chosen King. Sam. 10:17-27.

Read 9:1-10:27.

Memory Verses 23-25.

Golden Text:—"The Lord is our King, he will save us."—Isaiah 32:22.

Samuel, as instructed by Jehovah, announced to Israel that their petition for a king had been granted. The prophet still viewed this change in the administration as a departure from the pure theocracy of the old regime. It was recognized that under kings the theocracy would be modified and limited by political exigencies and to this extent the sovereignty of Jehovah would be rejected. The situation may be compared in some respects to the beginning of the temporal power of the papacy. When the papacy had developed into complete political independence and sovereignty it became in a large degree the creature of political circumstance. So, when the priestly nation of Israel took on the forms of secular government, it secularized itself and interfered with the working out of its mission to the best advantage. Yet God used some of the kings of Israel as he used some of the popes, and much more signally.

Saul is introduced by a simple incident which gives a picture of Israel's internal condition at this time. It is the narrative of Saul's search for the lost asses (chap. 9.)

The story of the visit to the seer (9:6 foll.) indicates some of the functions of that personage. He was a finder of lost articles; in general, a discernor of hidden things for the convenience of private individuals, as well as an interpreter and announcer of the will of God to the public. When he performed a private service a fee was expected (9:7-8.) The seer was the forerunner of the prophet, as is parenthetically explained (9:9.) The parenthesis which explains that the word "seer" was in early times equivalent to the later word "prophet," is either a later addition to the narrative or else is an indication that the narrative itself is of considerably later date than the events which it describes. The sacrifice on a high place outside the city (9:12) shows that the worship was not yet settled in its centralized form.

Samuel warned in advance by Jehovah, received and entertained Saul, assured him at once that the objects of his search had already been found and turned his mind to loftier themes. The hint of political advancement (9:20) was received by Saul with becoming modesty.

The following morning as Saul started on his journey, Samuel took him apart where no one might witness the ceremony and anointed him. This anointment did not make Saul king of Israel. Anointment was a very common ceremony among the Hebrews and had many meanings; its most general religious meaning was dedication to God. Jacob anointed the stones at Bethel (Gen. 28:18); the tabernacle was anointed (Ex. 30:26); the priests were anointed (Lev. 8:12); Elijah was told to anoint Elisha to be a prophet (1 Kings 19:16). In Saul's case it was a setting apart to the service of Jehovah, and its purpose was not to confer upon him the kingship, but to show him that the political office which he would later receive was to be fundamentally religious.

As a special sign of the divine presence, Saul was given for a single occasion the prophetic inspiration and he joined the band of prophets whom he met (10:6-12). Just what their prophesying consisted in, it is impossible to say. Very likely it was some form of ecstatic utterance similar to the New Testament gift of tongues. The important feature of it was that it was accepted as a sure indication of the presence of the spirit of Jehovah.

The assembly met at Samuel's call at Mizpah. The name means "high place" or "watch tower" and there were several places of that name. This one was probably near Samuel's residence at Ramah, just north of Jerusalem. After another protest against the establishment of monarchy, the choice was made, probably by lot, as this was considered to represent the will of God, first among the tribes, then among the families of the chosen tribe, then among the individuals of the chosen family; and the choice fell upon Saul.

Saul was brought out of his modest retirement and hailed as king, but he was not yet really inducted into office. He had yet to prove his fitness for the kingship. The kingdom does not start off with great eclat and a complete organization. Samuel dismissed the assembly and the people went home. So apparently did the king-elect. The old regime went on until there was actually something for the king to do. Then at once he took command and became king de facto as well as de jure.

Lesson Thoughts. Political power may be a doubtful blessing for a nation, and worldly power may be a doubtful blessing for a man.

God uses some means of which he does not wholly approve. He is represented as disapproving of a monarchy yet he chose and blessed the king. We can afford to co-operate with people with whom we differ even on important points if the cause of right may be advanced thereby.

The new king set a good example to his people and made a good start for his reign by not allowing his head to be turned by sudden advancement.

The Teaching Function of the Church.

The ever-increasing estimate in which Bible-school work is held by those who are endeavoring to bring the world to Christ and build the Christian up in Christ, is only another evidence of the trend of the times back to apostolic Christianity. The teaching function of the church is one which during the dark ages was ignored, and which even to-day is too little regarded. The great word has been, "Preach the gospel," and the preacher has been the center of the activities of the church. So much has this been the case that without the preacher we have thought we could not have "church." We might have a prayer-meeting, a song service, a social, a Sunday-school, at the house of the Lord without the preacher, but if he was not present, we had no "church." It is not strange, therefore, with this taint of Romanism upon us, that everything about the house and the work generally was arranged with the preacher as the center. Our houses are auditoriums in which he may preach, rather than school-houses in which the people might be taught. The church assembles, not to search the Scriptures, but to hear the preacher preach. The Bible-school, in many cases, is not even considered a church service, and it is not expected, in any way, that the church members should be present. This session is for the boys and girls. Of course, if any church member chooses to attend, it is all right, but no obligation to attend is acknowledged by the membership; and no obligation to "teach" except by the lecture process of the pulpit, is considered of authority by either elders or preachers. In this respect there needs to be a restoration of the primitive order, which provided that all nations should be made "disciples," that these disciples should be taught, and made it a requirement of the elders that they be "apt to teach."—J. H. Bryan, in Iowa Bible-School Year Book.

The Help of the Holy Spirit.—John 16:5-15.

The presence and help of the Holy Spirit represents the continual and abiding presence of God in the hearts and lives of men. The Spirit is not to be thought of as merely a vague influence but as a person—yet a person nearer to us than any human person can ever be and dwelling in our hearts and ruling our lives if we will but let him.

The guidance of the Holy Spirit is God's way of helping his children to grow in grace and in the knowledge of the truth. Jesus said, "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now." We are born into the kingdom as spiritual babes, having the spark of a life that is from above, but weak and almost helpless, lacking in strength and wisdom and unable yet to understand the deeper things of God or even the hard facts of our own experience. The spiritual world seems full of mysteries and contradictions. Some of its facts seem to us incredible; others useless, for our outlook upon it is as the outlook of a child upon a world full of strange things which he cannot yet understand.

It is the province of the Holy Spirit to lead the children of God by a gradual but steady growth up through the stages of infancy, childhood and adolescence to spiritual maturity in the fullness of the stature of Christ and to bring to him one by one those things which the Master said he had in store for his disciples, but which they were not at first able to receive.

By what means does the Holy Spirit thus act as the agent and instrument of Christian growth? First, through the word of God inspired by the Spirit of God, which conveys to men a revelation of divine truth so profound and so perfect that men may grow by feeding upon it, but may never outgrow it. But Christian growth means more than a growing knowledge of facts about God or of the will and purpose of God. It includes a spirit of willingness to do his will and to be used in the carrying out of his purposes. It includes also the ability to interpret the experiences of our own lives in the light of God's purposes.

Jesus spoke of the Holy Spirit as the comforter, a term full of hope and reassurance. We all need a comforter at times and a comforter is always a strengthener and encourager and in some sense a teacher. We need to be taught how to view the changing fortunes of life from the standpoint of the eternal realities. To learn this lesson is to be comforted in misfortune, encouraged in despair and strengthened in the hour of weakness. And this is the lesson which the Holy Spirit is ever ready to teach through the inspired word, through the lives of the good and great men of this and other times, and through the experiences of our own lives. To be so comforted and strengthened and encouraged by the larger outlook upon the world of real things and by a closer communion with the heart of God is to become more devoted and a more efficient minister of men in the common ways of life.

Putting the Heart into Things.—2 Chron. 31:20, 21; Matt. 18:23-35; Acts 8:36-38, Col. 3:23, 24.

Coldness and formality may have a place, but that place is not in the life of a Christian. Disciples of Christ are not running a refrigerator line. The gospel had its birth in the throbbing heart of infinite love, and there must be warmth, vitality, heartiness, in every newly begotten soul.

The churches of to-day have been criticised for lack of heartiness. Mr. G. Campbell Morgan says they are passionless. May it not indeed be that the tendency to formalism has been permitted to seal the fountains of sympathy and smother the fires of love? It is an old proverb—"Whatever is worth doing at all is worth doing well." If religion is worth anything, it is worth everything. It ought to inspire every atom of a man's being.

What are some of the elements of heartiness? 1. Strong conviction. One must be fully persuaded of the truth of what he believes. Nothing must be left misty and dubious. It is not so much having convictions, as convictions having him. 2. Undivided loyalty. There is room in the human heart for many objects of affection, but only one can be supreme. Is that one Lord of all? 3. Deep feeling. Some do not consider it "good form" to feel deeply, and so they cultivate a shallowness of nature. But there are times when not to feel deeply is not to be a man. 4. Energy of action. "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." Every right action should be energetic. If it is right to sing, put your heart into your voice. Give energetically, that is, generously, gladly. Embark into every worthy enterprise with energy. 5. Sincere affection. This is the capital quality. All that you do ought to be under the sweet constraint of love.

The immense value of intensity may never be fully realized. While one who fights the battles of the Christian life with flaming energy may be occasionally defeated, he cannot be permanently defeated. But the Meroz disposition will not even fight. 1. He who puts his heart into his religion is saved from many perils. Low vitality invites disease. If your heart was not enlisted in the obedience of faith, retrace your steps, and live again those first days. 2. You will be saved from neglect of the means of growth. "How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?" 3. You will avoid covetousness and all forms of carnality. If the heart is fixed on God, mammon cannot lure you, nor will you burn incense at the altars of pride.

A degree of earnestness which enlists the whole heart will enable you to endure. Hardships come, sorrows come, defeats come, but none of these will move you. And again, putting the heart into things will make every service fruitful. They prosper who serve God with their whole heart, as did Hezekiah in his beneficent work for Israel (2 Chron. 31:20, 21). The testimony of the church will be mightily strengthened. "We are witnesses," but a hesitating, wavering, forgetful witness injures a cause more than he helps it. Of such testimony we want none.

Laodicean lukewarmness chills the church and postpones the redemption of the world. We can bring ourselves into an atmosphere of enkindling warmth by observing its conditions, by looking to the source of all life and power. We must seek to be "strengthened with power through his Spirit in the inward man." Every period of striking activity in the history of the church since Pentecost has been signalized by deep devotion, by steadfast reliance on the Spirit of God. There may be a species of enthusiasm without the animating Spirit, but it will not compare in effectiveness and beauty with that which is divinely derived.

Prayer.

From the cold rigor of death thou hast brought us, O God, to glorify Thee in service and sacrifice. We bless Thy name for spiritual resurrection, and we would receive in still larger measure of Thy life. Deepen every channel of pure affection, and fill us with Thy love. Make us earnest, genuine, heroic, steadfast, until the jubilant shout of victory, through Jesus Christ our mighty Captain. Amen.

Our Budget

—Here we are in our new-old form, slightly changed in appearance, but the same in spirit, aim and principles.

—If you like the form and contents of the paper and are willing to help us to circulate it, now is the time to say so.

—Read what the brethren say, elsewhere. A paper deserving such compliments ought to have the hearty assistance of its readers in extending its circulation.

—The problem of doubling the circulation of a paper is easily solved by each reader sending one new subscriber. See premium offered to old subscribers for a new one until the end of the year.

—We hope this number, presenting the claims of our colleges, will be carefully and fully read by all who are interested in our future development. We cannot permanently succeed without well-endowed colleges.

—The large amount of educational matter we publish this week, prevents us from giving a fair exhibit of the various departments of the paper, which it will ordinarily contain. Some of the departments which we have hitherto had to omit or greatly condense, will receive due space in our present form.

—J. A. Canby, of Cameron, W. Va., began work June 21, with the Memorial Church, Ann Arbor, Mich.

—The whereabouts of C. A. Bentley, formerly of Sedan, Kan., is inquired by C. N. Brinkerhoff, also of Sedan, Kan.

—Frank H. Marshall, of Texas Christian University, is spending the summer with the church at Spencer Brook, Minn.

—William A. Ward, of Goshen, Ind., has accepted a unanimous call from the Park Church, New Albany, Ind., to begin July 5.

—D. R. Bebout delivered the baccalaureate sermon to the graduating class of Austin College, Effingham, Ill. The subject was "Drifting."

—The twenty-first annual session of the Northfield General Conference for Christian workers will meet at Northfield, Mass., July 31-Aug. 16.

—Edgar D. Jones, of Erlanger, Ky., has accepted a call to the Franklin Circle Church, Cleveland, O., where he will begin the pastorate Sept. 1.

—John Williams, who lately resigned the pastorate at Missouri Valley, Ia., supplied the pulpit of the Jackson Boulevard Church at Chicago, June 8.

—G. W. Muckley addressed the state conventions of Texas, Louisiana and Iowa during the month of June on the subject of Church Extension, and conducted a missionary rally at Paola, Kans.

—T. A. Lindenmeyer has resigned at Saybrook, Ill., and began the pastorate at Goldfield, Ia., June 28. He delivered the decoration day address at Goldfield and the memorial sermon to the Odd Fellows, June 14.

—T. L. Lowe, of Athens, O., delivered the annual commencement sermon at the Ohio State University and received the degree of D. D. This is the oldest educational institution in the state of Ohio.

—W. M. White preached the convention sermon at the recent state Christian Endeavor convention at San Diego, Cal., and also delivered an address on "Boys and Girls in Service for Christ and the Church."

—W. H. Kindred has moved from Eureka, Ill., to Belding, Mich., to become state and home missionary evangelist, giving half his time to each. His first work will be to organize a congregation and build a house at Belding.

—J. A. Hopkins, of Rockville, Md., writes that he can put a good preacher in correspondence with a place where two or three churches can co-operate and pay full $500. The preacher can live sixteen miles from Washington, D. C., at a point reached by railroad and an electric line.

—Great preparations are being made for the International Endeavor Convention at Denver, July 9-13. The main sessions of the convention will be held in a great tent with a seating capacity of 10,000, which will be pitched at the corner of Detroit St. and E. Colfax Ave.

—S. M. Bernard is succeeding in his new field at Boulder, Col., where there have been about 50 additions at regular services since Jan. 1. The summer Chautauqua begins there July 4. Brother Bernard's little book, "Our Religious Neighbors," has met with an encouraging sale which it well deserves.

—The Worcester (Mass.) Telegram says: Rev. Dr. J. M. Van Horn is unanimously asked to reconsider his resignation as pastor of First Church of Christ.

The Worcester church evidently knows a good pastor when it tries him. We do not blame them for holding on to Brother V. as long as they can.

—The receipts of the Foreign Society these days are very encouraging. It is hoped that every church and Sunday-school and individual will lend a helping hand to insure the $200,000 that we started out to raise at the beginning of the year. If our people give $200,000 this year for world-wide missions, they are not likely to ever give less.

—The returns from Children's Day are encouraging. The receipts for the week ending June 25 amounted to $12,917.78, a gain over the corresponding time last year of $3,272.97. It seems certain that the offerings from the Sunday-schools will go above the $50,000 mark, and it is hoped, will reach at least $60,000. If the schools give $60,000, the $200,000 is sure to be raised this year.

—A sister writes: "I have just finished reading Brother Jones' book, 'The Spiritual Side of Our Plea.' I want to thank him for the comfort it has given me. I had wondered if I were drifting away from our cause, and prayed earnestly for God to enlighten me. I feel I have the answer in this book. I am true to our plea, and it is in harmony with God's word. I will take pleasure in lending the book, especially to those who say we do not believe in the Holy Spirit." Brother Jones' chapter on that subject alone is well worth the price of the book.

—The Christian church at Oxford, Ind., celebrated its semi-centennial, June 21. The pastor, William Grant Smith, had made complete and effective preparation for the celebration, which was largely attended by the people of Roxford and by representatives from the churches in neighboring towns. The church now numbers 252 members and is in a thoroughly healthy condition.

—Last week the Foreign Society received two gifts of $500 each on the annuity plan, one from a friend in Arkansas, and the other from a friend in Ohio. These gifts from aged disciples are a great help to the society in providing buildings on the mission fields. This arrangement provides a certain income during life, and the money goes at once into the service dear to all Christian hearts.

—The Maxinkuckee assembly, in which our brethren in Indiana are much interested, presents an unusually attractive program this year. The Chicago Glee Club, The World's Fair Ladies' Quartet, The Hoosier Quartet, Charles R. Scoville, J. H. O. Smith, J. V. Updike, Prof. Wiles, W. H. Waggoner are among the attractions. Frank C. Huston will have charge of the music. For information address Dr. W. E. Callane, Flora, Ind.

—The quarterly convention held at Troy, Pa., June 18-21, was well attended in spite of the inhospitable weather. About 75 visiting delegates were present. A good program has been prepared and the topics were ably discussed. The next meeting will be at Grover, Pa., in September. L. D. Vosburgh, of Sylva, Va. is president and E. A. Rockwell is secretary. L. S. Harrington is pastor of the church which entertained the convention at Troy.

—J. M. Rudy, of the Jefferson Street Church, Buffalo, N. Y., has accepted a unanimous call from the church at Sedalia, Mo., and will return to Missouri and begin work in his new field about September 1. He writes: "I have had a year of pleasure, profit and of blessing with the Jefferson Street Church of Christ. There are few better and more consecrated people than many in this church." Brother Rudy began his religious life among us, in Missouri, and his friends here will be glad to welcome him back.

—The annuity plan is steadily gaining in popularity among the donors to all of our missionary societies. During a recent visit of B. L. Smith to Texas, S. R. Ezzell and his wife, Mary C. Ezzell, gave to the home society $1,400, being a payment on a gift of $5,000 on the annuity plan, which at the death of the donors will be converted into a named memorial fund. Henry Matley, of Lodi, Cal., has given to the same society $500 on the annuity plan. Ten such annuities have been received within the last two months.

—The sixth district of the Nebraska Christian Missionary Society held its annual meeting at Exeter, June 16 to 18. The convention was helpful from start to finish. The address of welcome was given by the Methodist minister. Ten ministers were present, including our state secretary, state Sunday-school superintendent, and Chancellor Aylsworth, of Cotner University. On the 18th, G. Bingatian, a native convert of Armenia, gave an interesting lecture on that country. The next meeting will be held at York, Neb.

—Joseph W. Folk, of national fame as a prosecutor of criminals, has been solicited by a California brother to pause in his prosecution of boodlers and bribers long enough to prosecute the editor of this paper for printing the official report of the trustees of Berkeley Bible Seminary. Mr. Folk is probably too much engaged otherwise to undertake the task, but no doubt other lawyers will be found wanting a job. Why does not this brother demand an investigation, as we advised him, from his own brethren in California, where he is best known? We would be too glad, as stated, to publish his vindication.

—Hiram Van Kirk, dean of the Berkeley Bible Seminary, has sent us a copy of an article he has also sent to the Christian Standard, replying to the criticism recently reprinted by the Standard from the Church Register of several years ago, touching some lectures delivered by him at Albany, Mo. As our readers have not seen the article from the Register we do not need to print his article, which is an emphatic denial of the correctness of the report of these lectures. In this article Dean Van Kirk calls on the editor of the Standard to meet him with the witnesses, before any tribunal of the Disciples of Christ to substantiate his charges or retract them. Brother VanKirk is no longer on trial. He has been vindicated. The Christian Standard is now on trial, whether it wills or not, at the bar of the conscience of the brotherhood.

—Visitors to the Endeavor Convention at Denver will be heartily welcomed at the Central Christian Church whose new building is located at the corner of 16th and Lincoln avenues. The headquarters for the delegations from Indiana and Japan will be there, the Christian Endeavor museum will be in one of the parlors, and the meals will be served in the dining room.

—George H. Comos, of the Prospect Avenue Christian Church, Kansas City, fainted in his pulpit Sunday night, June 21, at the close of his sermon. He was worn out by constant work in behalf of the flood sufferers during the previous week. He recovered in a few hours. Brother Comos' family had already gone to their summer home at Macatawa, Mich., where he followed them last week.

—A venerable brother whose fame is as wide as the brotherhood, in writing to us concerning a certain religious paper that seems to be suffering from a moral infirmity, lays down this philosophical proposition: "But the paper will never be cured as long as it pays to be sick." Whose business is it to see to it that it does not pay permanently for a religious paper to be morally sick? Will not such sickness become epidemic if it comes to be understood that it pays? We should say that these questions might well receive the serious attention of the brotherhood just now if we are going to maintain a high ethical standard.

—The Assistant Editor had the pleasure of attending the Eureka College commencement this year for the first time since his graduation there eleven years ago. The weather was perfect and the spirit of the whole occasion was such as to fill the hearts of Eureka's friends with joy for the present and hope for the future. The commencement address by W. F. Richardson, of Kansas City, on "The Universal Art," was full of inspiration. President Hieronymous, who had suffered almost a complete relapse the week previous as a result of over-work, was able to preside at the commencement exercises, to the great joy of all. The work of President Hieronymous at Eureka has been of the sterling quality that does not make the greatest immediate showing, but counts most in the long run. Both the president and the college have the complete confidence of the brotherhood of Illinois and it is to be hoped that the Illinois churches will realize in greater measure than ever before how great a service they can do to themselves and to the cause by giving the college a generous support. The financial condition of Eureka is not by any means what it ought to be. Not one of our colleges has anything like an adequate financial basis, but that of Eureka is more obviously and excessively inadequate than any of the other colleges of equal rank. How the college manages to do such work as it does with practically no available income, except the tuition fees, is a mystery. But the fact gives evidence of what they would do if their constituents would support the institution properly. J. G. Waggoner has recently been appointed financial agent for the college. His connection with Eureka has been long and his interest is deep. Those who know him will know that the institution has found a worthy representative, and those who know the college know that Brother Waggoner is pleading a worthy cause when he asks the churches to support Eureka.

BARNES' BUSINESS COLLEGE, St. Louis.

Iowa Convention.

We have just closed the greatest convention in the history of Iowa. The largest attendance. Enthusiasm was at boiling point. All interests of the church were well represented. The educational feature was exceptionally prominent. Our educational committee recommended that the churches of Iowa continue the co-operative plan of securing educational funds. They also established the third Sunday in January as educational day, and urged the churches of the state that had not adopted some co-operative plan to take an offering for Drake University on that day. It has not been the idea in Iowa to appropriate any money meant for other missionary interests to the cause of Christian education, the only purpose being to devise some means whereby our missionary interests and also the educational interests might be properly supported.

The year 1903 is the fiftieth anniversary of the Iowa Christian convention. The convention instructed its educational committee to assist in raising an additional $300,000 endowment for Drake University by that date. Governor Drake was present at the convention for the first time in several years. He was enthusiastically received by the people and seemed to be in excellent spirits. The Iowa people were glad to have Brother Dungan with them in their annual meeting. He conducted a Bible reading each morning at nine o'clock.

The climax of the convention was the address of Dr. Susie J. Rijnhart, who took the place of Brother Rains on the program. At the close of her talk, though it was high noon, and an excellent dinner was waiting in the basement, the audience could not be dismissed until they had raised $500 to supply her with the needed surgical instruments for the hospital in Tibet. Greater enthusiasm was never witnessed before in any missionary gathering of our people. Five volunteered to go with her to that distant land, namely, Brother and Sister S. G. Griffith, of Boone; Brother and Sister Huntley, of Primghar, and Bro. H. H. Hubbell, of Leon. These are among the best workers in Iowa, and if they can pass the medical examination will do honor to the work in the foreign field.

JOEL BROWN.

Bible College of Missouri.

This institution rejoices in a growing and promising work. Our enrollment both of ministerial and of university students is larger than during the previous year. Our ministerial students are in demand among the churches. All who are competent are employed, and we are beginning to receive inquiries for more. University students who took work with us as hearers are planning to continue with us next year, and are recommending the work to others.

During the year we gave work in the following courses: Life of Jesus and Harmony of the Gospels; Literature of the Bible; Introduction to the Pauline Letters; Introduction to the General Epistles, the Gospels, Acts, Hebrews and Revelation; Principals of Interpretation; History of the Apostolic Church; Homiletics, and The Legislation of Moses.

The lectures on the Laws of Moses were given by Dr. W. T. Moore. A class of twenty-seven was enrolled, nearly all of whom were from the College of Law of the university.

In addition to the above, the dean conducted a class in missions under the management of the university Y. M. C. A. It is understood that this class will be permanently in his hands. Also, during the last semester he conducted a class in The Life of Jesus for the Y. M. C. A. of the normal academy. This class will be continued during the coming year.

The class in the Life of Jesus, including Christian College students, numbered 31. Introduction to the New Testament Books, 8. Literature of the Bible, 23. Laws of Moses, 27. Missions, 18. Normal Academy in Life

Aside from the normal academy students, the Bible College enrolled 92 students. Including these there were 115. Nine were ministerial students, ten are members of the Student Volunteer Band and are preparing for the foreign field; four of these are members of the Christian church.

Under our cheering prospect of a handsome memorial building in the near future it was thought wise for Bro. C. M. Sharpe, who has been elected to the Old Testament department, to continue in the field in the financial interests of the college during the coming year. We feel sure, however, of being able to give students who contemplate work with us all they can do.

We shall surely co-operate in the movement for a centennial fund for 1909. We have not yet fixed upon the amount at which we shall aim. With $50,000 now in our endowment, with a most admirable building site, with every prospect of a fine building, with a great brotherhood rapidly coming to know and appreciate our movement and its exceptional advantages, we are not inclined to aim at meager things.

Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. C. W. B. M. in Missouri.

We desire to inaugurate a contest to be carried on for the few months remaining till our convention in September. Will you send us a suggestion for a state motto? The one we had last year, "Our Best Gifts for God," was so popular with the sisters that we decided to retain it for this year, and we are glad we did so since Miss Burgess so beautifully fulfilled it. Now, we urge that you help us to formulate one for next year. Let many sisters, workers, friends, auxiliaries try each to send the best. We desire a spirited contest, and offer as a prize a C. W. B. M. pin, the convention to decide which motto is adopted. Dear sisters, help us in this work. We want you to have a part in it. Think earnestly and lovingly, bring the subject up at the auxiliary meeting, talk of it with your friends and then when you have decided, send to our secretary, Mrs. Bantz, with your name and address. Beautiful thoughts and aspirations come to us all. Why not express them? Do it now.

Most lovingly yours,
 MRS. M. M. GOODE,
 Pres. C. W. B. M. in Mo.

The quarterly union meeting of the St. Louis auxiliaries, which took place at Tuxedo Church on June 23, was one long to be remembered as a season like unto which we hope to enjoy in the mansions with many rooms in our dear Father's house.

The sisters of Tuxedo though small of house are large of heart, and welcomed us right royally. The numbers taxed the capacity of both their house and their coffee pot—fortunately, they have a beautiful lawn about the house, on to which the overflow could move, there to enjoy the sweet June sunshine, tempered with the north breeze. Not one on the program failed. Miss N. Stevens, of Tuxedo, led the opening devotionals, which prepared all for the feast to follow. "Good things" from all auxiliaries were given by the respective officers, some fourteen participating. Bro. J. L. Brant, pastor of First Church, followed with an address of encouragement, cheer and promise (on his part) which brought a vigorous response of hand clapping. Reports of auxiliaries, which showed a healthy growth, closed the morning session.

The afternoon was given to junior and intermediate interests, many children being present to inspire with their bright, little faces. Mrs. J. H. King, city Junior superintendent, had charge. Songs and recitations filled in the brief two hours, the more notable of which were a recitation on Deacon Brown's Hair, by Miss Lillian Spurlock, a solo by tiny Lucile Shephard and a recitation by Miss Sue E. Sanders, on "Tother and Which," two little black kittens, all of which deserve special mention.

Mrs. W. D. Harrison led the closing Quiet Hour, a season of refreshing indeed. Specific prayers was the thought, and special petitions were voiced by different sisters for our workers on the field, our station officers, our state officers, our auxiliary officers, and our auxiliary members.

We sorrow to lose for a while Brother and Sister Bartholomew, who have each missed but one of the quarterly meetings since their inauguration nine years ago. We trust they will enjoy many others with us in years to come.

Dedication at Chapel Hill, Ind.

The congregation of Disciples at Chapel Hill, Floyd county, Ind., having outgrown their old house of worship, have just completed, paid for and dedicated a new modern house, which is the gem of the community. It is substantially built, has the main auditorium, Sunday-school rooms, baptistery, robing rooms, corner entrance, vestibule and tower, etc. It is well lighted, neatly furnished, has a silver communion service, organ, etc. It was dedicated on Lord's day, June 14. Not more than one-third of the people who attended could get into the house. Money was raised to pay for all indebtedness. A great basket dinner in an adjoining grove, where 1,000 people partook of a most sumptuous dinner, was one of the features of the day. We were delighted with our visit with this people.

BALDWIN.

Samuel Baldwin passed to the other shore May 24, 1903, aged 62 years, 4 months, 18 days. He had been an elder of the church where he lived for 25 years. He was a man of fine intellectual powers, large executive ability and business capacity, but above everything he loved the church of Jesus Christ. His faithful wife and loving daughters are sustained in their bereavement by the knowledge that he departed to be with Christ.

Texas, the Land of Opportunities.

I have been in this great state nearly two years now, and the longer I am here, the more I marvel at the greatness of the state and her innumerable opportunities. There is scarcely an industry that she does not have, and in each of these there are opportunities that men of the older sections of the country in the north and east cannot grasp. I have just held a little meeting at Sabinal, a beautiful little village about 280 miles west of Houston, and about 80 miles west of the historic San Antonio, where still stands the famous Alamo, the cradle of Texas liberty. (By the way, I stood on the very spot where died the heroic Davy Crockett.) The first 70 miles west of Houston is a great prairie, pasture land, rice and sugar land. Men are making fortunes raising rice and sugar cane. Then the other 210 miles is a glorious land of promise. She stands with open heart and beckoning hands, offering to thousands of people her rich soil and her exhilarating and healthful climate, where they may make for themselves beautiful farms, elegant homes, and leave a glorious heritage to their children. This is a veritable Eden. I saw thousands of acres of corn in the silk (May 30), and rich and black like the best in Indiana and Illinois. Also great cotton fields that will yield $50 per acre. But hundreds of thousands with nothing on them but wild grass and scattering musquite bushes; and this is the richest of land. This land can be purchased for from $4 to $10 per acre. It is one of the best climates in the world. This is indeed the land of opportunities.

A Summer Trip Unsurpassed on the Continent.

The trip to Salt Lake City or to the Pacific Coast via that point over the Denver & Rio Grande system "The Scenic Line of the World," is the most beautiful in America. No European trip of equal length can compare with it in grandeur of scenery or wealth of novel interest. Then Salt Lake City itself is a most quaint and picturesque place and well worth the journey. Its Mormon temple, tabernacle, tithing office and church institutions; its hot sulphur springs within the city limits; its delightful temperature, sunny climate and its Great Salt Lake—deader and denser than the Dead Sea in Palestine—are but a few features of Salt Lake City's countless attractions. There are parks, drives, canons and beautiful outlying mountain and lake resorts. Imagine, if you can, a bath in salt water a mile above sea level and in water in which the human body cannot sink. Inquire of your nearest ticket agent for low tourist rates to Salt Lake City, or write for information and copy of "Salt Lake City, the City of the Saints," to S. K. Year Book for 1903-04, one of the handsomest sent out by any college. The next session opens September 14, 1903.

I. J. SPENCER,
President Board of Trustees.

Hazel Green Academy.

Hazel Green, Ky.

Hazel Green Academy, the Kentucky Mountain Mission of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, has just closed one of its most successful sessions. The enrollment for the year was 249, of whom 140 were boarders. These pupils came from many different communities of the mountains, and especially from the central-eastern section.

The work done by the student-body was good. Special interest was taken in spiritual matters; many of the pupils came into the church during the year. As they have gone back to their mountain homes, they will carry many good influences from the school and church, and thus we reach, through them, the people of their home communities. Of those in attendance at the academy more than 60 will teach in the public schools of the mountains, and through this channel we indirectly reach 3,000 or more of the boys and girls back in the rural districts of the mountains. Sunday-schools and Endeavor societies will also be organized by these young men and women. Some of these pupils have gone out into the business world. And so through all the varied channels, in which the young people of the mountains are called to work, there is no end to the influence of the mission school in the mountains.

Our work has been materially hindered by lack of suitable boarding facilities. We have no boarding houses of our own. Some buildings have been rented, but they are not at all suited to our needs. We badly need a large home for our girls especially.

The outlook for the future of Hazel Green Academy is indeed bright, and hundreds of young men and women will throng our halls if we have suitable boarding houses.

WM. H. CORD, Principal.

Kentucky University,

Lexington, Ky.

The session that has just closed at Kentucky University is pronounced by its friends one of the most successful in its history. The attendance was heavily increased; there were 66 more students than in the preceding session, which is a good 20 per cent more than the preceding year's enrollment. There were 345 students enrolled in the College of Liberal Arts, and 78 in the College of the Bible, making a total of 423 on the campus. If the Commercial College and Medical College be counted also, the total reaches 1,166.

Of the 345 students in the College of Liberal Arts 81 were not altogether prepared for college classes and were taking studies in the academy; which leaves 264 students actually enrolled in full in college classes.

Of the 423 students in the College of the Bible and the College of Liberal Arts, about 130, as nearly as we can estimate, are studying for the ministry.

The income of the institution was considerably increased by this large percentage of increase in the number of students; but the necessary expense was also naturally increased, for college education that is conscientious always costs instead of pays. The income from all sources in the College of Liberal Arts alone is something like $20,000, in the College of the Bible about half that much; so that, all told, the university uses about $30,000 a year.

The College of Liberal Arts has succeeded in raising almost the entire sum needed for the endowment of the chair for the dean of women, something like $23,000 out of the needed $25,000 having been subscribed. An addition of $9,000 was made by the sale of the site for the Carnegie library—ground that could not otherwise have been realized upon. The Bible College has added about $12,000, so that the past year has seen an addition of about $44,000 to the funds of the university as a whole. This brings the endowment to a total of over $350,000.

As colleges go in the south, this is a very favorable financial outlook. This amount should be increased to half a million in the next few years. Any institution south of Mason and Dixon's line which has $200,000 of endowment may be considered safe. It will not die. And an institution possessing half a million is fairly well-to-do. So, in a short time, if all goes well, Kentucky University ought to be on a very solid financial basis. But to raise an additional $150,000 will require heroic effort from all the friends of the old institution.

The university will certainly join in the movement for a centennial endowment fund for 1909. What amount we shall decide to go after is a question for careful deliberation. What we go after we want to get. Let the old friends of Kentucky University speak up. What will they advise?

BURRIS A. JENKINS.

Texas Christian University.

Waco, Texas.

I take pleasure in making the following statement concerning the year's work that has just closed. We have had a total enrollment of a little over 300 students. We outline a broad ministerial course and it is in successful operation and the number of students that are taking this course is increasing. During the last year in the neighborhood of twenty young people enrolled, who are looking forward to the ministerial or missionary work. We confidently believe that we will enroll two or three times this number next year.

The Brotherhood of Texas is enthusiastically supporting the school and we expect to realize a large endowment for the institution in the near future.

The work of Texas Christian University during the past year has been in a high degree satisfactory. We have had an earnest and enthusiastic Water is Free!

But it won't take the pain out of a burn; it won't heal a wound; it won't take the ache out of rheumatism, neuralgia, etc. POND'S EXTRACT will. It will do it almost instantly. The claim that ordinary witch hazel is "just as good" or "just the same" as POND'S EXTRACT needs but a mite of consideration to prove its falsity. Ordinary witch hazel is nearly all water. That's why you can get so much for so little—because water is free.

POND'S EXTRACT is the pure extract of Hamamelis Virginica—that's why it costs more; that's why it CURES. If you want water, get it at the pump—it's cheaper and safer. If you want relief from pain—any pain, insist on getting POND'S EXTRACT. Always sold under original label.

body of students and the class-room work has been of a high order throughout the year. We have a very excellent faculty and our maintaining courses equal in strength to the best institutions of our brethren.

We are the one school of the state, so far as we know, that increased its patronage over any former year. The drouth in the southwest for the past two years has had a very depressing effect upon the patronage of the schools and nearly all schools had a drop in patronage last year, but Texas Christian University made a good healthy increase over any former year, which is a great encouragement to us and the prospects are that the patronage will greatly increase next year.

About fifty-thousand dollars has been put into buildings and improvements during the past two or three years and we have one of the finest educational plants in the southwest. The property of the University at the present time represents a money value of about two hundred thousand dollars. Texas Christian University is destined to become one of the great schools of the Christian brotherhood.

It has an almost unlimited field and is destined to do a great work.

E. V. ZOLLARS, President.

The Female Orphan School.

Camden Point, Mo.

The session closing May 28 was one of the most successful for years at this institution. The boarding patronage was as large as the building could accommodate, the day enrollment was good, and so regular was the attendance that the register showed a larger number of students present at the close of the last than at the close of the first term. All schools showed exceptionally earnest and enthusiastic work. The total enrollment was ninety-four, from six states and territories. An unusually large number expressed their intention of returning, and the prospects for the coming year are very bright.

During the year the financial agent, T. H. Capp, though making no active canvass, secured some three thousand dollars in cash and pledges toward liquidating the debt of the school amounting to about six thousand dollars. Nearly a thousand dollars was expended in improvements and repairs. The total income was more than double that of last year.

Impressed with the hopeful outlook, and realizing the need of additional building to accommodate even the present number of students, and purposing to improve the school and enlarge its capacity, the incorporators at their May meeting recommended that the executive board devise ways and secure means to erect an addition to the present building and to equip for thorough modern school work. Plans are now under advisement. A committee was also appointed to consider and report at the next annual meeting the advisability of a change in the name of the school. Whatever may be done, the work of the school will not be changed, but it is believed that a name, representative of the character and work of the college, will enlarge its usefulness.

A new and worthy feature of the school the coming year will be the department of industrial arts (tailoring and cooking) with a trained instructor in charge. This is made possible by the help of Mr. E. S. Gosney, of Flagstaff, Arizona, who is enthusiastic in the practical education of girls. Its work will be scientific.

We are grateful for what we have accomplished in the past session, and are confident of being able to do better in the year to come. As an institution founded and maintained largely by the church in Missouri, we esteem it a great pleasure to assist in all enterprises of the church. It is more blessed to give than to receive.

E. L. BARHAM.

The School of the Evangelists.

Kimberlin Heights, Tenn.

This school has enjoyed a year of growth. We have added a good river bottom farm to the school's resources, and also a swine raising department and expect to greatly enlarge our dairy before the opening in the fall.

We have improved our course both in English and in the classics, we are doing up-to-date work in all departments.

We have a young and growing faculty, men and women who teach to serve.

We graduated eleven preachers last year, representing eight states and England, bringing our alumni up to fifty-one. There are ten in next year's graduating class, all preachers; we do not graduate anyone else.

We enrolled 131, representing 29 states and countries last year, about 125 of them were candidates to the ministry.

We have nailed this invitation over our door: "There are room and opportunity here for any converted young man who wishes to preach the gospel whether he has money to pay his way or not."

We seek no endowment. Catalogue free.

ASHLEY S. JOHNSON, President.
Kimberlin, Heights, Tenn.

William Woods College.

Fulton, Mo.

The Disciples of Christ in the state, the church everywhere, and the friends of education, have great reason to rejoice in the continued and unparalleled prospects of this institution.

During the session closing May 29 last, one hundred and ninety-five pupils were enrolled in all the departments. Of this number, one hundred and forty were in the boarding department, whose capacity was so taxed, that provision will be made for the increasing patronage.

The school has not only grown in numbers, but in efficiency and thoroughness. It has conquered an honorable footing among the best schools in the state. Its curriculum is equal to the best for young ladies. Its graduates are taking and holding positions in the public schools and in other useful positions.

The department of music, instrumental and vocal, art, expression, shorthand, typewriting, and expression, are adequately and ably equipped.

In the literary department there were seventeen graduates; in vocal culture, one; piano department, three; shorthand, one; elocution, one.

The exercises were of a high order, and the best training manifested. The watchword is enlargement.

New buildings are proposed, and the management hopes to make definite announcement at an early date.

During the past year over twenty-five thousand dollars were received from various sources, and expended in the equipment and direction of the schools' affairs.

More than twenty thousand dollars of this money came from the paying patronage of the institution. Present endowment, though now more than $50,000, is wholly inadequate to meet the expenses. Indeed the school would be an utter failure without a paying patronage. But even with the proposed half million movement, the paying patronage must continue, since experience proves that the co-educator of all classes secures the best results to all.

Kola Plant CURES HAY-FEVER AND ASTHMA.

Free. The African Kola Plant is Nature's Positive Cure for Hay-fever and Asthma. Since its recent discovery this remarkable botanical product has come into universal use in the Hospitals of Europe and America as an unfailing specific cure for Hay-Fever and Asthma in every form. Its cures are really marvelous.

Dr. J. R. Duncan, the oldest physician of Crawfordsville, Ind., writes Jan. 29th, "I feel it my duty to tell all I can of the great virtue of Himalya." Dr. W. H. Vail, a prominent physician of St. Louis, Mo., writes March 8th, "that he used Himalya on six different Hay-fever patients last fall with satisfactory results in every case." Mr. Frederick F. Wyatt, the noted Evangelist of Abilene, Texas, writes Jan. 31st, "that Himalya permanently cured him of Hay-Fever and Asthma and strongly recommends it to sufferers." Mrs. M. A. Scott, Crosby, Mich., writes March 6th, "that Himalya completely cured her after fifteen years persistent suffering of Hay-fever and Asthma." Mr. Alfred C. Lewis, editor of the Farmers' Magazine, Washington, D. C., was also cured, although he could not lie down for fear of choking, being always worse in Hay-fever season. Rev. J. L. Coombs, of Martinsburg, W. Va., wrote to the New York World, July 23d, "that Himalya cured him of Asthma of thirty years' standing."

Hundreds of others send similar testimony proving Himalya a truly wonderful remedy. As the Kola Plant is a specific constitutional cure for the disease, Hay-fever sufferers should use it before the season of the attacks when practical, to give it time to act on the system. To prove the power of this new botanical discovery, if you suffer from Hay-fever or Asthma, we will send you one trial case by mail entirely free. It costs you absolutely nothing. Write to-day to The Kola Importing Co., No. 1166 Broadway, New York.

William Woods College was the first to propose the gratuitous education of the daughters of foreign missionaries. With bonds for two scholarships it considers this feature permanently established, and waits hopefully and prayerfully for a worthy endowment.

The manual training department, sewing and cooking, optional at present, will add to the efficiency of the course of instruction.

Dr. W. S. Woods and wife attended the closing exercises of the school, and though indebted to many friends, it is just to these generous friends to say that their liberality has made the present prosperity of the school possible.

As the school belongs to the brotherhood, the churches should feel a just pride in its success and co-operate with its management in every way possible for further enlargement and endowment.

followed by Rev. Jacob Adriane, riding a pony. The city now has church accommodation for about one-third of its population. There are 150 churches and missions, as against 375 licensed saloons. Some of the edifices are as fine as can be found in any city. It has, too, a fine body of ministers, among those best known to Endeavorers being Dr. B. B. Tyler, formerly of New York City, and president of the International Sunday-school Union. "Parson Uzzel" is the best known worker among the people, his Tabernacle, a new building in the erection of which he had considerable help from the late millionaire Stratton, being nearest the tenderloin district. Almost any evening small bodies of Salvationists and Volunteers may be heard on the corners of 16th and Arapahoe, or 16th and Larimer streets, where many laboring men and out-of-works congregate. The Y. M. C. A. occupies a portion of a large building on Arapahoe. It is a live association and does a great deal of good work. Its secretary, Mr. Wm. Danner, is a man, a delightful gentleman and a Christian and philanthropic worker. The Y. M. C. A., with its 1,500 members, means a great deal, not only to Denver, but to a throng of young men who are still acting upon Horace Greeley's advice. The Y. W. C. A., too, is a useful institution in Denver, and is happily provided with a good home.

Every line of material industry showed great strides in advance in Colorado during 1902. And spiritual interest increased, too! But there are many conquests for Christ yet to be made and the field is so difficult a one that the ministers and Christian workers long for the time when the young people from all over the country will storm the city with their enthusiasm and Christian joyfulness. The Sunday-school convention did much last year; the Christian Endeavor convention this year will do very much more.

The Holiday Feature?

Denver is a starting point for all excursions. Special ones will, of course, be organized for the benefit of the Christian Endeavorers. The trip to Georgetown takes you through Clear Creek canon and some of the earliest and still most productive mineral territory. Then you must visit Cripple Creek and travel one way, at least over the Short Line. Colorado Springs is a pretty little city near Manitou, the Garden of the Gods and the Cave of the Winds and Pike's Peak, Pueblo, further south is the Pittsburg of the west. Here are some great smelters, the works of the Colorado Fuel and Iron Co., and Clark's famous magnetic mineral spring.

The way the Denverite spends his summer is to take a strong wagon, a reliable team and go into the mountains, plant his tent or which is a single piece of canvas stretched from a couple of trees, or some poles or the top of the wagon to the ground, at an angle of about 45 degrees. When he desires, he moves on to some other camp. Some spruce tops and some blankets, he wants them warm, for I have known the temperature to be in some localities 90 degrees at ten o'clock in the morning and the water in the bucket freeze at night, constituting his bed. If one is fond of out-door life this is a delightful way to spend a few weeks. I had two months of it last year and returned to Denver with some experiences, fifteen pounds of extra flesh, a sparkling eye and a knowledge of the west that possibly I could not have gained in any other way.

A wise old proverb says that variety is the spice of life. A visit to the Endeavor convention and the great silver state, with its marvels, its beauties, its invigorating climate, its many mineral springs, its turquoise sky, would be such a change to thousands of people as may be compared to the storm which shakes up the ocean of human experience and keeps it from getting stale and insalubrious.

Bethany—The Mother of Us All.

Cowgill, A. Linkletter, Oreon Scott, F. M. Gordon, Mrs. George Darsie, Jr., H. H. Moninger and wife, Misses Lonia Tebbs and Drusilla Johnson, Mrs. L. W. White, C. A. Kleeberger and George E. Curtis.

College songs, baseball and "biz" had their usual prominence. The students this year represent 12 states and Australia, New Zealand, India, Japan, England and Canada. There is good assurance of not less than 300 the coming session. The summer school opens with a good attendance, June 23, the assembly will be held July 22 to August 4, and the next session will open September 22.

Bethany's faculty is an excellent one. Professors Pendleton, Wynne and Keith are justly entitled to be styled patriarchs. Professors Kershner and Johnson, Streater and Erskine are walking worthily in the footsteps of the teachers that have made Bethany a fountain of blessing. The professor of elocution, Miss Cogswell, and Professor and Mrs. Hertzog will retire from the faculty this year, and Professor and Mrs. W. D. Turner, of Shelby, O., and Mrs. Annie Bourne, late of Kentucky University, will take their places. Prof. Philip Johnson has been called as assistant pastor of the Vermont Avenue Church for the summer months. He is an old Vermont Avenue boy and will render the best of service.

Commencement day closed with the Neotrophian exhibition, when J. L.

Streater made the address and M. M. Cochran conferred the diplomas. The president gave his usual farewell reception, and vale, longum vale, vale et salve, was heard on every hand. The next day the corridor and campus and the little town among the hills were strangely quiet. What a sweet, restful place is Bethany!

A Lord's day in this Vale of Tempe, with the sweet tones of the church bell, and the gathering of the village folk for worship, and the memories of the historic church on the bank of the Buffalo, and the opportunity to preach from the old pulpit where I was accustomed occasionally to speak my maiden sermons thirty or more years ago—a pulpit consecrated by Campbell and Richardson and Pendleton and Loos—was a delight that does not come often to a metropolitan. Then the fellowship of the Barclays and Campbells and Naves and Keiths and Wynnes and Cramblets and Miss Cammie and the rest—where can it be surpassed? Professor Keith is now the pastor of the church. Mother Barclay still graces the Bethany mansion. Colonel Alec is as reminiscent as ever, and as hospitable, has eschewed politics and gone to gardening, in which he has but one ambition, and that, to equal Professor Wynne in the timeliness and quality of his onions and potatoes. My old landlady, Mrs. Davis, continues to dwell in her cottage on the creek, near the spot where I had my ears frozen while skating. Mrs. Chapline, Mrs. Richardson, Mrs. Wooley and Dr. and Mrs. Whitsett are yet among the stand-bys. A sky scraper is going up on Main Street which the whole town watches wonderingly. The hills and woods were never greener or more beautiful, and the walks up Councilman's Run and to Washboard Falls and over Pendleton Heights and elsewhere, never more attractive. One bit of vandalism is regretfully recorded here—the mutilation of Mr. Campbell's monument. Some barbarian has been chipping it for souvenirs. At one time Colonel Campbell had a quantity of marble chips thrown at its base to satisfy this craving. These are gone, and now the shaft is being desecrated. Another of the penalties of greatness.

Bethany's course, to use John Milton's good word, is "uphillward." With her success there must come to all our institutions help and cheer. All along the line should spring up a mighty revival in behalf of our educational enterprises. None are more deserving, none more pressingly needed, none more blessedly useful in all departments of our work. Let this prayer go up from all our pulpits and all our hearthstones: O Lord, bless our schools and colleges. Preserve, inspire and sanctify the teachers of our youth. Quicken our people to a just appreciation of their duty to the great cause of education, especially to the call for the preparation of laborers for the harvest of immortal souls.

INDIAN TERRITORY.—Ada, June 22.—Work here is improving. Good interest. Had two good services yesterday, with two added to our working force by statement. Expect our new pews this week. With the exception of one, all working in harmony.—W. O. BREEDEN, pastor.

IOWA.—Centerville, June 20.—Centerville is in the middle of a union meeting of all churches. Brother "Billy" Sunday is doing the preaching. Since the meetings have been in progress, we have succeeded in getting a saloon petition majority of near 80 wiped out and a safe number to hold in reserve. The meeting began the first of June, and will continue four weeks. Meeting is being held in a tent that holds 1,500 people, and it is crowded all the time. Many are accepting the Christ, and a great interest is being manifested.—C. F. B.

Ames, June 22.—Six united with the church during the regular work of last week; four by letter and statement and two by confession and baptism, all heads of families. Our Sunday-school cantata, "The Dream of Fairyland" netted an offering of $32. With the envelope offering and birthday jug, and our Children's day collection amounted to over $52.—F. D. FERRALL, pastor.

Des Moines, June 23.—Had two baptisms at Willow Creek, Minn., last week, making four since last report. Also one at Lewisville, Minn., same week. Have closed my work at Lewisville, Minn., and Willow Creek, Minn. My successor not yet chosen. Applicants please address Wm. White, Willow, Minn.—LESLIE WOLFE.

Woodbine, June 22.—Three confessions and one by letter since last report. The pastor gave Memorial Day address here and on June 19, an address before the district Christian Endeavor convention at Fort Dodge. A new barn at the parsonage and new lights in the church are recent acquisitions.—J. H. WRIGHT.

KANSAS.—Stone City, June 24.—Our series of meetings at this place closed Sunday night, June 21, with 32 additions, nearly all by confession and obedience. Our church, costing a little over $800, was dedicated Sunday.

Most of the money was raised. We expect within a few months to have all bills paid. We have a thriving Sunday-school, and last Sunday we organized a Y. P. S. C. E. Our membership is now over 80. We have regular service on the first and third Sundays of every month.—W. C. WILLEY, pastor.

Cherokee, June 24.—At Cherokee on the second Sunday there were 4 additions, 3 by letter and 1 by confession. We begin a regular weekly prayer-meeting at this place this week. Our Y. P. S. C. E. will give a special program Sunday. The Juniors are doing good work. I preach here on the second and fourth Lord's days of every month.—W. C. WILLEY.

McPherson, June 24.—Our tent meeting closed last Sunday. We continued four weeks, but the first two weeks we were almost stormed out. There were 20 additions; 16 confessions, 2 by statement, 1 from M. E.'s and 1 from the Baptists. B. B. Burton, of Des Moines, Ia., was our evangelist. His preaching was of a high order. He is one of the best men to work with I ever met. There was perfect harmony from first to last. He did untold good here and made many friends. Churches wanting a first class evangelist and a thoroughly good man will make no mistake in getting Bro. Burton. He ought to be kept busy.—W. T. ADAMS.

MICHIGAN.—Waldron, June 22.—Baptized two yesterday after our morning service. We have had two more added not previously reported: one by letter and one by statement.—L. E. CHASE, minister.

Saginaw, June 22.—We are pleased to report clear day and good services yesterday, with three confessions—young ladies. A confession during the week and baptism of a very fine young man—an engineer. This makes seven since last report. The weather man has not been good to us this month, but our general work is doing well. Prayer-meeting fine. We begin to see the silver lining behind the clouds. State convention at Durand, June 8-12, was enthusiastic if not large. The general work of convention excellent.—E. E. C.

MISSOURI.—Kirksville, June 24.—Three additions last Lord's day, making 5 since last report. We attended to the ordinance of Baptism to-night at prayer meeting.—H. A. NORTHCUTT, pastor, C. E. WAGNER, Ass't.

Joplin, June 27.—Our Bible-school ran an excursion train to Sulphur Springs, Ark., yesterday. Ten passenger coaches were loaded with people and a baggage coach with dinner baskets. We had a great, good time and the school will clear nearly $200. Since the convention we have had 4 added at First, and 6 at South Joplin.—W. F. TURNER.

St. Louis, June 29.—At the Christian ministers' meeting this morning the following additions were reported: Carondelet 2; Old Orchard 1; Cabanne 1; Hammett Place 6; First Church 3.

Wellsville, June 25.—Two by baptism added to the church here Wednesday at prayer meeting, and two by the same ordinance at Bellflower, Sunday afternoon. In both cases the converts were husband and wife.—G. F. ASSITER.

Elvins, June 22.—Nine additions yesterday; 5 by confession, 1 from the Baptists and 3 by statement; 22 additions during the past week. Bro. T. J. Head, of the Bible-school is assisting in the work. Much interest is manifested.—JOHN G. M. LUTTENBERGER.

Appleton City, June 24.—Nine confessions at our services from Saturday to Tuesday, at Center schoolhouse. We will begin a series of meetings there July 19. We will use a large tent or tabernacle, as the house we are using is entirely too small. The outlook for a good meeting and a new church is bright.—FRANK JALAGEAS.

Potosi, June 22.—Five additions the first Sunday in this month. Also 3 here yesterday.—J. B. DODSON.

St. Louis, June 22.—One addition and a fine Children's Day exercise with a good sum for foreign missions at Huntsville yesterday, while a great rain storm raged without.—W. H. KERN.

Troy, June 22.—Since Feb. 1, 1903, under the ministrations of our beloved pastor, Bro. J. D. Powell, there have been added to the church by confession, 2; letter, 3. Our church newly covered, painted inside, newly carpeted, granitoid baptistry, new windows, etc., cost in all $480. The church has contributed to state missions, foreign missions, state Bible-school work, home missions and orphans' home. Young People's Christian Endeavor Convention of the Presbyterian and Christian churches just closed a grand meeting of 3 days and nights, leaving great rejoicing in our city. Brother Powell is a success as pastor, preacher and man.—WILLIAM FRAZIER.

NEBRASKA.—Edgar, June 22.—One more confession at Ox Bow yesterday. Work moving along nicely, with good interest. Pray for us.—E. W. YOCUM.

Broken Bow, June 22.—One addition at Anselmo at last meeting. Prospects promising.—JESSE R. TEAGARDEN.

NEW YORK.—Syracuse, June 22.—Yesterday afternoon the Syracuse church organized a mission Sunday-school in the west end of the city, known as the Rowland Street Christian Mission. Fifty-three were present at the opening service. A good building has been secured and the outlook is very hopeful.—Wm. D. RYAN.

OHIO.—Athens, June 22.—There were ten additions at the regular morning service yesterday: two reclaimed, two from Baptists, six by letter. Miss Mary Kelley, of China, spoke to a large audience in the morning, and she again spoke at the Children's Day exercises at night, when scores were unable to get in the building. Offering more than apportionment.—T. L. LOWE.

Galion, June 22.—There have been five additions here within the past month, four by letter and one baptism. Our Children's day was a great success. The offering when all in will be at least $40.—CHAS. A. PEARCE.

Bowling Green, June 23.—John Ray Ewers closed a successful pastorate of three years' duration here, June 14. In this time 231 have been added to the church, $7,000 raised for local expenses, $12,000 for benevolences. This is one of the best missionary churches in the brotherhood. There are now 420 active, united members. The church is in splendid condition in every way. Mr. Ewers was beloved by all, and his departure was universally regretted. He left in order that he might do two years' work at the University of Chicago, where he is already at work.

PENNSYLVANIA.—Scranton, June 22.—Children's day at Tripp Avenue Christian Church a success. House packed. Offering $100.—A. M. GROWDEN.

TEXAS.—Cisco, June 24.—Five added since last report: one by letter, one by baptism and three by statement. All departments of church work prospering and the outlook hopeful.—R. E. MCKNIGHT.

Houston, June 23.—I have closed my pastorate here and will be in the evangelistic field all the time.—E. W. BRICKERT.

Photographs of Summer Resorts.

The Pere Marquette Railroad, the Michigan Resort Scenic Route is sending out a handsome souvenir of the resort country in the shape of four photographs of beautiful scenes, each 6x8 inches, mounted ready for framing, and without advertising printed on them. These make a handsome reminder of the summer days and will be sent to any address on receipt of 25 cents. Address H. F. Moeller, G. P. A., Pere Marquette R. R., Detroit, Mich.

A GOOD MONEY-RAISING SCHEME.

I have discovered a good scheme for raising money in the Sabbath-school. Our school raised $120 in two weeks and expects to raise $2,000 by rallying day. The scheme is absolutely new, unobjectionable and very interesting.

Any Sabbath-school superintendent who desires to know all about it can receive full information by inclosing to me $1.00, which amount will be used in paying the debt on our Sabbath-school building. I will agree to refund on application the money which may be received from any one who is dissatisfied with the information I send him. Address

Opinions of the Christian-Evangelist

As we are asking our readers to join with us in a vigorous campaign to increase the circulation of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST during the next six months, closing the fortieth volume of the paper, it seems altogether proper that we should present a few statements from representative brethren giving their estimate of the paper and the place it holds in our religious literature. We are permitted to use the following statements and extracts from a number of well-known brethren which will be of service to our readers in assisting them in the work of securing new subscribers. We have space for only brief statements from a few of the letters we have received, which we give below:

"Its conception of the plea of the Disciples of Christ is correct and its presentation of this plea is manly and consistent."
W. S. LOWE.
Topeka, Kan.

"The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has been a mighty factor in bringing the cause for which we plead to its present glorious state."
J. F. GHORMLEY.
Portland, Ore.

"The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is an ideal religious weekly. Every family in the brotherhood ought to have it. Its splendid corps of writers is making it second to no paper printed by any religious body in the country."
R. W. ABBERLEY.
Columbus, O.

"I believe your policy is, there is nothing too good in the newspaper line for the friends of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. The matter contained in recent issues is sufficient earnest that more of the same kind is coming."
JAMES H. BROOKS.
Newport, Ark.

"I value the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for many things, but just now I feel like laying stress on two things: (1) Its unvarying spirit of Christian courtesy, and (2) its admirable balance. It has no crochets or hobbies. It goes to no extremes."
GEORGE DARSIE.
Frankfort, Ky.

"I have observed that the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST are loyal to 'our plea' and love their brethren in Christ everywhere; that they stand for truth and righteousness; that they do not claim to have a monopoly of truth, or that wisdom will die with them."
T. P. HALEY.
Kansas City, Mo.

"Never has the wise, sane leadership of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST been so thoroughly appreciated by our great brotherhood as now. The people are more and more realizing that the principles your paper so ably advocates, and the spirit it manifests in dealing with all current questions, constitute a rational and safe interpretation of our position."
J. E. LYNN.
Springfield, Ill.

"The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is generally recognized as an able exponent of the principles of our great restoration movement. It is admired for its sweet spirit, liberal views and high literary character."

E. V. ZOLLARS,
Pres. Texas Christian University.
Waco, Tex.

"Such a plea to be effective needs a journal broad in spirit, sympathetic in tone, profound in scholarship, yet deathlessly devoted to its fundamental principles. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has the necessary qualifications. It presents the truth in love—but it presents the truth."

CECIL J. ARMSTRONG.
Winchester, Ky.

"Its progressive spirit is not only characteristic of everything of our age, but is supremely characteristic of the genius of our religious movement. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is our safest, sanest and strongest guide to-day in working out the problems which face us."
CARLOS C. ROWLISON.
Kenton, O.

"The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to my thinking is in strict accord with the spirit and aims of those men who inaugurated the movement for a restoration of primitive Christianity—its faith, its ordinances, its life, and its great and glorious liberty whose only limitations are those imposed by the plain teaching, character and spirit of Jesus Christ."
E. L. POWELL.
Louisville, Ky.

A Delightful Place to Spend the Summer

In the highlands and mountains of Tennessee and Georgia, along the line of the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Ry., may be found many health and pleasure resorts, such as Monteagle, Sewanee, Lookout Mountain, Bersheeba Springs, Bon Aqua Springs, East Brook Springs, Estill Springs, Nicholson Springs and many others. The bracing climate, splendid mineral waters, romantic and varied scenery combine to make these resorts unusually attractive to those in search of rest and health.

A beautifully illustrated folder has been issued by the N. C. & St. L. Ry., and will be sent to any one free of charge.

Family Circle

The Poet's Moving Day.

Now, we had intended to write something splendid
A poem majestic and grand.
But you know man proposes and woman disposes,
And nothing we want is at hand.

Our volumes of rhymes, which we do need at times,
Is packed with the kitchen utensils:
And the moving man took our synonym book,
Along with our red and blue pencils.

We must worry along with a frowsty old song
Till the Fates will allow us a neater.
And the corn man will treat our metrical feet,
While the gas man is fixing the meter.

Healthful Living and Thinking.

By Sara H. Henton.

To give definite rules which will answer for everybody is impossible, but a few rules which can be observed will do much toward making us happier and better. With good health one has beauty usually. Health and beauty are not alone attributes of youth. They may be found among the elderly and the old. They may be cultivated or in part acquired. Physical charms such as perfect features may delight for a time, but the possessor of perfect health attracts by the atmosphere of exuberant vitality.

Exercise is necessary to healthful living and thinking, and so is regular bathing. Every woman owes it to herself to do all in her power to preserve the good points nature has endowed her with, and to improve as far as she can the bad ones. In regard to bathing, let us say you should avoid hard water as a pestilence, for it hardens and roughens the skin. If you are so situated you cannot possibly get rain water every day, keep a box of powdered borax on your washstand and put some in the water every time you bathe. It will soften the water and it is healthful for the skin and softens it, and disinfects and purifies the open pores. It is not sufficient to wash the neck, face and shoulders, hands and arms daily. The whole body must be so treated, or those parts which are most often cleansed will have pimples, boils, blackheads, etc., upon them. The humors of the body find the easiest outlet, and this is why I advise the use of borax especially for perspiring feet or to bathe them daily in warm water with a pinch of borax in it. It will keep the whole body healthier. Change your stockings daily and your shoes as often as your feet become tired; wear a pair of stockings one day, lay them aside next day and then put on again, and so on. It may surprise you to learn that a healthful condition of the feet is as closely allied with your beauty as a healthful state of teeth or hair.

The Modern Breakfast Food.

Sing a song of sawdust, a kettle full of bran:
Forty thousand mixtures to feed the modern man:
Millet, wheat and middlings, cattle feed galore,
And many other dainty things we never ate before.
Barley in the coffee pot, doesn't that seem funny?
"Grapeshot" for our brain cells, "Fierce" to make us sunny,
"Mama's Rye" to boost our nerves, "Shaker Oats" for muscle, Hay and straw and fodder to aid us in life's tussle.

—John Carle Anderson, in Puck.

"Dear," said the physician's wife,
"when can you let me have $10?"
"Well," replied the medical man, "I hope to cash a draft shortly and then—"
"Cash a draft? What draft?"
"The one I saw Mrs. Jenkins sitting in this morning."

At a society dinner last year, Rev. Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler contributed to the fun of the evening by propounding this conundrum: "Why was Noah the greatest financier of his time?"

No one was able to answer; so he gave his fellow diners a year to think it over.

This year Dr. Cuyler was unable to attend the dinner, but he telegraphed this answer; "Noah was able to float a stock company at a time when all his contemporaries were forced into involuntary liquidation."

A Hindu and a New Zealander met upon the deck of a missionary ship. They had been converted from their heathenism, and were brothers in Christ; but they could not speak to each other. They pointed to their Bibles, shook hands, and smiled in each other's faces; but that was all. At last a happy thought occurred to the Hindu. With sudden joy, he exclaimed: "Halleluia!" The New Zealander, in delight, cried out: "Amen!" Those two words, not found in their own heathen tongues, were to them the beginning of "one language and one speech."—Twentieth Century Pastor.

With the Children

By J. Breckenridge Ellis

Lizzie L. McLain, Thayer, Mo.: "My quarter ended yesterday. I enjoy the Av. S. Letters, and I like to keep the rules, so I couldn't forget them if I tried. If one just thinks so, he can find something interesting in every line he reads." (Yes, but sometimes it's so hard to think it!) "I really hope Bertha Beesley won't fail in taking the teacher's examination. I feel sorry for her if she has to teach in a place like I did last year. It was out among the great high hills, and there was only one pretty spot there." (You?) "A high wall of solid blue rock rises perpendicularly from one side of the river for about 200 feet. In the crevices of this rock grow grasses and plants. A pine or small cedar grows here and there in the rock. The top is covered with long grass, while stumpy cedars are scattered over it. The rock forms a wall around the bend of the river for about 200 yards, then gradually slopes, forming a long line of beauty high above the river. I went with a friend to the top last fall, when the leaves were changing to many beautiful colors. We stood on the high rock and looked down upon the breeze-tossed treetops. It made one dizzy to look at the winding river. If Mollie Turner ever comes to see the Mammoth Springs, she must come to see me, for we don't live very far from them. I have been there many times. I must stop, for it is nearly Sunday-school time."

Manie Bayless, Mulkeytown, Ill., has sent me her note book. On the last page she sums up her work thus: "Finished my first quarter June 9. Read 501 pages of history (biographies), 1,633 lines of poetry, besides 'Lucile,' which is 375 pages—didn't count the lines; memorized 12 quotations" (she gives them all) "and read 179 chapters in the Bible. I find it very little trouble to keep the rules, but I don't know how it will be this summer, as I generally read very little in warm weather."

Burleigh Cash, Hood River, Ore.: "I am reading 'Giants of the Republic' for my history. We are very busy now, right in the midst of strawberry picking. I do the packing; Henry, Ashley and papa do the picking. The valley is nearly full of pickers—Indians, Japs, blacks and whites. Four camps of Indians (about 40) camp on our farm, in the woods. They are going to have a dance not far from here soon. I have not seen those sleighs coming down the Columbia yet. I ate part of your share of the strawberries and all of mine; consequently—well—ahem! You know the result. How I wish I had kept up in the Advance Society. It would be about my 20th report now. You should have a Charter List. Of course I'd want to be on it, because I was among the first to join when your first article came out. (Now I am not bragging on myself). Well, well! I thought I would turn the sheet over and write my name on the back, and here I have written a whole page!"

"A Friend," Missouri: "I am not a member of the Av. S., but I think it will please you to hear that one of your members (just 16) stayed all night with me this week. She asked for the Bible and said she must read at least one verse, because she belongs to the Av. S. If I get to the World's Fair, I will time my visit so I can see the Av. S. members gathered together. The boys and girls who belong to it will make a band of good men and women, I feel sure. My prayer is that God will bless the Av. S. and its leader and dear Bro. Garrison."

Claire Saunders, Ozark, Ark.: "I send in my report. At the end of the 10th week, I did not get the work I had done that week on my secretary book, before I went to bed. Will that count a miss? I hope not, for this is the fourth time I have tried to get on the Honor List." (We will count it a miss on the Honor List; I mean Miss Claire Saunders.)

Maud Gorman, Ozark, Ark.: "As Claire Saunders told you what we did on your birthday, I will write about something else. We have planted a great, big goober-patch. If you will come down this fall we will give you all the goobers you can eat. I will send you one of my best quotations, from Madaline Bridges: 'Give the world the best you have, and the best will come back to you.'"

Vina Hawkins, Ozark, Ark.: "I want to tell you about an old hen that fell in a well." (Do!) "Eva and I went over to Mr. Wagner's one afternoon. When we got there, the children were very much excited over an old hen that had fallen in the well. Their papa and mamma were away, so we had to get her out the best way we could. Grover let the well-bucket down to try to get her." (Yes, I always heard Grover liked to go fishing.) "He said, 'Oh, sister! if you ever want to see daylight again, you had better get into this bucket.' But she did not get into the bucket. So we got a fishhook and line and fished for her a while, but she would not bite. Then we got a grabhook and line and fished for her with that." (Why didn't you try a seine?) "At last we caught her leg and wing, and drew her out. She had her eyes shut, so we laid her in the sun to dry, while we went off to catch crawfish. We got an awful big one, and three little ones." (You ought to have made a little pond to put them in.) "When we got back to the house the old hen was walking around; I hope she will live to cackle many a day."

Consumption Kills Thousands Every Year

Does Such a Fate Await You? Why Sacrifice Your Precious Life When Help and Health are at Hand? Antidotum Tuberculosis—a Cure for Consumption at Last. Large Trial Treatment FREE.

Consumption can be cured. The grim harvester of death has met his match and master at last in Antidotum Tuberculosis—the marvel of the medical world.

O. K. BUCKHOUT, Chairman Kalamazoo Tuberculosis Remedy Co., Ltd., Member of National Association for the Prevention of Consumption. "There is no need for further doubt or holding off. You take no risk. Antidotum Tuberculosis is the long-sought 'cure' for which the medical world has waited. It eradicates the deadly Consumption germs, restores weak, worn and helpless invalids to strong and healthy men and women. Don't be blind to your fate. If you inherit the tendency to Consumption or have any of those tell-tale symptoms, coughing, night sweats, blood-spitting, debility, etc., do not for a moment neglect your danger. It is your sacred duty to write today for the free trial treatment. Address The Kalamazoo Tuberculosis Remedy Co., Ltd., 1159 Main St., Kalamazoo, Mich."

Eunice Saunders, Ozark, Ark.: "Claire and I went over to play with Eva and Vina Hawkins. We rode one of our horses, Old Legs. We had a good time, as we always do when we get together." (Wish I could see you!) "When we got ready to start home, Eva and Vina were going a piece with us. We could not agree whether Eva and Claire, or Vina and I should ride the horse. So to settle the thing we all climbed on." (I'd think that would have settled Old Legs!) "Somehow, Eva got her heels in Old Legs's flanks and she began to buck. We had it lively for a while, and all of us fell off in a heap. I was underneath. When we got up, Old Legs was standing in a corner looking at us. I was laid up a week with a sprained wrist. The rest were not hurt to speak of." (Honor List next week.)

RESTORES EYESIGHT.

"Actina," a Marvelous Discovery that Cures All Afflictions of the Eye Without Cutting or Drugging.

There is no need for cutting, drugging or probing the eye for any form of disease. There is no risk or experimenting, as thousands of people have been cured of blindness, failing eyesight, cataracts, granulated lids and other afflictions of the eye through this grand discovery, when eminent oculists termed the cases incurable.

Mrs. A. L. Howe, Tully, N. Y., writes: "Actina removed cataracts from both my eyes. I can read well without glasses. Am 65 years old."

Robert Baker, 80 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill., writes: "I should have been blind had I not used 'Actina.' Actina is sent on trial postpaid. If you will send your name and address to the New York & London Electric Association, Dept. 203, 929 Walnut Street, Kansas City, Mo., you will receive free, a valuable book, Prof. Wilson's Treatise on the Eye and on Disease in General, and you can rest assured that your eyesight and hearing will be restored. no matter how many doctors have failed."

Perfect Love.

By Charles Blanchard.

Hills rise on hills and meet
The mount of God afar;
And, standing at its feet,
We see Love's lofty star,
As Moses saw His face,
But could not look thereon:
Its path of light we trace
Dimly, and it is gone!
Beyond our highest reach
Such perfect Love still lies;
And holiest Life for each,
Beyond these bending skies!

Being Popular.

By Marianna Wood Robinson.

"Who was elected, Rob?"
"Tom Leighton, of course. No other fellow had any show at all. He's the most popular boy there is. They say it is because he is so good natured."
"Well, Tom is the kindest boy—the kindest big boy—I know," said Sadie, Rob's sister.
"Huh! That's all right, but what does he have to keep him from being kind? He has every single thing he wants. He never has to work till the very last minute before school time. And he always has lots of money to treat the fellows with. I could be kind, too—maybe I could be popular, if I had time. You have to have something to make you popular."
"Right you are, my son. I have felt that way a great many times. It's the men who have money, so they can do things for people, or leisure to make themselves agreeable, that are popular. It takes time even to be kind. When a man has to work all day in the shop, as hard as I do, he's got no time to make himself popular."
"It doesn't seem as if that were quite the right idea of making one's self popular," said Rob's mother.

"What do you think, Aunt Katie?"

"I was just thinking," answered Aunt Kate, "of the two most popular men I know in our neighborhood at home."

"Oh, is one that nice old gentleman who sat on his porch so much and used to give me candy when I went by?"

"No, dear; he isn't one of them."

"Well, then," said Rob, "it's some of those swell fellows over on Lee Avenue, two blocks from your street."

"No, Rob, it isn't exactly any of them. I was just thinking," she went on, "about what you said it took to make boys or men popular. I'm sure the same men are both extremely popular, but they both work at manual labor every day in the week, one of them, at least, all the year round, with, perhaps, a couple of weeks off."

"They must be awfully smart men," said Rob, "to do all that, and have time to make themselves popular, too."

"No, I don't consider them especially smart, as we usually think of smartness. They are able to do their work well and faithfully, and that is all."

"Well. I suppose their work is not the kind that frets or bothers them. They don't have to put their mind right on it," said Rob's father.

"I don't know about that. I should think the work of one would be very tedious and vexing, and as to the other, most representatives of his calling whom I have known have been as cross as bears, without a word for anybody."

"Just like our postman," said Sadie.

"Yes, that's just what he is—a letter carrier; and the other is the janitor of the Washintgon school. The postman has a kindly, interested word to say at every door along his route. If you have been away, he is glad to see you back. If you don't get the letter you are expecting, he is as sorry as you are. If a package you are depending on is delayed, he tries to plan some extra way for you to get it in time. If you are sick, he inquires for you every day.

"The children run to meet him, and take turns going a way with him. They tell him their little secrets, and exchange stamp pictures with him.

"At Christmas time he enjoys his work more than ever, because it makes so many people happy. He seems to make his work the means of his popularity."

"Well, what about the other one, Aunt Katie? He can't be much like our janitor."

"The other man is much the same. You would think, wouldn't you?—I should—that he would see enough of the bothersome children, and would never speak to a child unnecessarily. But, instead, he is really interested in them, their home life, their older brothers and sisters who have gone from the school. He will often take a little tot on his knee, to warm her feet by the furnace in the winter mornings.

Somehow, instead of regarding him as their natural enemy, as janitors are apt to be regarded, every one of these five hundred children consider him a friend. I know lots of rich people and people of leisure, but these two are the most popular men in our part of the city."

"That's it," said mother. "Rob, you and your father are wrong. The best way to make yourself popular is to be really and truly interested in people."

"I shouldn't say, either, 'make yourself popular,'" said Aunt Kate. "I doubt if any one who directly tries to make himself popular, ever really becomes so. Be thoughtful and kindly, right in the midst of your work, and the popularity will take care of itself."—Southern Presbyterian.

more efficient minister to the public weal, a more sympathetic and helpful brother to all who bear the divine image in the form of man.

The public is asking of the college man, and it is justified in asking, not "What is your learning worth to you?" but "What is your learning worth to me and to the others who are without learning?" The culture of the college has justified itself from the standpoint of the man who has it, but can it justify itself in the eyes of the man who does not have it? Can the men with the hoe and the hod and the hammer be made to feel that the man with the book is really contributing something to their welfare?

This is the most serious, the most vital problem which the American college has on its hands to-day. It is vital, because, if the college permanently fails at this point, it will wither and die like a plant with its roots taken out of the ground. It is vital, because in most cases the college depends for its material support upon those who are not college men and who have, therefore, no interest in the perpetuation of any sort of education which is to be merely a private intellectual cult. It is vital, because we are all involved in a body politic in which all the members will suffer if any considerable group of members fail to contribute their part to the common good. Political and religious society is constantly threatened by the dangers of ignorance and selfishness, and the college is one of the chief defensive barriers standing between the principle of democracy and these perils which stand ever ready to destroy it.

A few days ago several thousand persons in East St. Louis were living and doing business on dry ground several feet below the level of the swollen river. A dike protected them. The dike had been placed there for just such an emergency. They did not know whether the dike would be strong enough to resist the force of the flood until the water should subside, but they devoutly hoped that it would, and when it weakened in spots, they strengthened it. A few persons, wanting to be in a position to give aid at a moment's notice, took their stations on the top of the dike. They ate there and slept there. But it was not their dike. Its business was not to keep them out of the flood, but to protect the low-lying miles and the thousands of people behind it.

Now the college bears something of the same relation to the dangers of ignorance and selfishness on the one hand, and the great level plain of common humanity on the other, that the dike bears to the swollen river and the protected city. When the college becomes supercilious and thinks of itself as existing for its own sake, it is the dike forgetting its mission, and saying to the bottom land, Behold, I am higher than thou. When college men and women look upon education as a means of gaining a private advantage over the less fortunate, it is the people on the dike leaving their work as rescuers and hunting comfortable corners where they may be at ease above the flood, as if the dike were built for them. And when the public looks askance at the colleges as luxuries for the few, and cherishes a feeling of resentment or hostility toward college men, it is the dwellers on the low ground growing angry at the dike and plotting to destroy it to spite the people who are on top.

This, then, must be the attitude of the college to the masses, and of the masses to the college. If the twentieth century shall put this principle into practice and shall imbue both the colleges and the public with this view of their mutual relations, it will have contributed to both education and democracy all that may reasonably be expected of one century.

What We Stand For.

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

To Clean Carpets.

If you have a carpet that looks dingy and you wish to restore it to its original freshness, make a stiff lather of Ivory Soap and warm water and scrub it, width by width, with the lather. Wipe with a clean damp sponge. Do not apply more water than necessary.

The vegetable oils of which Ivory Soap is made, and its purity, fit it for many special uses for which other soaps are unsafe and unsatisfactory.

Current Events

In spite of the obstruction by some interested parties, who ought really to be interested in securing the fullest possible investigation of any alleged irregularities in the department, the postal inquiry is now well under way. The President has refused to be influenced by the counsel of some of his too nervous advisors. No sane and sober minded person believes that the administration has anything to fear from the most rigorous investigation into the postal department, though some of the administration's appointees may have a good deal to fear. When a bookkeeper in a business house defaults, no one thinks it necessary to impeach the president and the entire board of directors. But if any member of the board of directors puts obstacles in the way of an investigation when there is good ground to believe that an employee is abusing his trust, then that director lays himself open to criticism and suspicion. Postmaster-General Payne has tried to pooh-pooh away the report of Mr. Bristow, fourth assistant postmaster-general. In this attempt he has been most unsuccessful. There are several things besides Banquo's ghost that will not down, and this is one of them. Mr. Payne has pointed out that some of the suspected officials were appointed by the late President McKinley and he thinks that a proper respect for the honored dead would preclude any inquiry into the conduct of his appointees. Such reasoning is unaccountable folly. Mr. McKinley's reputation is not involved and it cannot be made a cloak to hide the transgressions of postal officials. It is to be hoped that the President will find some means of conducting the investigation so that it will not be thwarted by the reluctance of the postmaster-general. The assistance of the new department of commerce has been invoked for the purpose of discovering the names of the stockholders in all of the corporations which have secured favorable contracts from the postal department. The law which created the new department gave it authority to make such inquiries. It is suspected that some officials in the postal service and other influential politicians will be found to be financially interested in the concerns to which contracts have been awarded.

While the vice-presidency itself is rather a barren honor, having no special attractiveness except the glamour of the campaign and the possibility of succeeding to the presidential office through the death of its incumbent, yet the choice of the candidate is counted as having some significance as giving to the state from which he comes that peculiar and elusive something called "recognition."

Political Geography.

There are some, for example, who say that the Republican party in Missouri ought to be "recognized" by choosing Mr. Roosevelt's running mate from that state. It is to be noted that those who say this are Missouri Republicans. Others say that California ought to be recognized and suggest the nomination of Ulysses S. Grant. Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General Bristow, of Kansas, is also mentioned largely for the same reason. Just what the politicians expect us to understand by that term "recognition" is not easy to understand. What we do, as a matter of fact, understand by it is that an appeal is made to state pride for campaign purposes. It is realized that in a national election, other things being equal, a state will give its vote to the ticket which bears the name of one of its own sons. But this holds good only where other things are very nearly equal, and for that reason political expediency demands that the nomination for the vice-presidency shall go to one of the doubtful states. That Mr. Roosevelt can carry California without the aid of a Californian on the ticket with him is almost as certain as that he cannot carry Missouri even with the help of a Missourian. Why then waste powder by giving the nomination to either of these states? Better give recognition where it may influence the result of the vote. If Indiana may be considered a doubtful state—and it is probably more uncertain than any of the other northern states having a large electoral vote—it would seem that a vice-presidential candidate might well be chosen from that state, especially as it has two senators who are perfectly eligible for the office, if they will accept it. Senators Beveridge and Fairbanks are both suitable men for the vice-presidency if they will accept it. And after all, while the office is seldom a stepping-stone to anything higher, it is far too important a post to be filled by a man of less than presidential caliber. Too often it has happened that a vice-president has been called to the executive chair by the death of the president. At this present time, with an example of this before our eyes, it would be the highest folly to nominate a man who would be incapable of filling the highest office with credit in case of an emergency.

We have gotten pretty well accustomed to the statement that the Fifteenth Amendment is inoperative in several states of the Union, but it has undoubtedly come with a shock of surprise to most of us to learn that in parts of at least one state the Thirteenth Amendment has been quite as effectively nullified. That a system of peonage or serfdom exists in several counties of Alabama has been proved by the confession of some of the guilty parties in the federal court at Montgomery. Ex-Sheriff Pace, who seems to have been the moving spirit in the whole business, plead guilty and has been sentenced to five years' imprisonment. This man owns plantations and mills requiring a large amount of labor. By co-operating with a ring of scoundrels in official positions, he secured the conviction of large numbers of negroes for imaginary crimes, and inaugurated a system of convict labor for his own benefit. The stories that are told of the cruelties practiced on these serfs would be incredible if they were not so amply authenticated. The following case is typical and is worth repeating in the words of one who has been making an investigation on the ground:

Contemporary Slavery.

One case in Lowndes county reveals the torture of a negro named Freeman. It is said he tried to get away from people who enslaved him.

Whatever it was that angered them, he was tied with his hands and feet, bound behind a horse and dragged a long distance along the road. This occurred less than thirty miles from Montgomery, the state capital.

Freeman was sent for by the Federal authorities. Two of his employers accompanied him to the very door of the government building. They rigged him out in fine style, with the best outfit of clothes obtainable, and when he was questioned he said he got nothing but the finest of treatment from his employers and remained with them willingly.

The Federal authorities were astonished at this statement, for their information about Freeman's treatment came from reliable sources.

Two hours later Freeman returned. He had gotten away from those who intimidated him. "Boss," said he, "if the government will protect me and I won't have to go back to Lowndes county, I'll tell the truth." He was assured full protection.

He confirmed the entire story of being tied behind the horse and being dragged. Not only that, but he told of inhuman beatings.

Government officials are loth to believe him under his previous statements and asked what he had to prove the truth of his tale of cruelty. He stripped and showed his back—one mass of welts, wounds, bruises and sores.

His evidence and that of others will be presented to the grand jury as soon as it can be gotten together in proper shape.

The steps which are now being taken in the federal court to break up this barbarous practice and to punish the culprits have the support of all the good people of the state. Happily, no political question is involved. It is not a matter of political rights or social equality or the negro vote, but merely a question whether the slave-driver is to be permitted to ply his trade in Alabama, defying the constitution of the state and of the United States, and prostituting the forms of judicial procedure to his own criminal ends.

A New York judge, in passing sentence upon a striker who had assaulted a non-union man, said some harsh things about the unions, including some things which are, in our opinion, too severe to be just. But with these he uttered one true word: "The question of wages is one to be settled between the employer and the employed, and cannot be dictated by any body of men." This does not mean that labor ought not to organize, but it does mean that the unions act ill-advisedly when they fix the rate of wages without consultation with the employers and without an adequate knowledge of the employer's side of the business. The terms of a contract are most amicably and satisfactorily arranged when the parties consult in their formulation. For one party to formulate its ideas in the shape of "demands" and present them as an ultimatum to the other party, is a procedure which puts all further discussion on a war basis. At the best it is "shirt-sleeve diplomacy" applied to a business requiring fine adjustment and infinite tact—the diplomacy of rolled-up shirt sleeves, at that. The unions and the employers both ought to know by this time that to begin negotiations by presenting "demands" is the quickest way not to get a satisfactory agreement.

In one city at least, Independence Day has been changed to accommodate the saloon men. We had supposed that the Fourth of July was not exactly a movable feast, but it seems now that the Fourth of July does not necessarily occur on July 4—especially if the liquor sellers can make more profit out of it on another day. At Bloomington, Ind., a celebration was planned and a fund was raised by subscription to defray the expenses. The saloonists pledged half of the money and thereby got great praise for their patriotism. Then they remembered that July 4 was a legal holiday on which their resorts must be closed. So the celebration was moved up a day to accommodate them, and on July 3, was held as beery a Fourth of July carnival as the most bibulous patriot could desire. It was a charmingly simple expedient and quite in keeping with the current popular view of our national holiday. The carnival's the thing, not the day nor the historic event for which it stands, nor the patriotic sentiment which is supposed to be fostered by it. The main point is to make a noise, to have a holiday, to sell beer. The day is only the excuse—and a slim enough one it is for all that is put upon it. The average Fourth of July celebration tells all this plainly enough, but the painful and pitiful part is seldom so clearly proved as in this alteration of the day to suit the convenience of the saloonkeepers.

Our government has selected the points on the Cuban coast which it wishes to occupy as coaling stations, according to the Platt amendment. The treaty embodying the terms of the lease has been signed and only awaits ratification. The Cuban government will buy from its private owners the property which has been selected, the money for this purchase being advanced by the United States. This sum is to be considered an advance payment on the rental, which is to be at the rate of $2,000 a year. The United States surrenders any claim that it may have to sovereignty over the Isle of Pines, the ownership of which had been left to be determined by treaty.

There have been many false and premature reports of the Pope's approaching death, until all such reports have come to be regarded with suspicion. But these erroneous reports cannot make him immortal and, with his frail physique and his more than ninety years the end must soon come. Dispatches from Rome assert that he is now lying at the point of death and that the news of the end may come at any hour. The aged pontiff has received the last sacrament and is prepared for death. The courtyard of the Vatican is filled with the carriages of the cardinals who have hurried to Rome to be ready for the conclave which will meet immediately upon the death of the Pope for the election of his successor. The rival candidates are marshalling their forces, but there is very great uncertainty as to the outcome among such a wide range of possibilities. The only things that are comparative certain are that the next pope will be an Italian, that he will be one of the present cardinals, and that he will be an old man. Short papal reigns are considered desirable so that the honor may be distributed among a greater number of persons. The cardinals are therefore careful, as a rule, not to elect a young and vigorous ecclesiastic with a prospect of long life. That is one of the chief objections to the election of Cardinal Rampolla, papal secretary of state. Leo himself was nearly seventy years old when he was chosen, and his long pontificate has been a great surprise to those who elected him.

The Iowa Republican convention, which was held last week, resulted in a compromise between old-line protection and the so-called "Iowa idea," which consists in using tariff reduction as an instrument for curbing the trusts. The tariff plank in the platform was written by Senator Allison, upon whose orthodoxy as a protectionist no suspicion has ever been cast, and was unanimously indorsed by the convention. On the other hand, Governor Cummins, the chief spokesman for the Iowa idea, was unanimously re-nominated on a clear statement that his views of the tariff were just what they had been during the past two years. So the convention really decided nothing as to the tariff question. What it did decide was that the two ideas can live together on peaceable terms without creating a schism in the party.

Late on the evening of July 4 the laying of the cable from California to the Philippines was completed by the arrival of the cable ship at the archipelago. Now, for the first time, is there a complete line of telegraphic communication around the world. President Roosevelt and Mr. Mackay, president of the Pacific Cable Company, both being at Oyster Bay on the day of the opening of the cable, exchanged congratulatory messages around the world. The new cable touches only at American territory, Hawaii, Guam and the Philippines. In granting the franchise to the Pacific Cable Company our government established a maximum rate of tolls under which it will save thousands of dollars a year over the former rates, provided that official dispatches should always have the right of way, and reserved the right to purchase the cable at any time at an appraised valuation. This arrangement is even better than a cable owned and operated by the government. In carrying this immense project to a successful conclusion, Mr Mackay fulfilled an ambition which his father had long cherished and performed a task which he inherited with his fortune.

Life and Organization.

Christianity and science alike have reached the conclusion that life precedes organization. In other words, life is the cause and not the product of organization. While this is now recognized as a general principle, its application to church organization has never been clearly apprehended by many. And yet we are sure that, on reflection, it will be seen that this principle is as true in the domain of religion as in any other form of life. It seems to us to have important bearings on the whole question of church organization. Let us consider some of its bearings.

Not only is it true that life precedes organization; it is also true that the kind of life determines the character of the organization. Organization is the method by which the life manifests itself and performs its normal functions. "And to every seed its own body," is the statement of this law as it relates to the vegetable world. Its use by the apostle, in connection with the doctrine of the resurrection, shows that, in his thought, enlightened as it was by the Spirit of God, the same principle applies to man, and that, too, in relation to his higher life. It seems safe to infer, not only from this argument of the apostle, but from all that we know of God's methods in all realms of life, that man's future glorified body will be a higher and finer organization adapted to the quality of the new and higher life, which man has attained through Christ.

But we are specially concerned now with the application of this law to church organization. How did the church come to take on the particular form or forms of organization which seem to be indicated in the New Testament? One answer to this question is that Christ either personally directed the apostles how to organize their churches, mentioning the specific officers, or that He inspired them to give to the church a particular form of organization. Another answer would be that the early church, following, of course, the advice of its inspired leaders, and guided by what seemed to be the needs of each particular church, selected men that would supply these needs. It seems more in accordance with God's method of working, to suppose that the early church felt itself at liberty to adopt such organization as the case demanded, that is to appoint certain men to do certain things, as they were needed, without any direct commandment from the Lord. It does not follow from this view that such organization was without divine sanction, for these men were seeking divine guidance in all that they did for the advancement of Christ's kingdom. At the same time it disproves the idea that there is a fixed and definite form of church organization given in the New Testament which must be followed in all cases and under all circumstances. It leaves the church free to adopt such methods of organization as will best promote the edification of its members and conserve all its interests, without violating any of its principles.

What we see, when we look into the New Testament after the church was established, is, at first, simply a body of believers. After a while certain of their number are appointed to serve certain specific needs. Later on, others were appointed to supply other needs. To say that such men were appointed under the guidance of the Spirit is not in conflict with the idea that this divine life in Christ was taking on an organism adapted to the work it was to accomplish. We cannot conceive that the Holy Spirit would suggest any form of organization that was not adapted to the needs of the church. As the cause spreads from Jerusalem to other cities, there were local congregations formed, each, so far as we can see, having the management of its own local affairs, yet considering itself a part of that one Church of which Christ was the Living Head. Each of these congregations, after a time at least, seems to have had two classes of officers, namely, deacons and presbyters or elders. These last were also designated as bishops, overseers or pastors. The first of these seems to have had charge of the material interests of the church looking after its poor, assisting in the ordinances, and perhaps taking a subordinate part in the religious services of the church. The bishops or overseers were appointed to serve the spiritual needs of the congregation in teaching, oversight and correction.

This much, then, we find in the New Testament in the way of church organization: the congregational polity, that is, the autonomy of the local churches, which were linked together, however, in the bonds of a common faith and a common work, and each local church provided with deacons and bishops to look after its material and spiritual interests. The experience of nineteen centuries has confirmed the wisdom of both the local organization, and the two classes of officers to supply its two classes of needs. Whatever names may be given to the men who minister to these needs of the church, the needs themselves are enduring; and men qualified and set apart to such work, are a necessity in order to the continuous growth and edification of the church. But whether the life of the church finds sufficient, and its only legitimate, expression, in this simple form of organization, and whether other agencies may be employed as needed, will be a subject for future consideration.

Reverent or Destructive?

We call attention to a letter from Bro. Allen Hickey, published elsewhere in this paper under the above head. According to Brother Hickey's understanding of the matter, those who recognize a human element in the Bible deny to that extent its inspiration. The word human is, with him, equivalent to false or erroneous. Those who see both the human and the divine elements in the Bible, are only "semi-believers" in the Bible, because they only accept an "element" in it! We wonder how many people have that conception of the Bible and of inspiration? If the number is very large there is certainly need for a "campaign of education" on the subject.

Is there a single intelligent Bible scholar in the world to-day that does not recognize the human element in the Bible? Not so far as we know. Evangelical believers, as well as rationalists, accept this fact; but the Bible with them is not less divine because the Holy Spirit has used the human element in its production. Were not the prophets and the apostles human beings? Did not the Holy Spirit quicken their thought and illuminate their understanding, and thus enable them to speak in harmony with the will of God? And yet each of these men used whatever talent, whatever literary style, whatever knowledge, he possessed, and their individual peculiarities are all manifest in their writings. Paul's style is very different from that of John, and Peter's is different from both of the others. Their way of conceiving and stating truth also differs. And yet what each of them said is no less inspired because of this human element that is used in communicating God's will to men.

The difference between evangelical and destructive critics, as we said, is that the former believe that in revealing Himself God speaks in and through men, and that we have both the human and the divine agencies working together; while the rationalistic or destructive school of critics do not accept the idea of the supernatural manifesting itself in human affairs, and therefore attempt to account for all religious phenomena, including the Bible, without the agency of the supernatural. To speak of the first class as "semi-believers," because they recognize the human agency as well as the divine, in the production of the Bible, is to speak without correct knowledge of the subject. Of course, in view of the statements just made, our brother's request for some "infallible proofs" by which we may know "whether any particular passage in the Bible belongs to the accepted or rejected element," is seen to be based on a total misconception of what is implied by the presence of the human and the divine elements in revelation.

The Bible is a much more precious and valuable book for human beings, such as we are, coming to us, as it does, through human beings like ourselves, struggling with the great problems of life and duty and destiny, of sin, of sorrow, and of death, uttering, each in his own way, the truths which God's Spirit has enabled him to see and to know, than if it had been handed down to us from heaven in some perfect language of the celestial world, without human agency. As God came near to us by manifesting Himself in the flesh, "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief," so His will has come near to us by manifesting itself in human life, in human struggles, in human thought, in human labor and achievement, a record of which we find in the Bible.

Moral and Positive Law.

Professor Grubbs, of the Bible College, Kentucky University, has an article in a recent number of the Christian Standard on "The Moral and Positive Law in Religion," which is marked by his usual clearness, and which, we think, helps to disentangle the subject from some confusion of thought. He points out that "the reason why the obligation expressed in a moral precept is binding through all dispensations, and never can be otherwise, is the essential relation which it sustains to the character of God." The commandment to keep the seventh day, as against any other day is not of this nature, he argues, since God might have selected the fifth or any other day for observance. But He never could "make a world in which lying would be a virtue and telling the truth be a vice," because this would be contrary to God's character. "Moral law is a mirror of the divine character, while positive law is an embodiment of the divine will."

It may be said in reply to the foregoing statement, that the divine will is an integral part of the divine character, just as our human wills are a part of our character; but while this is true, it is allowable to make the distinction, by using the terms in a limited sense, as the Professor does. The following paragraph states the distinction between the two classes of commands very clearly:

Let it be carefully noted that the difference between the two kinds of law pertains to the nature and source of obligation in each case. To show that a positive institution is not arbitrary, but reasonable and appropriate in its appointment, is no proof that it can be classified with moral commandments. The fitness and appropriateness of baptism and the Lord's Supper in answering the general purpose for which they were ordained, does not show that they ever could have existed as religious duties apart from the will of their divine Author, or that their existence is to be co-eternal with the existence of God Himself.

The old way of stating the argument in favor of the distinction above made laid emphasis upon the absence of any reason or fitness of baptism for the end it was intended to serve, and this very fact it was held, made it a suitable test of faith. It was the revolt against this extreme position that has led to an effort to obliterate all distinction whatever between the two classes of commands. And yet it must be recognized that the command to be baptized, and that to be holy and merciful, are binding upon men for different reasons, the former because God's wisdom has ordained it, the latter because God's character necessitates it.

A Needed Revival.

We mean the revival of zeal for reality—for things rather than names. It is astonishing how many of us are deceived by mere words. We may be exceedingly zealous for words while comparatively careless about what the words stand for. Let us get beneath words, which may become mere party Shibboleths, to the realities which they signify.

We say we believe in Christian union. Do we really believe in it, and love to mingle with other Christians in worship or in some form of public service, or do we love it as a party slogan? No doubt most of us love the real thing, but we are persuaded that some just love the theory, and care little about the practice. The man who really loves union will seek every opportunity of manifesting it and practicing it. We believe there should be a revival of our love for the unity of believers, such as animated the Campbells in the inauguration of their work, but it should be the real thing, not a party cry. There can be no real Christian unity except under the inspiration and leadership of the Holy Spirit, who is the author of unity. Only as we are guided by the Spirit can we promote real unity.

We believe in conversion. But what is conversion? It is the actual turning about of the sinner from the pursuit of unrighteousness to follow Christ, in daily living and daily cross bearing for His sake. Is this what we mean by the term? Let us see to it that we hold conversion up to this scriptural ideal. The church needs nothing so much to-day as really converted members, who are seeking to do as Christ would like to have them do.

In a word, let us be done with all shams and pretenses in all departments of our work, and in our individual lives, seeking to get down to the bed rock of reality. So shall we put ourselves in such relation to God as to receive the fullness of blessing He is ever ready to bestow.

No one has been so severe in denunciation of the merely literal, or rather, apparent compliance with divine requirements as Jesus himself. Hear him as he says, "Why call ye me Lord and do not the things I command?" or "ye tithe mint, anise and cummin and forget the weightier matters of the law." "Man looketh upon the outward appearance but God looketh upon the heart."

Editor's Easy Chair.

And this is Macatawa? Here, indeed, is the same old lake, singing the same old anthem and presenting the same wide expanse of blue waters, with their varying tints and changing moods. The same sand dunes lift their domes of silica against the further approach of the restless waves, crowned with the same trees clothed with an unusually luxuriant and fresh-looking foliage. Here, too, is Black Lake, one of the gems of inland lakes, set in a frame of green and gold—an important feature and factor in Macatawa life. Many of the same familiar faces that have greeted us in past years are here to greet us again. And yet this is not the Macatawa we knew a dozen years ago. Think of a broad, six feet granitoid walk, running west from the hotel to lake Michigan, and then south along the lake front clear past Edgewood-on-the-lake, and all brilliantly illuminated at night with electric lights! Up along the winding roadways, through the forests, electric lights gleam out at night, where once the fire-fly was the only rival to the moon and stars.

The people call all this improvement, and so it is from a commercial or business point of view. But from the point of view of a man seeking rest from the ways of city life, and hungering for rural scenery and an entire change of program, involving a return to a more primitive style of living, these innovations are of doubtful utility. Such an one prefers the winding pathway, soft with the leaf-mould of generations of oak, to the unyielding granitoid, the mild radiance of moon and stars and even of a candle, to the glare of an electric bulb, and the songs of the wild birds to the highest, ear-piercing notes of the prima donna. This, you say, is backwoods. Of course it is, and that is the very kind of woods for which a tired man's soul longeth, yea, even fainteth. Else why would he leave the city at all, where civilization is supposed to put on its latest touches, and where the heartless tyrant, Fashion, imposes her heaviest taxes and her most galling chains?

It does not follow that one wishes to return to barbarism, or savagery, because he is anxious to escape the conventionalities, the artificial burdens, and the social exactions of that highly complex thing which we are pleased to call modern civilization, as it manifests itself in city life. It means only that he would like to get away from artificialities and hollow formalities to the primal source of things, and look at life and its deeper meanings with a vision unobscured by the smoke of city factories and the disturbing news of the market reports. One can get nearer the heart of things lying on his back in a hammock, watching the white cloud-ships sail by through the upper sea of ether, than by studying all the philosophies and political economies issuing from our over-worked printing presses. There is no substitute for the direct, individual thought of each individual soul, stimulated it may be, but not determined or controlled by the thought of any other man.

But then, thank heaven, men cannot obscure all the beauty of nature! And here at Macatawa there are large sections of it, yet, to appeal to the heart of him that loves nature. The scene that lies before us now as we pencil these lines would attract the enthusiastic admiration of most of our readers and all the lovers of the Easy Chair. The sheen of an afternoon sun has converted the great lake into a sea of glass. The Chicago boat, just arriving, is the only object to break the far-extended view. To the right, up Cedar walk, the roadway winds through a green lane of trees. The boat is just entering the channel and its upper deck is crowded with visitors. The hotels and boarding houses will welcome them, for the season is backward. T. P. Haley and wife, Major Hallack and family, T. Crittendon and family, all of Kansas City, have been here some time. Judge Sandusky and family and A. B. Jones, of Liberty, have just arrived. Brothers Hughes, Bennet and Earl have been here for many days. Geo. H. Combs has joined his family here, and is painting his cottage with his own hand. The colony grows daily. The blinds on "Edgewood-on-the-lake" have only just been taken down.

Notes and Comments.

The Christian Standard's silence in regard to its editor's late heresy on baptism is still almost deafening in its intensity. The Pacific Christian says that "the Standard's silence on the question mentioned is reverberating all along the Pacific coast in spite of the furious torrent of its verbosity on another subject. The well-known fact is that about a dozen years ago the present editor of the Standard was arguing for the admission of the unimmersed into our churches. We have never heard from him any acknowledgment of his error on this important point. There are a few things which we would like to know: First, has he changed his views on this subject? Second, if so, when? Third, if so, why? Was he moved to the change by assault or by persuasion? It is not on record that he was attacked bitterly when he held those opinions. His own experience (if he really has been led to put away his error) ought to convince him that gentle measures are the most effective in leading wanderers back into the way of truth.

We referred last week to the comment of Bro. M. E. Harlan, of Brooklyn, N. Y., on a sermon by Dr. Hillis on the subject of Christian Union, as reported in the Brooklyn Eagle. It seems that the discussion has awakened considerable interest, resulting in a letter from Bro. Harlan to Dr. P. S. Henson, Baptist, who, in commenting upon Dr. Hillis's sermon, had taken very much the same view as that of Bro. Harlan. The following extract from Bro. Harlan's letter will be of interest to our readers:

I am ready to unite on the principles you announced in your last Sunday's sermon, and begin the practice of that union right here in Brooklyn, "the City of Churches." Our own personal opinions we will hold as matters of personal opinion, and not intrude them upon our brethren as tests of fellowship. We can afford to do this for the sake of union and for Christ's sake, as well as for the sake of the unsaved masses who have no churches and no pastors because a divided church has been squandering her Lord's money in building and sustaining many churches in the best localities on the same block through denominational pride and for denominational prestige, while the poorer districts are poorly equipped with churches. I am willing, if necessary, to resign my pastorate and advise my congregation to unite with this union church. The money that is now used to support the church where I labor can then be used in destitute regions or on heathen fields, and the building which we now occupy can be removed to some more needy field. This one union church can then do a better work than two of the same kind in the same field. The church where I am now pastor is within three blocks of the Sixth Avenue Baptist Church. Instead of having two churches so close together, we will then have one. The money thus saved can be added to the equipment for work, and make the church much more efficient. Why should this be thought to be visionary if we both are willing to wear New Testament names and engage in New Testament practices? . . . Our union church will then stand for a personal faith in Christ which leads to repentance and a regenerated life. We will practice New Testament baptism and wear a New Testament name.

That sounds very much like practicing Christian union as well as preaching it. Elsewhere we have called attention to the need of a real advocacy of Christian union which the advocates are willing to put into practice. Bro. Harlan's letter seems to be of that character, as is still further evident from the following additional extract:

In addition to this I hereby offer myself to this union church as a missionary either at home or abroad. To this glorious end I am willing to sink all denominational pride, not to save Christ or to please men, but to please Christ and save men. Let us quit talking about the difficulties and about it being impractical and view the question from Calvary. To the man of weak faith the salvation of the world is a very impractical and impossible thing. Let us be so busy with doing His will that we have no time to doubt His plans. We will be pardoned, I am sure, if we spend our time delivering His message and let the Lord settle the question of the "decrees" and "irresistible grace" and "God's sovereignty." Now while God's Spirit is striving mightily with His people, let us enter the matter prayerfully for this "kind goes out only by fasting and prayer!" Let Him work in us "that which is well pleasing in His sight."

Dr. Henson expressed himself to the reporter as "in entire sympathy with the fraternal sentiments expressed" and his willingness to do all he can "to bring about what he suggests." He adds: "It is in evidence that we are getting very near together, and that is gratifying. A union of two such denominations seems practical, but Dr. Harlan and I will meet and talk it all over and see what can be done." Our readers will watch with interest for the further development of this correspondence.

The Christian Standard of June 27 is a specially large and copiously illustrated number. In the number and character of its half-tones, the variety and ability of its articles, and the wide territory it covers, the number is highly creditable to the enterprise of the publishers. Its success, too, in enlarging its circulation seems to have been phenomenal. In all this we can but congratulate our contemporary. We most sincerely deplore, however, its course in the matter of the Berkeley Bible Seminary. The report of the trustees of that institution, vindicating its dean against the charges which the Standard has made against him, would have been a most valuable feature of this number. No plea of fear of a libel suit can justify the Standard in its failure to deal fairly and justly with men and institutions. A religious journal can better afford to have a dozen libel suits than to endure the suspicion that it is unwilling to apologize for its mistakes and unjust charges and make due reparation. We know that hundreds of the Standard's best friends sincerely regret its unfair course toward the Berkeley Bible Seminary and the California brethren. No prosperity resting on injustice can possibly be permanent.

The Christian Church at Franklin, Ind., dedicated a $25,000 church building free of debt last Lord's day. Z. T. Sweeney preached an able discourse in the forenoon and made an appeal in his own successful way for $10,000 to provide for all indebtedness, as $15,000 had been previously subscribed. This was nearly all pledged in the forenoon and the remainder at night, making an aggregate of $10,247, which will be swelled by other subscriptions. The editor of this paper made a brief address at a union communion service in the afternoon and preached at night. The patience, courtesy and interest manifested by the entire audience, in remaining throughout the money raising excelled anything we ever witnessed. Their liberality, too, was most praiseworthy. The pastor, Charles R. Hudson, who has been six years with the church, has given the highest proof of his efficiency in the erection of this new and beautiful stone building and in the character of the congregation. He graduated at the State University and afterwards spent a year at Yale. He goes East this summer for some special studies. We hope to present fuller report with cuts of building and pastor next week.

Faith and Uncertainty By N. J. Aylsworth

We live in a world of uncertainty. But few of the things that concern us most deeply, and on which we are called to act, rest on a basis of uncertainty. All our prospects, all for which we are living, is uncertain. This would be a most deplorable fact, but that we are provided with a faculty to meet and deal with uncertainty.

In a world of light we have eyes; in a world of sound we have ears; in a world of difficulty we have energy; in a world of dangers we have courage; in a world of uncertainty we have faith.

The youth has begun his education in early childhood, and expects to go through college and then study for a profession, finishing his course of preparation for life at perhaps twenty-five or twenty-eight years of age. All this long and laborious course of study is simply preparation for the life that is to follow. And yet a large part of the race die before twenty-five, and young people are falling on every side. This future for which he is preparing is very uncertain. There is only a probability that he will live to reap the reward of this preparation. Yet he works with the same energy as if it were certain. The vision that lures him stretches on to the eighties. There is no coffin in it. A coffin at twenty-eight would paralyze his efforts. He knows there may be one there, but thinks he has a probability of longer life; and he deals with this probability with the same energy as though it were a certainty.

Nor is this all. The uncertainty does not make him unhappy. He is heart-whole and as full of buoyancy as though his future were certain. He lives for and rejoices in the bright vision, without fear. A wonderful faculty, that enables us to rest, to be strong, and be glad in a world of uncertainty! In the presence of danger the man of courage is not unnerved. There is something of fear, but it is quickly met and quelled by courage, and he remains heart-whole. He is not unhappy. He may even choose a life of danger, as the man of energy rejoices in overcoming difficulties. So faith keeps us heart-whole in the presence of uncertainty, and quenches fear in the strength of a robust hopefulness. The exercise of noble faculties is the highest felicity, and we should be less happy if everything were on a dead level of certainty. It is because this is a world calling for effort, for courage, for manly qualities, that man is man, and able to enjoy in his splendid way, and it is in an atmosphere of uncertainty that faith takes wing and he becomes sublime and glad in a strong, new way. Heaven cannot be a world of lazy rest, or it would paralyze our nobler manhood. There is a sense of rest in all our masterful faculties—in energy, in courage, in faith—and this is the better rest.

What is true of the student is true of all the enterprises of life. The farmer labors in uncertainty. He can never know that he will reap, but he toils on, happy in his probable prospect. So of the business man. Firms are failing all about him; his success is uncertain. The great financiers are masters in the realm of uncertainty. They can venture, they can wait, they can be calm (and calmness is rest) where others would be unmanned. They walk sure-footed at dizzy heights where others would fall. The sagacious statesman beats with mighty wing an atmosphere of uncertainty.

How largely our happiness depends on this splendid faculty can probably be best seen from those cases of disease where the mental faculties become weakened by exhaustion. Just as the man whose vital heat has been lowered by disease is chilled by the slightest cold, and must sometimes wear fur cap and overcoat in summer weather, so those whose robust hopefulness has been weakened find all uncertainty painful. They may not dare to cross a street where men are moving, or go into a crowd, for fear of getting hurt. They are afraid they will come to want, that they will have certain diseases, or that their present disease will prove fatal, and have a thousand other fears so common to nervous exhaustion. They are not insane, but the faith faculty has become weakened, and they are a prey to fears. These things that they fear are not probable, but they are possible, and their power to meet uncertainty and remain restful has been weakened. Sometimes the fear of death is a perpetual torture to them. So would it be to us all without this faculty. Enveloped in uncertainty and with the arrows of death flying all about us, we sleep sweetly and life is happy.

There is, however, a degree of uncertainty which faith cannot master for happiness, though it may remain strong for action. If a little child lie nigh unto death, with but one chance out of many for its recovery, the parents will spare no effort and no sacrifice to save it, but they cannot be happy. When evidence sinks below probability, faith may work vigorously even heroically, but the situation will be painful.

What religious lessons may we draw from these facts?

The sceptic tells you that he will not believe anything that he cannot prove. Can he prove that he will live ten days? or that his business will succeed? Yet he lives and acts—labors hard—on these expectations, and without such faith he would soon come to want. Let him do regarding religion as he does regarding this life and he will become a devoted and energetic Christian worker. He is a man of faith in this life; let him be so regarding the next. God has not placed the prizes of either world on the dead level of our lower faculties. They do not come to the lazy, who toil not; to the cowardly who fear; to the faint-hearted who believe not. God has put the treasures of both worlds on a high shelf, where they are to be reached by the use of the understanding, by energy, by courage, by faith. Religious verities rest on good, wholesome probabilities, such as we act upon in this life and are happy; and while certainty is more comfortable in any case, it may not always be for the best—any more than idleness, which is more comfortable than labor. Why should not this splendid faculty be made to work in religion as well as in the secular affairs of this life? Salvation is by faith in both worlds.

While the evidence of probability for religious truth is ordinarily so strong that the heart can rest in it and be at peace, there are painful periods when this probability sinks to a lower level. In the growth of knowledge there comes a time when all things must be put to the test. The very fact that truths more dear to us than life itself should be brought to trial, is painful in the highest degree; and disquieting, but immature reports that often go forth during the investigation are exceedingly troubling. But these things must be, and it is probably best. It is a perilous hour when the eagle stirreth up her nest and casteth out her young to beat the thin air with their weak wings, but it is best so. It would be pleasant to lie undisturbed in the nest that our fathers have made, for it is easy to believe what has long had the stamp of approval; but it might not be best for our faith. Abraham's faith wrestled with awful uncertainties before he could become "the father of the faithful." A drop in probabilities is a challenge to faith, and a part of its stern education. The body cannot thrive without toil, nor faith without trial. The present is a good time for the growth of faith, and faith with many is growing. It was a chilly time for faith thirty years ago, but materialism, that then threatened to engulf all, has not been accepted as the truth of life. The thud of the mallet is still heard at the foundations; it is our challenge to growth. But how grow strong? In many ways which I have not space to mention. One is by being long-visioned. Be a man of the centuries, not of the moment. This is not the first time that cherished spiritual verities have seemed in peril; but what has been lost that we would preserve. Take long views and be calm. Then, new investigations are bringing to light some splendid confirmations undreamt of before. All will be well. Suspense is not comfortable; but faith was made for suspense, and a waxing faith may even grow restful in its presence. Do uncertainties encompass? It is faith's splendid hour. Grow mighty-hearted and be at rest. The very strain will give us strength.

America Revisited. I.

By William Durban

After an interval of three and a half years, it is my very great privilege and pleasure to land again on these western shores. To see America once was no small advantage, but that experience had the same effect as a first pilgrimage among the Alps. A thirst is awakened for a renewal of the acquaintance made. It is a law in political economy that the supply is created by the demand, but in psychology the converse principle works very potently, for the supply very often stimulates a further requisition of the soul for satisfaction. Having seen something of this mighty American country and people in the year of our great jubilee convention at Cincinnati, I have been longing ever since to come again. And here I am! But just where am I at this moment?

Lake Hopatcong.

Fifty miles across the Hudson lies, in the lap of the Northern New Jersey landscape, one of the loveliest lakes I have ever looked upon. Hopatcong is said to be the gem of the lakes in the whole region of the eastern states. Like a jasper jewel it is set in an emerald environment, for the Schooley Hills, rising on every side, are covered from the water's edge up to the summit of every peak with primeval forest. Except where the tiny clearings are made for the pleasure-cottages that are dotted about the margin and in the bosom of the woods, the whole district is as God made it and the Indians left it. There is not a real village anywhere within ten miles. It is a curious anomaly that so wild and romantic a region, covering some hundreds of square miles, should exist in its original condition within two hours' ride of New York.

Of course this is a summer paradise, for only a few people have made it their permanent abode. But close to Mr. Hudson Maxim's cottage, where I am staying, dwells a remarkable man whose acquaintance I have hastened to make. Dr. Theodore Gessler, secretary of the American Baptist Congress, was the "discoverer" of Hopatcong, for he was the first man to purchase a lot and to build a cottage here for summer residence. This, he tells me, he did thirty years ago. I have been sitting with him by the shore talking of matters of mutual interest. He has handed me the report of the Baptist Congress held at Boston last November. It is a goodly volume. Some of the papers read by eminent men give singular evidence of the changes which are rapidly coming over the spirit of American Baptists.

Ecclesiastical Rapprochement.

Dr. Gessler tells me that there is a confident expectation in his own denomination of a reunion at no distant date between the Baptists and the Disciples of America. His reason for the hope is that the Baptists are steadily gravitating toward the position held by the Disciples on certain points, while there is a similar tendency on the part of the latter to smooth certain harsh angularities, not so much of opinion, as of the uncompromising expression of them. I explained to the doctor that I had been trained as an Anglican, had from conviction after investigation become what is sometimes in my own country termed a "Spurgeonite Baptist," and had finally settled through further study amongst the Disciples of Christ. This seemed much to interest Dr. Gessler. He has been a Baptist all his life, and has occupied pastorates in succession at the First Baptist Church, Elizabeth, N. J.; the Central Church, Brooklyn; and Grace Church, New York City. And now in the beautiful sunset of his life he lives the year round in the superlative sanctuary which is here provided at nature's feet in woodland and lakeland, preaching and lecturing intermittently among the churches which best know him and most value him.

The Broader Lines.

In what direction do I thus discover that the American Baptists are broadening their horizon? Dr. Gessler is a good authority, and he makes it clear that the changes are in two directions. In the first place, there is on all sides a relaxation of the old rigid communion regulations. In the next place, the hardshell canons of criticism are being cast into the modern melting-pot. "A few years ago," said the doctor, "we determined when constructing our congress program, to invite representative men from our universities to put before us their views as to the higher criticism. We made a curiously embarrassing discovery. We found out that we could easily secure more of our collegiate professors than were needed to advocate the progressive view, but could not obtain any one at all, of authoritative standing, to undertake to argue in favor of the conservative side. This opened our eyes to the stupendous revolution which had been silently taking place." I took occasion, after listening to Dr. Gessler's conversation on this point, to say that in Britain there has been nothing like the same proportion of departure from the old lines. One reason is that we are within sound of the echoes of German neology, which has initiated such extreme rationalist vagaries that the higher critics of the destructionist school are viewed with widespread suspicion. Another reason for the more cautious acceptance of results which include at least a considerable measure of hypothetical and unproved conclusions, is to be found in the strain put upon the Free churches of Britain by their historic and constant struggle with the state church.

Baptism and Membership.

Though I did not come here to Lake Hopatcong in order to study, but rather to enjoy an interval of "dolce non far niente," as the idle Neapolitan lazzarone say, for I have been leading a very strenuous life—editing, preaching, examining Bible correspondence, papers, and writing magazine articles,—yet I have once more found that a holiday is sure for an active spirit to be a season of fresh thought. The great Baptist report which I have mentioned is giving me fresh suggestions, and these are of the most encouraging kind. It is evident in the light of what I am reading in this volume that the denominational life of the American religious society is not tending to sectarian stagnation or crystallization, but that Christians are beginning to look each other in the eyes with glances of sympathetic yearning. I can see this, that on the crucial question of immersion as a test of fellowship the four millions of American Baptists are seriously contemplating the assumption of an attitude which will be almost identical with that of the Disciples of Christ. I long ago

Personality in English Literature

By Prof. W. D. Howe

Mr. Stopford Brooke defines English literature as "what great English men and women thought and felt, and then wrote down in good prose and beautiful poetry in the English language." This definition is at best superficial, but will satisfy our present need when we wish to consider the varying degrees of personality which these "great English men and women" have shown in the long story through the centuries.

It may be generally affirmed that one of the distinguishing differences between primitive poetry (our earliest form of literature) and poetry of the highest civilization is that in the first the individual writer is nothing, while in the latter the personal poet is everything. Thus the epic and the ballad, the earliest forms of poetic composition, are characterized by impersonal authorship and appealed to a homogeneous crowd of well-nigh equal intelligence; as civilization advances the individuality of the author becomes more marked and the range of appeal is often more limited. So we pass from the epic, where the author is of no consequence, to the lyric where the author's feelings, hopes, desires, pains, are of all consequence. This development will in the main apply, though of course there are exceptions. The main dictum, however, will hold that in the march of civilization the stress is more and more laid upon the individual, as author or as reader.

Readers and students observe with interest the varying degrees of individuality which these "great men and women" reveal. In this way we learn to know more or less of the work which makes up the literary record of the nation. As we go back to the host of writers that have given us this rich heritage we are surrounded by men and women who are better known to us than many of the real people about us. Geoffrey Chaucer, with the twinkle in his eye, his finger raised at you, lures you on from tale to tale. Not a smile escapes him, dry and dull he seems to be, yet how much of light, sparkling merriment ripples through the pages when he draws the people of his time. Yet back of all you see the practical, active Geoffrey working at the docks in London, perhaps, and all the time wishing to be out among the daisies on May day. Whoever has read the lines of our first great poet and fails to see the real man behind the work, has read with little profit.

There are so many such authors in literature. We read them over and over because we like to get a little closer to them as men and women. Thus the study of literature becomes a direct blessing to him who looks behind to the throbbing life that has created the work. Some critics seek to regard only the external forms of things. The work of the great author is only ore for the crucible, which by them is to be made over into something worth while. Are we not rather to bring ourselves into sympathy with that which is the breath and spirit of the great men and women? It much repays the time and trouble to draw up close to those of the past and let them talk into your ear.

Did you ever read Isaak Walton? Take him out some day when you are alone by the river and let him chatter to you in unison with the stream. The great out-doors will mean more to you and be a happier place for you to be. Why? Just because you have as a companion a happy, healthful, hopeful fisherman with plenty of humor and plenty of pathos half concealed. You can read page after page of the modern nature book and not get as near to the heart of the world as after a few minutes with "The Compleat Angler."

There stands pious Bunyan! The modern school boy (pity him!) has no time for Bunyan. Reading Bunyan will not make you earn a large salary. In the course of the specialist Bunyan will have no place. And yet this old Puritan has a great deal to say about something which was long before trusts and traction companies, and probably will be long after trusts and traction companies. Yes, Bunyan, the poor cobbler working by the dim light of a prison window, tells of life as it must be lived by every man and woman who treads this planet.

Who does not like Dick Steele? Who does not pity Dick Steele? "Poor Dick Steele stumbled and got up again, and got into jail and out again, and sinned and repented, and loved and suffered, and lived and died scores of years ago. Peace be with him! Let us think gently of one who was so gentle; let us speak kindly of one whose breast exuberated with human kindness." What a rich heritage is the writing of a man so full of sympathy!

So we may follow the stream down the centuries. Again and again the warm hand is extended out of the past to draw you close to a kindly heart. Thomas Gray, scholar and poet, takes you to him in his letters and gives us his little preferences and dislikes. Cowper, so gentle and simple, yet so sad, fills you with a deeper love for the little animals of the field and forest. Above all Robert Burns, the poet of the Scotch fireside, and indeed of every fireside the world over, opens his heart in every lyric and to every beat there responds the heart of every lover of the simple life.

We cannot extend our list by writing of chattering Pepys, of sober Evelyn, of ingenious Daniel Defoe, of Samuel Johnson, dictator, of humorous Henry Fielding; nor of those who lived so near to us that they are almost our contemporaries—Thackeray, the greatest satirist of life, Dickens, the moralist, Byron, the posing revolutionist, Shelley and Coleridge, the dreamers, Sidney Smith, the humorist, Lamb, the beloved Charles, or the cheerful R. L. S.

As long as the great English men and women continue to write down in good prose and beautiful poetry their thoughts and feelings, we shall be eager to understand those thoughts and feelings. We should ever be eager to come close to some of the great spirits that have created work that endures. We should not forget that life is as far as we can get in this world, and that life should be our supreme interest. If we remember this, we shall never cease to read literature and to strive to know the men and women revealed in literature.

BABY WEATHER.

Little Fellows Don't Like the Hot Days.

Mothers should know exactly what food to give babies in hot weather.

With the broiling hot days in July and August the mother of a baby is always anxious for the health of her little one, and is then particularly careful in feeding. Milk sours quickly and other food is uncertain. Even in spite of caution, sickness sometimes creeps in and then the right food is more necessary than ever.

"Our baby boy, two years old, began in August to have attacks of terrible stomach and bowel trouble. The physician said his digestion was very bad and that if it had been earlier in the summer and hotter weather, we would surely have lost him.

"Finally we gave baby Grape-Nuts food, feeding it several times the first day, and the next morning he seemed better and brighter than he had been for many days. There was a great change in the condition of his bowels and in three days they were entirely normal. He is now well and getting very strong and fleshy, and we know that Grape-Nuts saved his life, for he was a very, very ill baby. Grape-Nuts food must have wonderful properties to effect such cures as this.

"We grown-ups in our family all use Grape-Nuts and also Postum in place of coffee, with the result that we never any of us have any coffee ills, but are well and strong." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The reason Grape-Nuts food relieves bowel trouble in babies or adults is because the starch of the grain is pre-digested and does not tax the bowels, nor ferment like white bread, potatoes and other forms of starchy food.

The American Christian Educational Society and Its Problems

By R. P. Shepherd

The following language, used recently by one of New York's most felicitous editorial writers, is the impelling cause of this article, and will serve admirably for our text. Commenting on a teapot tempest in a Maine college, the editor deplores the "utterly unnecessary row—which is also a pity, since, though Colby holds no exalted rank among educational institutions, it has been of much real use to no inconsiderable number of more or less ambitious boys and girls whose resources were less than their needs, and who had to go to college where they could, instead of where they would."

Two educational ideals lie implicit in the foregoing expression. Two classes of educational institutions have arisen for the realization of the two ideals. In one class are the institutions which aim at nothing less than exalted rank as educational plants, and, in proportion to their realization of this ideal, they appeal for patronage to all classes and conditions. But no inconsiderable number find it, or think they find it, impossible to go where they would; they cast about to find where they can go. For their patronage are a multitude of competing schools and colleges, which, content with comparatively low educational standards, base their claims for recognition on cheapness, short cuts to degrees, denominational loyalty, and a host of like allurements.

It must not be thought for a moment that these classes of colleges follow along lines of proportionate bulk. Mere bigness is sometimes incompatible with exalted educational ideals, while a small college may have pronounced advantages compatible with the highest ideals of academic culture.

It is scarcely too much to say that, taking our brotherhood as a whole, our educational consciousness, conscience, and definite ideals have barely begun to develop.

The pioneers of our educational work did not accept as valid the need of endowments. Some disastrous experiments were needed for our practical experience—and the experiments were made. Such endowments as were sought were rather for the purpose of perpetuating the plant than providing for constantly enlarging usefulness and conformity with generally advancing educational standards. The result of this policy is witnessed by the statement by the graduates of several of our colleges that had they not graduated at — they would have gone to no college, since that was the only one within their reach. Such an expression is quite common.

The colleges have made commendable efforts to unite these two ideals in a single institution, to appeal for patronage to those whom the low cost of a college was a paramount consideration, and at the same time to keep pace with the higher and broader standards of the colleges of exalted ideals. Such a plan is by no means impossible to carry to successful issue, but it ought to be apparent even to the dullest intellect, that to succeed along this line requires resources far greater in proportion than if charges are to be raised correspondingly to increased cost of instruction, or the educational standard confined to the limits set by the necessities of cheapness. If all the advantages of high ideals of Christian scholarship are to be attained by our colleges it seems that but two alternatives are available, and no middle ground between them. The cost to the student must be materially increased or, if this cost is to remain stationary or be lessened, provision must be made for greatly increased income from invested endowments. If neither of these courses is possible and practicable, it seems inevitable that we must continue to subordinate the ends of scholarship to those of cheapness, and seek our patronage among those "whose resources are less than their needs," and who go to college where they can, and not where they desire to go.

The problem of the American Christian Educational Society is twofold; it has to do with the church on the one hand, and with the colleges on the other. The problem is complicated by our religious condition and by the situation of the colleges among themselves and in their anomalous relation to the church.

"We as a people" are essentially a religious democracy, a radical individualism, rather than a congregationalism or organized unit. Any semblance of denominational control is instantly combatted as a suspicious and dangerous invasion of our liberties. This condition constitutes our greatest strength in all that pertains to pure evangelization. But we would be stronger for future labors of every sort if we could recognize and frankly admit that the entire lack of denominational control is the most serious weakness of our work in protecting our ministry, in insuring representative journalism, and is the greatest handicap in all matters where concerted action is desirable and essential, particularly in all our missionary enterprises, including that of education. The expenses of our missionary boards are astonishingly low in view of the nature of their difficulty in bringing moral suasion to bear over such a heterogeneous body as constitutes our brotherhood.

We do not consider the work of the colleges as essentially our work. The institutions have grown up somehow, no matter how, and here come their representatives asking us to support their work, a work in which we are not overmuch concerned. Only those who go before the churches in behalf of the colleges can appreciate the bare toleration they often receive from both preacher and people. Appeals for money are not regarded usually as opportunities for investment in business enterprises of magnificent possibilities, but rather they are met by the most meager gift that will serve to get rid of the beggar and quiet the conscience of the begged.

Statistics of college attendance from the families of our brotherhood are extremely hard to get, and are always unreliable. But one of our conservative statisticians estimates that five college students go from our homes to other colleges than our own, for each one who enters some one of our colleges. Obviously, other institutions are giving inducements which our colleges are not, and it cannot be along the lines of cheapness; examination of our catalogues reveals that that is one of our strongest competitive appeals.

The situation warrants the conclusion that "we as a people" have so abandoned ourselves to the second and third items of the Great Commission that it has taken great expense and effort to arouse us to the consciousness that the "Go" and "Teach" are inseparable items of the mission imposed originally upon men who had just finished a course of three years in the best college this world has ever known.

To identify the interests of college and church in the individual minds of our Christian democracy is, therefore, one of the first and most imperative—as well as most difficult—problems before the American Christian Educational Society.

The second feature of the problem may be summarized more briefly. The colleges, if they really desire the concerted support of the church, must forget unseemly rivalries and merge their interests, co-operate unitedly and harmoniously in an insistent and persistent affirmation of their place, function, needs and possibilities; they must seek to conform to the progressive educational life of which they are a part; appeal, not to the past, the sacrifices of the fathers, denominational loyalty (for we are short on that commodity) and alumni obligations, but to the worthiest and loftiest ideals of wholesome Christian culture for the rank and file of our young people, as well as for the incipient ministry. Things are not as they were. Men are giving today for the realization of ideals as they have never done before. We have our own Rockefellers, Carnegies, Hearsts, Pearsons and the like. Give to us preachers the best talking points on the practical and practicable ideals of the best Christian culture which your academic training and opportunities may inspire in your imaginations, and you will find your utterance multiplied with a surprising willingness.

Such a consolidation of educational interests and inspiration is the second problem before the ambitious American Christian Educational Society.

One Touch of Nature: A Drummer's Story

By E. C. Ferguson

It was Sunday in the big hotel. It was cheerful and warm enough within, but out on the street the snow was coming in fitful gusts out of the northwest, the home and birthplace of that typical American product—the blizzard, before it starts on its mad career of destruction, with pitiless cold that pierces the very marrow. Guests were scattered round about, some smoking, some reading letters, few doing anything in particular. The hardware man was writing up his orders by a desk near the door. He had a grim, set face and his voice was as harsh and rasping as one of his own files, but it was generally known that when he went after orders he got them.

The fat man who sold oil, talked to the day clerk in a soft, lubricating tone as he leaned with one elbow on the cigar case. The long, thin man who sold groceries sat with his feet on the rail looking out at the increasing storm. The very young, little fellow who registered from Indianapolis with a great flourish and who sold white goods, was demanding of the clerk's assistant when he could catch a train for Keokuk, and what was the best hotel, incidentally remarking that his house expected him to stop at the very best, all in a very unnecessarily loud tone. A first tripper, evidently. He had that fact written all over him. A tenderfoot among veterans, but bless you, he didn't know it. At his last remark one or two looked knowingly at each other and smiled, and one man, without looking at him, advised him to "stop at the Newfoundland, corner of Oglesby and 41st," and several more smiled at the fiction, but Jake, who had given the advice, kept his face as immobile as a statue. Still another man sat quietly by himself reading "In His Steps." He had a curious badge or pin on his coat lapel—a pitcher and a torch. How many are there that know what that emblem of ancient Gideon signifies? And yet the number of traveling men now wearing them runs into the thousands.

The snow came driving along with increasing energy, and the comforting warmth within glowed as if in opposition to the elements, then something happened—just a trifle, but enough to break the monotony and quiet of the big hotel office.

The door swung open and a midget of a newsboy stepped inside, pretty well covered with snow from head to foot. His face was very red, and the one ear his scant cap refused to cover, looked nearly frozen. He hesitated but a few seconds to get his bearings, then as the big, gruff hardware man was nearest, he made straight for him. "News?" he said, in a thin, piping voice, but the man with the iron face scribbled away unnoticing. "News?" again, with a hesitating step forward.

This time the man looked up with his customary scowl and a "What's that?" loud enough to be heard on the second floor.

The boy said nothing, but pulled a mittenless, red, benumbed hand out of his pocket and clumsily picked out a paper and handed it toward him.

Then the hardware man straightened up and looked the snowy apparition up and down, and without noticing the extended paper, said:

"Where's your other mitten?"

"Hain't got none," said the boy.

"What you wearing such a hat as that, for, you'll freeze your ears."

The boy was evidently getting a little bored. He shifted his feet a little and said: "'S all I've got. News?"

"And your shoes; look at 'em! Why, you ain't got any overshoes on," he fairly roared. "And no overcoat to speak of; say, what you out selling papers for a day like this?"

"Gotto," said the boy, bashfully, and then with an effort added, "Ain't got much coal."

The oil man had walked softly up. The little dude from Indianapolis had followed, Jake, the clothing man had showed an interest, and the grocery man had moved his chair over and sat down near them to listen; then the clerk noticed the boy for the first time and sang out, "Boy, you better move on," and the boy started. The hardware man was on his feet in a minute, and with a heavy hand on the boy's shoulder he fairly roared at the clerk: "You shut up there; this boy don't move on until I get ready. How many papers you got, sonny?"

"Ten."

"Boys," he continued, "we'll buy him out, and nothing less than ten cents goes."

He took the papers from the boy's trembling arm and handed them round, and ten men paid ten cents apiece for them.

"Boys," said he, again, "think of a little fellow like him out such a day as this half dressed."

Then the man with the pitcher and torch spoke up:

"This boy don't move until I get ready."

"Perhaps some of us may have some samples we could spare. Here are some overshoes I think will just fit him," and he stooped down and put the boy's feet in them. Jake said not a word, but went to one of his many trunks marked youths', and brought an overcoat that just fitted. A man who sold caps and gloves out of Milwaukee was the next contributor, and by this time you wouldn't have recognized the waif of the streets.

The little fellow from Indianapolis seemed to think it was up to him. He sold white goods. Perhaps there was not much he could do. He turned away wiping his eyes very suspiciously, opened a long case behind the clerk's desk, and brought out a white silk muffler and tied it around the boy's neck. The groceryman had nothing but some candy, but he added a half dollar to it. The hardware man covered the front of the boy with his portly form and put something into his hand, no one knew what, and said in a husky voice, "Run along, now, sonny, you've had a good day's business."

The boy stood a moment in the doorway, facing the crowd of traveling men. He tried to speak, but in vain. Then with a profound bow he passed out into the street and the storm, and the voice of the man who wore the badge of Gideon fell like a benediction:

"And a little child shall lead them."

The Use of the Symbol.

Olive A. Smith.

A symbol is "anything cognizable by the senses which represents something moral or intellectual; an emblem; a type; a sign; a token."

It is easy for us to realize the power and place of the symbol in the religious development of the ages past, but it is not so easy for us to realize the amount of time and attention which we give to it, or the dependence we place upon it as the medium through which we approach spiritual realities.

We know that our church ceremonies are but symbols; that public prayer, or even private prayer, is but a symbol of that continuous attitude of heart and mind which is the natural result of a reverent, well-ordered life; the natural attitude of a child toward a father. "Prayer is the contemplation of the facts of life from the highest point of view. It is the soliloquy of a beholding and jubilant soul. But prayer that craves a particular commodity less than the common good, is vicious. As a means to effect a private end, it is meanness and theft. It supposes dualism, not unity, in nature and consciousness."

What but the direst of superstition can convert the communion service into more than a symbol of the death of the Redeemer? And viewed in this light, it is perhaps not strange that so many thinking men and women who exalt the life rather than the death, are inclined to pass lightly by such a symbolism. In one sense, the death is a monument to the ignorance and fanaticism of a misguided people.

These ceremonies were all given—suggested, at least—by the Christ. But it may not be presumption for us to ask why, and to answer the question if we can. His own life and words and deeds give us the answer. He made a continuous use of the symbol in order to meet the needs of a world which could see but faintly into the reality.

"The Jews require a sign." "If I have told you earthly things and ye believe not, how shall ye believe if I tell you of heavenly things?" "Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe." The Jewish religion was pre-eminently a religion of form and ceremony, and this Teacher knew, as all modern teachers seek to know, that between the known and the unknown there must be no rude break, no chasm of incomprehension into which the learner may fall. Is it reasonable to suppose that a brief ministry of three years could lift the world of that day into a comprehension of spiritual truth where the symbol could be regarded as a symbol? To suppose so would be to disregard the principle of growth.

The history of all religious movements shows us that the undue exaltation of the symbolic is one of the greatest enemies of spiritual life. We often see children who have been born and reared in Christian homes, whose spiritual senses have become so blunted, their consciences so dulled, that they are wanting, even in the common virtues of honesty and reverence. Yet they cling with a pitiful self-satisfaction to all the forms and ceremonies of the church. Fed upon the symbolism of Christianity, they have accepted it as the reality, and are more hopelessly blind to the spiritual life than is the child who has never heard of the religion of Christ.

But is the twentieth century church able to ignore the symbol? Clearly not; not able in itself, to say nothing of the duty it owes to the world to teach as the Nazarene taught. Nineteen centuries of the existence of Christian faith must have served to give us some conceptions of truth beyond those of the Nazarene's time, yet we are mere babes, and must cling to the tangible and the visible in order to grow in our knowledge of the spiritual.

Says Dr. Holmes, "When a symbol which represents a thought has lain a length of time in the mind, it undergoes a change like that which rest, in a certain position, gives to iron. It becomes magnetic in its relations; is traversed by strange forces which did not belong to it. The word, consequently the idea it represents, becomes polarized."

As yet, this is all the church can do: to "polarize" its forms through the real spiritual life of its followers; to render them so magnetic that the great realities which they represent may be more effectually thrown upon the canvas.

We may dream of the time when the symbol shall no longer be needed, and the world is full of men and women who endeavor to force the dream into realization. But until the symbol passes naturally through that process of reform which ever works "from within, outward," we cannot do better than to use it as its Giver intended it to be used—as a means to a firmer grasp of the "things eternal."

13 Cedar St., Emporia, Kan.

"There are two good rules which ought to be written on every heart: Never believe anything bad about anybody unless you positively know it to be true; never tell even that unless you feel it is absolutely necessary, and that God is listening while you tell it. Charity thinks no evil, much less repeats it."—HENRY VAN DYKE.

"DABSTERS"

People Who Do Things by Piecemeal.

Many people are convinced coffee is the cause of their sufferings and stop its use from time to time to get relief. During these periods when they are not drinking coffee they feel better. They are getting well in small installments.

"How much better it is to stop short on the coffee and shift to well made Postum and get well once and for all. As soon as this is done the destroying effects of coffee are stopped and a powerful rebuilding agent is set to work. Health comes back by bounds, and so long as the right food and drink are used and improper food is left alone the cure is permanent.

A lady of Readfield, Me., says: "I was always a great lover of coffee and drank it so steadily that I would have to stop it at times on account of dizziness in my head, gas in the stomach, and other troubles. I would leave off the coffee for a few weeks until I felt better, then would go to drinking it again.

"I continued this for years and paid dearly for it, until about a year ago I read a Postum Cereal article and bought and carefully prepared some. It filled the place of coffee from the start so far as flavor and taste go, and it has righted my stomach troubles. I have improved so that my friends notice the change. I have exchanged sickness and misery for health and happiness. Through Postum I have got well all at once." Name furnished by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Ice cold Postum with a dash of lemon is a delightful "cooler" for warm days.

News From Many Fields

Ohio Letter.

June 16, 1828, Walter Scott organized the church at Austintown, O. On Friday, Saturday and Sunday, June 19-21, the 75th anniversary of the organization, was observed. Secretary Bartlett gave the historical address. From this church came the Haydens—William and Sutton—John Henry, the "Walking Bible," Aylet Rains, Prof. B. S. Dean, et. al.

Grant W. Speer dedicated the remodeled church at Beaver Dam, June 21. About $715 was raised to pay for the improvement. Bro. Speer also preached two nights at a union service at Lafayette.

The Franklin Circle Church, Cleveland, has called to its pulpit Edgar D. Jones, of Erlanger, Ky. He assumes the responsibility Sept. 1. We extend to Brother Jones a cordial Buckeye greeting.

The rebuilt house at Fostoria was rededicated July 5. State Secretary Bartlett preached the sermon. There was no cash needed. Strange dedication that.

The work at Lakewood, Cleveland, is prospering under the leadership of F. D. Draper. There have been fourteen additions the past month.

The preachers of Cincinnati and vicinity, with their wives, enjoyed Monday, June 29, with W. T. Donaldson at Ft. Thomas, Ky. The regular program was carried out and a picnic dinner consumed, and such other things as that part of Kentucky affords. All got home alive. The next preachers' meeting will not be held till September.

Levi Gordon Batman has resigned at Mansfield after a five years' pastorate that has been very successful. He goes to the First Church, Philadelphia. Thus Ohio loses another good man. It will be in order for Mansfield to get another good man from Pennsylvania.

The Bellaire Church gave $135 to the Anti-Saloon League, and a Children's day offering of $247. This church has given about $1,600 for missions since last September. The church house is now being newly frescoed and carpeted. Two mission points, Shady-side and South Bellaire, will build this summer. Mary Kelly is the "living link" of this church.

Prof. E. B. Wakefield has been appointed acting president of Hiram College till a permanent president can be found. It is said that F. D. Power gave the greatest address of his life at the recent commencement.

How did you like the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST last week in its new-old dress? Pretty fine, wasn't it? Better ask your neighbor to take it.

Texas Echoes.

Our state convention held with the church at Mineral Wells was in many respects the best we have ever had. Delegates were there from every section of the state, who came not for sight-seeing or for pleasure, but to take part in every effort made for the advancement of Texas mission work. The spirit of the convention was most excellent, and every one felt that it was good to be there. The report of the corresponding secretary showed material gains in all lines of work, there having been during the year 4,094 additions, 47 churches organized and reorganized, and the sum of $20,902.10 raised in cash and pledges for state mission work, showing a clear gain in additions over the year previous of 1,537, in churches 24, and in money and pledges $7,475.20. This is a wonderful growth within the short space of one year! Some material changes were made as to the future of our work in the enlargement of our state board, by making the secretaries of the various district boards members of the state board, and requiring the corresponding secretary to locate his office in the city of Dallas, to whom all monies for state and district missions shall be sent, and whose time shall be given chiefly to office work. Bro. J. C. Mason was made corresponding secretary, and the former corresponding secretary was selected as one of the state evangelists. It will take a little time to get our churches acquainted with the new order of things and with our new secretary, but we believe the system is right and we feel assured that we have the right man, standing at the helm as corresponding secretary and superintendent of missions. With him let all Texas preachers and Texas churches co-operate, and our work will continue to grow and prosper.

The recent heavy rains have greatly damaged the crops in nearly all the low lands, and in some sections almost totally destroyed them.

Bro. B. F. Wilson, of Roswell, New Mexico, is temporarily filling the pulpit in San Antonio, while his brother, Bro. Homer T. Wilson, is superintending the Boulder Chautauqua. The latter will be absent during the months of July and August.

Waugh and Dauthiel have recently closed a very successful protracted meeting at Orange, in which there were 100 additions, the church reorganized, a Sunday-school organized, and the whole city stirred as perhaps never before.

Jno. W. Marshall, J. B. Boen and B. B. Sanders have recently held successful meetings respectively at Venus, Blooming Grove and Hubbard City, while S. M. Martin is shaking up Waco, and great results are expected.

Let the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST note the change in corresponding secretaries of Texas mission work, and address their communications accordingly.

The Awful Flood.

The most disastrous flood that ever swept through the valleys of the Missouri and Mississippi is the one that has just subsided, leaving destruction and death as terrible reminders of its power. The full story of this mighty torrent will never be told; it is an impossible task for either tongue or pen. Only actual sight can ever bring to the mind any true conception of the largeness of this engine of destruction to life and property.

It may be possible to estimate the property values that have been swept away, and yet figures, are, at best, poor conveyors of the real situation here, but who can estimate the value of the home life that has been destroyed? Who can measure aright the heartaches and soul pains that have come to many as they have seen their all swallowed up by the angry waters? It is beyond the power of the most fervid imagination.

But worst of all is the loss of life. Nineteen are known to be dead, but there is a list of missing carrying over one hundred names. Letters have come to us full of pathetic anxiety, asking us to search for news of loved ones, some we have been able to find, others are still among the missing. They may be found, but we fear not.

This disaster has peculiar and sad interest to our people. All along the flood swept valleys, in every town and village, we had congregations and church houses; many of these have suffered the loss of all things earthly. Take the Armourdale church as an example. The house was lifted from its foundation, the floor fell in, one wall was bulged and twisted, and practically the house has to be rebuilt, the lowest bid for its restoration is $600. The membership cannot do this. All of them lived in the territory swept by the flood, and many saved nothing but the garments they had on when compelled to flee for their lives. Brother Noblitt himself, the pastor, was one of the greatest sufferers.

Our churches in Kansas City, Mo., are undertaking to care for this church. Brothers Richardson and Combs, both of whom worked incessantly through the awful days of disaster, are leading in this work of rescue and restoration. For this noble helpfulness our Kansas City pastors and churches deserve unstinted praise.

But this church is only one of the many. Many others have met with the same calamity. Every mail brings us word of the destitution to which many of these valley churches have come. It is a testing time for them. But is it not also for their brethren? If we are at all worthy of the name we will not allow our Kansas City people to stand alone in this matter. Help, large help, is needed. We shall be unworthy of our calling if we let the call go unheeded. Let the contributions come immediately, let them be worthy of the great need that causes them, and the great people from whom they are asked. Let not the appeal of these our brothers and sisters be in vain. One glory of the early church was its helpfulness to its distressed members; if we are restoring primitive Christianity, right here is a splendid place to show it. If you cannot give the large sums, send the small, send all you can, as soon as you can. He that gives at once gives twice.

C. W. B. M. in Missouri.

The Maysville auxiliary has taken a fresh start, and will hold meetings on Wednesday nights. We shall expect good reports from there.

Grant city was reorganized on June 29 with twenty-one members. The officers are, Mrs. Dr. Ewing, Mrs. J. H. Vaught, Mrs. John Roudabout and Mrs. Albert Taylor. The Grant City sisters have worked hard and faithfully to help build their beautiful church home, and are now ready for active service for world-wide missions. The secretary found a delightful home with Brother and Sister McKenzie, the pastor and his wife, during her visit there. Sister McKenzie is superintendent of the Junior Christian Endeavor Society, which is about seventy strong.

Sister J. L. Moore is out in districts two and three. Both of these districts will hold conventions during the summer. Reports are coming in, but many are still due. Please attend to this important duty, my sisters.

Careful preparation should be made for county meetings. Consult the Christian Message, published by Brother Abbott, as to dates. If suggested date is not practicable, consult with the brother who is county president and have him write Brother Abbott concerning change of date. C. W. B. M. work should be presented at every county meeting, to see that it is, is the duty of county managers.

Missouri Bible-School Notes.

Now that the Joplin convention is past, let us not allow its splendid enthusiasm to die out, but entering upon another year, may we push with greater vim and work with more unity than ever for the Master in Missouri.

Carrollton's Home Department is not only the largest of any religious body in the state, but is by far the largest of our brethren in any state, while their increase by the recruiting campaign was remarkable to all.

W. A. Moore will make his headquarters in northwest Missouri, and as soon as possible his address will be given, but in the meantime write him here and it will be forwarded. Brother Moore is now making a tour of Sullivan county and all are delighted with his work and will be more and more as they see and learn it.

T. J. Head has just closed a fine meeting at Elvins, rather continuing one begun by J. G. M. Luttenberger, and the net results are 33 additions to the cause and our evangelist has time engaged through July now. Do you want the help of such men? Then apply early.

It is a mistake that the First Church, St. Joseph, Bible-school and church offerings are all taken at one and the same time, but the school as a school raised on Children's Day this year enough to support Bro. F. E. Meigs in the foreign field for a year, and gave $50 to home missions and will give $100 to the King Hill work in South St. Joseph. Think of that from a school that a few years ago gave scarcely anything to any work. J. M. Irvine is a "hustler" sure.

The Monroe City Bible-school gave $172 to missions this year, and this, too, from a school that a few years ago did not give that much to everything.

Will not all schools not having reported for the year ending May 31 last, please do so, giving us school membership, amount for local school expenses, amount to state Bible-school work, to foreign missions in 1902, also to home missions for 1902, and to Orphans' Home for 1903, and number of conversions from school? Year Book is to go out the last of July and you must not be left out. Recruiting campaign goes right along, and one of the remarkable instances is at Old Orchard, where the enrollment was 44; at the close of the campaign it was 127. The offering the last day of the rally was over $26.

The Carroll county meeting was wise in making Mrs. W. H. Rosenbury, Carrollton, county Bible-school superintendent, and hope other counties will select as good and let us push our work this year through the county superintendents.

New headquarters, 117 Locust Street, St. Louis: command us at any time.

Iowa State Convention.

The thirty-fourth Iowa Christian convention met at the University Place Church, Des Moines, June 22-25, and was unanimously pronounced the greatest convention that the Disciples of this state ever held. The C. W. B. M. session opened with a large attendance and the largest success in raising missionary funds ever reported, over $9,000 in only eight months since the last convention. The address of Miss Anna Hale, state secretary of Illinois, set the missionary spirit of the whole convention to a high key from the very first. The work done by the C. W. B. M. during the year, the tone of the convention, and a very important address were in large measure due to the excellent work of Miss Annette Newcomer, the Iowa state secretary.

The regular session of the state convention was from the first full of life and interest, the credit for which should in large measure be given to the very prompt and well-spirited work of the chairman, I. N. McCash. The convention enjoyed a series of delightful addresses by Prof. D. R. Dungan, Canton, Mo., concerning the Christian ministry and the study of the scriptures. A series of excellent addresses was given by S. B. Ross, A. F. Sanderson, T. F. Odenweller, A. M. Haggard, H. O. Breeden, Percy Leach and many other brethren well-known and highly honored in Iowa. A very excellent and stirring address on state missions was delivered by T. A. Abbott, state secretary of Missouri.

The reports of the state work show a rapid advance of the cause in this state. The number of accessions to the church by the evangelists that work under the state convention for the eight months numbered 1,205, of which a large proportion came in by primary obedience.

The total amount raised under the auspices of the convention was $41,216.95 during eight months. This is certainly a very fine record of work done. Our Baptist brethren in this state during the year 1902 had three more evangelists than we, and preached three hundred more sermons, and yet had only 240 accessions altogether.

The Bible-school Association did an excellent work during the year mainly through the enterprise and activity of the state superintendent, J. H. Bryan. Although this association is closing only its second year, it has been able to employ some other evangelists besides Brother Bryan and still reported a surplus of funds in the treasury.

This indicates a prosperous condition, but still greater promptness in the support of this work by the schools will bring yet richer results for another year.

The report of Drake University showed a gain of 55 students for the session of nine months over any previous attendance. The work of the University made a profound impression upon the convention, and the educational address by Dr. Breeden was heartily received and its publication was requested. A special effort will be made by the friends of the University to raise a million dollar endowment fund. The prospect that this will be done, together with the fact that a new music building and a new medical building are now in process of erection, give an outlook such as the University has never before enjoyed.

The Christian Endeavor program was spirited and excellent throughout; and the reports of the work for the year show that there is a remarkable activity in Endeavor circles throughout the state.

The crowning event of the convention was the address of Dr. Susie Rijnhart, missionary returned from Thibet. She told the touching story of burying her little child in a land where Christian burials were before unknown. She told of the long tour made by herself and husband into the interior of Thibet; how that on their way, lacking provision, her husband went to a village to make some purchases and never returned; that she waited three days by the bank of a river encamped in snow, but could not secure any tidings from her husband; that through many perils of false guides, robbers and unfriendly rulers she barely made her way again alone to the borders of China. She expressed her readiness to return to Thibet, but lamented the fact that there were none to go with her, and that she was unable to replace the surgical instruments that were taken from her by the natives, and which would cost about $400. She had hardly closed her address when a proposition was made that voluntary offerings be taken to purchase the instruments. In a few minutes more than $500 were subscribed. While the money was being received, the chairman announced that two young people in the audience had volunteered to go with Dr. Rijnhart to that most inhospitable land to Christian missions on earth. The young people were brought to the platform and introduced to the convention, Brother and Sister Griffith, the minister at Boone, Iowa, and his wife. The effect of this wonderful sacrifice moved the convention to tears, and the brief address by Brother Griffith plainly manifested the genuineness and heroism of the offer. The convention adjourned for dinner, but it was almost an hour before the people ceased to crowd to the front and bid a tender Godspeed to those earnest spirits that were willing to offer their labors and their lives to carry the gospel to the most distant place in the northern hemisphere. The spirit of this occasion pervaded the remaining sessions, and made the memory of the day a sweet souvenir to be carried henceforth in every heart.

Whitman County (Wash.) Co-Operation.

DEAR EVANGELIST: The camp-meeting of the Whitman County Co-operation which began June 18, closed on the 28th. Thirty-three made the good confession. The preachers present were, J. N. McConnell, our district evangelist, Neal Cheatham, W. M. Roe, B. E. Utz, M. W. Smith, A. C. Vernon, F. E. Jones, F. C. Stephens and R. M. Messick. We had the largest attendance every day that we have had for years. Three sermons each day, and I believe the audiences at every service during week days averaged at least 400; on Lord's days, 1,200. The preaching was chiefly done by Neal Cheatham and J. N. McConnell. I don't believe I ever heard a better series of sermons. Brother Cheatham is one among the ablest public speakers I ever heard. Brother McConnell reported as the results of six months' work 160 additions, and of this number 110 were by confession and baptism. He was re-employed by our district board for one year from July 1 on a salary of $1,200. He has more than satisfied the churches all over this county, and we confidently look for the large est year's work in the history of the co-operation. Twenty-three churches sent in their reports, and all were good. For the six months' labors of our evangelist he received $600, and very nearly $500 is now in the treasury for the second year's work. The convention instructed the board to engage the services of Brother McConnell for one year, and if the funds would justify the board in doing so, to employ an additional evangelist. We believe this can be and will be done.

The Co-operation unanimously resolved that all the churches within its limits should be urged to co-operate freely and liberally with all mission work—foreign, home, state and district. The convention adjourned to meet at the same camp ground on Thursday before the third Lord's day in June, 1904.

Respectfully,

R. M. MESSICK.

Commencement at Hiram.

The fifty third year of Hiram's work closed June 25. There was a delightful company of old students gathered to renew old memories and greet the outgoing class. The degree of Master of Arts was conferred upon Mabelle Benton Beattie, Daniel Edward Dannenberg, Frederick Charles Lake, Mark Sisler Peckham, Robert Lee Pruett, George Abial Ragan. The Bachelor's degree in science, arts or philosophy was conferred upon thirty students.

President Beatty's baccalaureate on Sunday morning was a masterly address. In the afternoon Robert Moffett preached and presided at the ordination of four worthy young men, D. O. Cunningham, E. B. Kimm, J. H. Ladd and W. D. Trumbull. In evening, Miner Lee Bates preached at the Y. M. and Y. W. C. A. anniversary. The conservatory of music gave a fine program Thursday evening. On Wednesday evening the Alethean Literary Society gave a most creditable and enjoyable program. Commencement day dawned brightly, and at an early hour the large tabernacle was filled to overflowing. It is not often that a large number of old students are gathered on the hill. The address of F. D. Power on the Master-Teacher, was a most fitting and beautiful address.

The later address of Prof. E. E. Snoddy, as class-professor to his class, was truly excellent; and President Beatty closed with a noble exhortation before he gave out the diplomas and degrees. More than one hundred sat together at the alumni banquet in the afternoon. S. H. Bartlett acted as toastmaster, and among the responses—all good—none was more welcome than that of Miss Mary Kelley on China. The Delphic Society closed the anniversary with a strong piece of drama in the evening.

The trustees at their annual meeting found the general affairs of the college in good condition, but they were unable to find a president on the spur of the moment. They will find one duly. Meantime the faculty was instructed to choose an acting president, and it at once chose Prof. E. B. Wakefield. Friends of the college may trust that '03-'04 will be a vigorous and fruitful year; 327 students this year. The library is being finely enlarged. Miss Henry will spend the summer at Harvard, and Professor Snoddy at Ann Arbor. A dear company of missionaries rendezvous at Hiram. The class of '03 is very strong, but the class of '04 hopes to equal it. The college has a noble constituency. It is very grateful, and will try to prove worthy of it.

Samuel's Farewell Address.—1 Sam. 12:13-25.

Memory Verses: 23-25.

Golden Text: Only fear the Lord, and serve him in truth with all your heart.—1 Sam. 12:24.

(Read chapters 11 and 12.)

The Meaning of the Monarchy.

Saul had been privately anointed for the kingship by Samuel; he had been formally chosen by lot from among all the families and tribes of Israel before the great assembly at Mizpah; he had been hailed with loyal cries of "Long live the king;" and then the people had gone back to their homes and the new king had gone back to his home at Gibeah, without stopping to organize his administration or to appoint any officials in the new government. In fact, it could scarcely yet be called a new government. The establishment of the monarchy marked primarily the introduction of a new ideal of national life, a new hope and a new desire; it was the ambition for temporal power, for an honorable and important place among the nations.

It was a patriotic motive which led to the demand for a king; the desire that the rule should not fall into the hands of Samuel's degenerate sons (1 Sam. 8:3-5), and the wish to make Israel great among the nations (8:20). This new ideal, which the monarchy embodied, controlled the destiny of the nation for many centuries. It led to the vain trust in political and military power which the prophets repeatedly denounced. Samuel's protest against the establishment of the monarchy is paralleled by Isaiah's declaration that the kingdom must be destroyed and his protest against alliances with Egypt with a view to preserving the monarchy. Both were true prophets. Samuel saw that political greatness would become, and Isaiah saw that it had become, an enemy to righteousness and an obstacle to the realization of Israel's true religious destiny.

Saul's First Act of Leadership.

The new king went back to his home, but there went with him "the host whose hearts God had touched." Here doubtless was the material out of which the new government was to be organized. It would be largely a military regime and its actual establishment must wait upon some occasion demanding military action.

There was not long to wait. The men of Jabesh Gilead, who lived on the frontier across Jordan, were threatened by the Ammonites who offered them humiliating and dishonorable terms of peace for the avowed purpose of laying it "for a reproach upon all Israel." The men of Jabesh sent messengers in hot haste to Saul with an appeal for aid. He who had been anointed and hailed as king was found in the field with his oxen—a charming touch showing the simple social conditions of the time. Saul was a farmer. It was while hunting for his lost asses that he had been anointed king. The first appeal to him as king finds him at the plough. He made from his oxen the first symbol of his authority, for cutting them in pieces he sent them among all the tribes, and with them he sent a command to the warriors of Israel to assemble at Bezek, a point across the Jordan from Jabesh Gilead and just opposite it, far enough back to escape the observation of the enemy and close enough to be the starting point for a sudden sally.

Three hundred men of Israel and thirty thousand from Judah responded to the call (a statement which indicates that this narrative, or at least this part of it, was written after the division of the kingdom); and the result of the battle was the total defeat of the Ammonites.

Saul Made King.

Saul's ability to secure united action by all the tribes proved that he was the man for the kingship. This was precisely what a king was wanted for. The victory over the Ammonites aroused great enthusiasm. The people wanted to put to death those "worthless fellows" who had opposed the selection of Saul for king. But Saul magnanimously intervened and saved them.

Saul has now made proof of his kingly qualities. He can fight and he can forgive. He can rise above petty personal jealousies, and so he can enable Israel to rise above petty tribal jealousies and unite into a solid nation. So they went up to Gilgal, the chief place of worship, and there they offered sacrifices to Jehovah and "made Saul king."

A Just Judge.

The assembly at Gilgal was the occasion for Samuel's farewell as well as Saul's inauguration. The old prophet-judge stood before the people whom he had judged so many years and called upon them to testify against him if he had wronged any man. "Whose ox have I taken? or whose ass have I taken? or whom have I oppressed? or of whose hand have I taken a bribe to blind mine eyes therewith?" It was a bold challenge. An innocent man can afford to be bold. But there was none to say that Samuel had ever perverted judgment or sold justice or oppressed any man. The retiring judge was vindicated before all the people. An official career could not have a more honorable close.

A Philosophy of History.

Samuel's chief interest was in Israel's continued faithfulness to Jehovah. He enforces this by reminding them of some events in their history and by interpreting those events. Samuel's philosophy of history consists of three points: first, that success and happiness result from fidelity to Jehovah; second, that national disgrace and defeat result from unfaithfulness to him; third, that though Jehovah punishes sin, yet he is willing to forgive and to restore the blessings of obedience to those who will return to him. The "problem of evil" had not yet begun to puzzle the human mind. The sufferings of the righteous (as discussed in Job) are not taken into account. But there is a clear discernment of the great fundamental truth, which remains a truth in spite of all apparent contradictions, that righteousness and prosperity are converted and that God gives his best gifts to those who are worthy of them. This is the truth which Israel's earlier history had illustrated and which Samuel wishes to be the basic principle of her future career.

What he had to say about the monarchy was in accordance with this historic truth. The monarchy was displeasing to God, but, if the people would be faithful to Jehovah even under the monarchy, He would forgive their sins of rebellion and would still be with his chosen people.

Samuel's Parting Admonition.

It was a solemn moment when the great leader came to lay down the staff of office and deliver his last message to the people whom he had ruled in love. There were many things that he might say; there was much advice that they needed. But the last word was a re-inforcement of this principle drawn from their history and an application of it: "Only fear Jehovah and serve him in truth with all your heart, and consider how great things he hath done for you. But if ye shall still do wickedly, ye shall be consumed, both ye and your king."

Lesson Thoughts.

Public office is religiously sacred. Saul was "made king before Jehovah." Religion and government ought not to be so far separated that rulers and officers shall cease to think of themselves as serving in the presence of God.

A kingly office may be given, but kingly character must be developed from within. Saul had to prove himself kingly before he became king in fact.

Can every public officer to-day stand the test to which Samuel put himself before all the people? Strict uprightness silences the criticisms and wins the respect of even the worst in the nation.

Anything which dulls the sense of direct responsibility to God is an evil, whether it be

HAY-FEVER AND ASTHMA CURED BY THE KOLA PLANT.

A New and Positive Cure for HAY-FEVER and ASTHMA has been found in the Kola Plant, a rare botanic product of West African origin. So great are the powers of this New Remedy that in the short time since its discovery it has come into almost universal use in the hospitals of Europe and America for the cure of every form of Hay-Fever and Asthma. Its cures are really marvelous. Men, women and children who have been given up as incurable are being restored daily to perfect health by the use of Himalaya. Thousands of letters attesting its wonderful cures have been written the importers, but limited space prevents a detailed list. Read what a few have to say, proving that Hay-Fever and Asthma can be cured:

Mr. Frederick F. Wyatt, the noted Evangelist of Abilene, Texas, writes Jan. 31st, Himalaya permanently cured him of Hay-Fever and Asthma. He strongly recommends it to sufferers. Dr. W. H. Vail, a prominent physician of St. Louis, Mo., writes March 8th, that he used Himalaya on six different Hay-Fever patients last Fall with satisfactory results in every case. Mr. A. L. Clark, Springfield, Mo., writes Jan. 22d, was a sufferer of Hay-Fever and Asthma for thirty years and thought I would die every Fall but Himalaya completely cured me. Mr. Geo. C. Dye, Marietta, Ohio, writes Jan. 26th, I was cured after several years suffering with Hay-Fever and Asthma. Mr. J. B. Ayle, Estherville, Iowa, writes Feb. 28th, that he was cured of Hay-Fever and Asthma after severe suffering for 23 years. Miss Eva Preston, Fergusburg, Ind., writes March 8th, that she suffered untold misery for 18 years with Hay-Fever and Asthma. Is completely cured, although her physician said that a cure was impossible. Mr. E. B. Hume, 1345 Arch street, Philadelphia, Pa., a widely-known traveler, writes Feb. 2d, Himalaya cured me of Asthma when everything else failed. Dr. J. R. Duncan, the oldest physician of Crawfordsville, Ind., writes Jan. 20th, It is my duty to tell all I can of the great virtue of Himalaya. Rev. J. L. Coombs, Martinsburg, W. Va., writes to the New York World, July 23rd, that it cured him of Asthma of 39 years' standing.

If you suffer from Hay-Fever and Asthma in any form, do not despair, but write at once to the Kola Importing Co., No. 1166 Broadway, New York City, N.Y., who in order to prove the power of this wonderful new botanic discovery will send you one Trial Case by mail, entirely Free. Remember it costs you absolutely nothing.

The Devotional Side of the Sunday-School.

The Sunday-school should give larger place to the devotional. At present it is full of intense life, manifesting itself in more or less noise and confusion, often lacking in dignity. There should be more quiet moments,—reverent waiting before God. The child needs not only to know the Bible, but to know God. Often teacher and class should bow in quiet prayer. Often in silence, the whole school, full of some great spiritual thought, should wait as listening for a still, small voice. Why should we always assault the child with words. Let him think, and in the "holy hush" his soul will grow. A school's efficiency is to be tested not only by its large attendance, its clear teaching, its liberal giving, and its enthusiasm, but by its atmosphere of devotion.

Midweek Prayer-Meeting.By Frank G. Tyrrell.
July 15.A Sectarian Spirit.—Mk. 9:38-42; 1 Cor. 1:10-15.

It is common enough, and humiliating enough: the sectarian spirit sometimes survives sectarianism itself. That is, the outward form may go, and the essence remain.

As advocates of unsectarian Christianity, the Disciples of Christ have assumed a tremendous responsibility. The world itself applies the test of fruit-bearing: "By their fruits ye shall know them;" and it asks, "Do these advocates of unsectarian Christianity exhibit it themselves?" And we may well pause and search our own hearts; for it would be the irony of fate to depart from our high ground and become sectarian advocates of unsectarianism.

Party pride, bigotry, intolerance, are of the very substance of sectarianism. Parties and sects are usually formed by an undue emphasis upon the non-essentials of the faith. Opinion usurps the place of conviction, and theology that of religion. And once formed, the sect draws farther apart from other sects, and builds ever higher the walls of exclusion and separation.

A sectarian spirit is a sure sign of a narrow mind and a small soul; and it further belittles and dwarfs the soul that harbors it. The noisy and boastful sectarian is invariably ignorant of other religious parties; his knowledge is small. He makes the mistake of the small mind in thinking a fragment of truth is the whole. And then there is a peculiar quality or temper of mind which condemns the sectarian to fatal consistency; it is indicated in the old proverb, "A bigot's mind is like the pupil of the eye: the more light you pour upon it, the more it contracts."

Such a lamentable spirit injures one's usefulness. It is repulsive. The disposition of cock-sureness offends the other man, and arouses in him a spirit of antagonism. He, too, has convictions; he, too, possesses knowledge. The sectarian succeeds in inflaming the sectarianism of others, just as the partisan in politics intensifies the party feeling, strengthening his own ranks, maybe, but winning no adherents from the enemy. Sectarianism is a sort of ferment; it spreads and sours and separates; like jealousy, it creates the meat it feeds upon. It is one of the most hateful of dispositions, and nothing can be more harmful, especially to those who have adopted the plea for Christian union.

The sectarian spirit can be cured without killing the man who has it. And yet, in some hearts it lingers until old age has lent its mollifying and sweetening influences. Until the soul ripens for heaven, it is full of ascerbity and acidity. But it will cease, or at least very much diminish, as soon as one learns his own limitations. There is an infallible pope in every man's bosom, who needs to be dethroned and cast out. Blessed is the man who has made mistakes, who doesn't know it all, and is aware of it! Still happier he who knows it and will admit it.

Again, sectarianism will be eliminated still further by a knowledge of the good in others. Even out of Nazareth, good may come. The worst possible religion is better than none. There is something worth while in the Mam-macy of Mother Eddy, or she would lose her tiara. But above all, the intimate knowledge of Christ the Lord, and sympathetic companionship with Him will cure us of sectarianism, if we have it. As He scourged the thieves of the temple, so He waits to scourge thievish passions and unholy dispositions out of our hearts.

We write and talk about "our plea," and glorify the work of "the fathers." We rejoice in our numerical strength and our rapid increase. And all this is perilous. What is our plea but the plea of the Lord Jesus Christ, which we have adopted? Did we not receive it from Him? Where, then, can we glory?

Prayer.

O God, teach us how to find and keep the unity of the Spirit in the bonds of peace.

Cast out of our hearts personal or party pride, narrow and selfish ambition, and enable us to rejoice in the success of all thy children, whether they follow with us or not. And hasten the day when all thy people shall be one in Christ. Amen.

Religion Between Sundays.—Acts 2:42-47.

When Jesus was reproached by the Pharisees for doing good works on the Sabbath, he replied "the Sabbath was made for man." It is equally true that every religious observance was made for man. Religion itself has for its object the betterment of man. And this means that it is for the whole life of the whole man—the physical and intellectual man as well as the purely spiritual man; the man on Monday as well as the man on Sunday.

The Sunday religion which is marked, like a railroad ticket, "good for this day only," is in reality not very good even for that day. Worship loses its value and meaning if it does not strengthen the soul for service among men.

Religion between Sundays means religion made practical, religion expressing itself in gentler manners, in better thoughts, in purer lives, in higher ideals of duty and more conscientious devotion to those ideals, in a greater desire to be helpful to the world, in a closer walk with God and an increasing Christ-likeness of character.

Religious life is a process of growth, and growth cannot be healthy unless it is continuous. A growing boy cannot grow by feeding and exercising his body one day in the week, and starving and neglecting it the other six. But how many people think that the life of their souls can be wholesome and sound when for six days in the week they forget that they have souls and neither feed them on God's word nor let them breathe the atmosphere of prayer, nor exercise them in loving and helpful deeds. Such neglected souls cannot grow into the fullness of the stature of Christ Jesus.

The Christian Endeavor Society has for its special glory that it encourages an active and practical type of religion, a religion which means well seven days in the week. Endeavorers ought therefore to feel a special responsibility to exhibit this sort of religion and to apply it, all day and every day, in the relations of the home, the school, the office, the shop and the market.

Religion is not a state of excitement or of emotional ecstasy. It is not the feeling of awe and mystery that comes when the organ rolls and the lights are low in the great cathedral and the incense ascends in clouds before the altar. It is not the thrill of joy and excitement that sweeps over the congregation when the revival hymn is sung and its swinging chorus is echoed by hundreds of voices. These are phases of religious life; they may be in their degree helpful to the promotion of religion; but they are not identical with religion. If they were, it could not be said that religion is for every day, for these emotional experiences can be only occasional.

Hear what James said: "Pure religion and undefiled before God the Father is this, to visit the fatherless and the widow in their affliction and to keep himself unspotted from the world." That is to say, it consists of two elements: to keep one's own life pure, and to help others. That is a task worth working on every day and working hard.

But religion between Sundays means that there must be religion on Sundays. There must be Christian worship or there cannot be Christian work. The soul must occasionally come close to God, with all earthly thoughts shut out. Here the strength is gained for those acts of helpful service which should fill all the days of our lives.

"An Endeavorer's Working Journey Around the World."

By John F. Anderson.

"I have just finished reading a delightful little book by John Anderson, my Jo, John!" It is called 'An Endeavorer's Working Journey Around the World.' Yesterday at church I met the author. I had already seen his picture and been attracted to his book through THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. I therefore sat right down and have read the volume through from stem to stern, a thing that a man cannot do these days with most books.

"The charm of the production is the charm of a few books, here and there, that have become monumental, namely, an unassuming plainness of English diction, pure and colloquial. It is this which makes the Pilgrim's Progress a well-spring of English undefiled, and Abraham Lincoln's speeches masterpieces. When a man born to the English speech undertakes to tell a simple story in Saxon words, the result, if he have any literary soul at all, is bound to be pleasing, to say the least. Such a book gets close to the ground, our native ground.

"Nobody cares any more for the mere book of travels. Its day has gone. But everybody cares for a gritty American's tussle with obstacles and triumph over difficulties.

A man who could do this thing and then write such a simple pretty book about it, is a man America may well be proud of. And since he is a Disciple, and shows his love for our people and for the Lord, all through, we ourselves have the right to be doubly proud of him. "This is the neatest piece of book-work that I have seen from the press of the Christian Publishing Company. No firm in America could have done it better. Books now-a-days seldom stir our enthusiasm. There are so many of them. But I am enthusiastic over this book. I would recommend its purchase to any one who wants a day of real pleasure."

Our Budget

—The campaign is now on for the increase of the circulation of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

—See elsewhere some of the things we have prepared for the remainder of this volume.

—If you like the paper and believe in what we are trying to accomplish, now is the time to lend us a helping hand.

—The revival of college endowments and interest in our own institutions is one of the most helpful signs of the times. Nearly all our colleges made encouraging progress last year.

—Rev. Reginald John Campbell, Dr. Parker's successor in London, is now on a visit to this country and has been addressing large audiences in New York and Brooklyn. There is a great desire in this country to see and hear him.

—J. O. Rose has accepted a call to Warsaw, Ind., where he will begin his ministry at once.

—The Tuxedo congregation of this city are reseating their church building with new pews.

—G. P. Rutledge, of Philadelphia, has just concluded a series of sermons on "Acts of Apostles."

—The West End Church of St. Louis is taking steps to change its name to Hamilton Avenue Christian Church.

—W. H. Kindred has accepted the position of State and Home Missionary Evangelist, with headquarters at Belding, Mich.

—The new building of the Christian University at Canton, is progressing nicely and will be ready for school by September 22.

—L. G. Batman has resigned at Mansfield, Ohio, and has accepted a call to the First Church in Philadelphia to begin October 1.

—On Sunday, July 5, the corner stone of the new Church of Christ on 169th street, New York, was laid with appropriate ceremony.

—Last week the Foreign Society received $1,200 on the annuity plan; $1,000 from a friend in Kentucky, and $200 from a friend in Virginia.

—If there is a gain of $3,000 in the receipts for Foreign Missions during the month of July, the Foreign Society feels confident that $200,000 will be reached this year.

—The secretary of Church Extension is reminding us again of "A Half Million by 1905" and that the churches should help to reach $400,000 by September 30. There is $370,000 in the fund on July 1st.

—On June 28, Bro. Chas. A. Chasteen was ordained to the ministry by the church at Pawnee, Okla. He was formerly a practicing attorney in that city. He is a young man with many years of service before him.

—Letters have been sent to all our pastors this week by the Board of Church Extension, asking that supplies be ordered at once for the September offering. The board should receive prompt and generous responses.

—The Foreign Society has received the $1,500 in special gifts for the new Christian Chapel in Osaka, Japan. This will cause great rejoicing among the missionaries in that city of a million souls.

—During the 3 weeks following Children's Day, the Sunday-schools gave $27,093.98 for Heathen Missions, a gain over the corresponding time last year of $1,888.42. There was also a gain in the number of contributing schools.

—Our Foreign Society has just appointed Miss Rose Armbruster, of Springfield, Ill., as missionary to Osaka, Japan, to take the place of Miss Wright, who broke down and was compelled to return home. She will sail in September.

—W. P. Bentley, of Shanghai, China, will fill the following appointments for missionary addresses: July 12, Denver, Colorado Christian Endeavor Convention; July 19, Des Moines, Ia.; July 26, Ligonier, Pa.; August 9, Massillon, Ohio; August 10 and 11, Bethany Encampment.

—The dedication of the ground for the Jerusalem Exhibit of the World's Fair will take place Saturday, July 11, "rain or shine." An elaborate program has been prepared and many distinguished guests will be present.

—A. W. Gehres, of Shoals, Ind., has been called to the pastorate at Veedersburg, Ind. His entire time will be given to the work there. This is a forward move for Veedersburg as heretofore they have had preaching but half time.

—The church at Hunnewell, Mo., has just finished painting their building. The church at Mount Joy is following their good example in this respect. The congregations of Prairie View, Hunnewell and Mount Joy raised about $400 in money and supplies for the sufferers of the recent flood.

—The church at Adrian, Mich., reports five additions by baptism during the past month. The congregation is very much encouraged in the work, and has recently purchased a building of its own. The building is now being improved and is expected to be ready for occupancy Aug. 1. Bro. B. W. Huntsman is pastor.

—F. L. Davis has begun work for the National Benevolent Association. He was formerly pastor of the church at Redwood Falls, Minn., where he did some very effective work in organizing the congregation. During his seven months' ministry there were twenty-three additions, fifteen of these being by primary obedience.

—On June 24, 1903, Walter S. Goode, the popular minister of the Central Christian Church of Youngstown, Ohio, and Miss Minta Fitch were united in marriage. The wedding ceremony was performed by C. B. Reynolds, of New Philadelphia, Ohio. The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST extends its best wishes to Brother and Sister Goode.

—I have just received and read with great delight your book on "A Modern Plea for Ancient Truths." Let me thank you for that little volume. I consider it a timely message for our brotherhood. It is concise and pleasing in style, apostolic in fact and in harmony with Christ and his gospel in spirit.—C. B. REYNOLDS, New Philadelphia, O.

—The Christian Century has recently enlarged its pages, as we have reduced ours, so that our pages are very nearly the same size, though ours outnumber those of the Century. Our Chicago contemporary issues 32 pages, however, the past week with the preceding chapters of Judge Scofield's continued story. We trust the Century is meeting with the success which its merits so well deserve.

—The ceremony of the laying of the foundation stone of the walls of "New Jerusalem" at the World's Fair site in St. Louis will be performed with oriental rites Saturday, June 11, at 4 p. m. A company of fifty natives of Palestine wearing the costumes of natives will assist in the exercise. The gates to the grounds will be thrown open in honor of the occasion and all will be admitted free.

—E. T. McFarland, pastor of the Fourth Christian Church, St. Louis, will spend a portion of a month's vacation at the Christian Endeavor Convention in Denver, and the remainder of his time will be occupied in a visit to old familiar scenes in Holt county, Mo. On account of hard work and ill health Brother McFarland is in need of the rest and recuperation which it is hoped his vacation will bring to him.

—Writing of the new Virginia Christian College at Lynchburg, Va., Josephus Hopwood writes: "This work grows in interest and general approval. It is really a great opportunity for the church's life and growth. Near the center of the state, a railroad center, a center as to the Disciples of Christ in the state and of easy access from West Virginia, Maryland and North Carolina." The cut shows a splendid building already for the work.

—The sixth annual summer school of the Illinois Sunday-school Association will be held July 30 to August 5, at the Chicago Theological Seminary, Ashland Boulevard and Warren Avenue, Chicago. Though intended especially for primary and junior teachers, it is open free of tuition to all Sunday-school

Often The Kidneys Are Weakened by Over-Work.

Unhealthy Kidneys Make Impure Blood.

It used to be considered that only urinary and bladder troubles were to be traced to the kidneys, but now modern science proves that nearly all diseases have their beginning in the disorder of these most important organs.

The kidneys filter and purify the blood—that is their work.

Therefore, when your kidneys are weak or out of order, you can understand how quickly your entire body is affected and how every organ seems to fail to do its duty.

If you are sick or "feel badly," begin taking the great kidney remedy, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, because as soon as your kidneys are well they will help all the other organs to health. A trial will convince anyone.

If you are sick you can make no mistake by first doctoring your kidneys. The mild and the extraordinary effect of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney remedy, is soon realized. It stands the highest for its wonderful cures of the most distressing cases, and is sold on its merits by all druggists in fifty-cent and one-dollar size bottles. You may have a sample bottle by mail free, also a pamphlet telling you how to find out if you have kidney or bladder trouble. Mention this paper when writing to Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y. Don't make any mistake, but remember the name, Swamp-Root, Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, and the address, Binghamton, N. Y., on every bottle.

workers in Illinois or elsewhere. The faculty includes some of the ablest teachers in the country. Cheap board at college dormitories has been provided for. For further information and program, address Mrs. M. S. Lamoreaux, 583 W. 67th St., Chicago, or W. B. Jacobs, 132 La Salle St.

—The Kimberlin Heights School of Evangelists has been donated some lots in East Chattanooga, which the best posted men in that city believe will treble in price in a few years. The school needs some present money for the purchase of some additional land to carry on its work and wants to find some one with money to invest who would buy these lots and so help himself and the school. For further information address Ashley S. Johnson, Kimberlin Heights, Tenn.

—On July 1, $1,000 was received by the Church Extension Board on the annuity plan. This is the 85th annuity gift to this splendid work, and there is now over $85,000 in this fund. It should be remembered that annuity money helps to build churches the same as the regular 4 per cent fund. Churches that cannot be helped with 4 per cent money are glad to get annuity money at 6 per cent. Write to G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., 600 Water Works Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., for full information about the annuity plan.

—The first communication from the Executive committee having in charge the National Convention of 1903 at Detroit, is just received. They suggest as a motto a representative from every church. They announce that the Michigan Passenger Association and Central Passenger Association have granted a rate of one fare for the round trip and the Trunk Line Association, including the territory east of Pittsburg, have made the rate of one and a third fare for the round trip, certificate plan. Definite word has not yet been received from the Western and Southern Passenger Associations, but one fare for the round trip is expected.

—Jos. D. Armistead has completed a post-graduate course at Kentucky University and entered upon his duties as minister of the Woodland Street Christian Church, Nashville, Tenn., July 5. This church has been waiting for Bro. Armistead since April.

—Lewis S. Cupp, pastor at Platte City, Mo., recommends the following books as especially helpful to preachers: "Afternoon in the College Chapel," by Francis G. Peabody; "Doctrine and Deed," by Chas. E. Jefferson," and "Brooks by the Traveler's Way," by J. H. Jowett.

—C. E. Millard, the well-known singing evangelist writes that his field work commences with a meeting for September in Missouri and that he is open for engagements after September. He also says that he is desirous of establishing an art and musical studio in a city where we have a strong church and are in need of a musical director or soloist.

—For financial reasons we are unable to retain our pastor, R. M. Robinson. We are very desirous of helping him to secure another charge as soon as possible, because we know him to be worthy in every way. Will you kindly insert the enclosed motive in your paper? Sincerely your brother,

M. F. LITTLE,

Mt. Hope, Kans., June 30, 1903.

—While in Kentucky where he had gone to attend to the burial of his father, Bro. A. W. Kokendoffer of Mexico, Mo., received a telegram calling him to conduct the funeral services of Capt. J. W. Bryan, father of J. H. Bryan, State Bible-school Superintendent of Iowa. Capt. Bryan was an old river captain formerly connected with the Anchor Line and lately in the United States service on the Mississippi river. He was baptized years ago by John A. Brooks and has since lived a life characterized by the highest integrity and honor.

—Great Sunday-school, 233 present and $57 collection; an average of over $11 per Sunday during the quarter. The envelope offering last Sunday was $34. This closes our work here. The people, without regard to creed or politics, join in a petition for us to remain. Brother Bloom, of New York, takes up the work next Sunday and will find a church free from every debt and in perfect harmony. We go to Denver to the convention, then to Canon City, Col., for a meeting. My wife will accompany me. H. C. PATTERSON.

Le Roy, Ill.

—The executive board of the Ohio federation of churches and Christian workers has secured Rev. D. R. Miller, D. D., to act as field secretary. Dr. Miller is ready to help in the organization or reorganization of local federations, and to visit places in the state for this purpose and to assist in arranging a canvass or other matters. He would be glad to correspond with all who may wish information. His address is St. Marys, O. The board was authorized to take this step at the last annual meeting, and it is believed that it means an important forward movement.

—At the Los Angeles Presbyterian convention the Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Education said; "No words can speak my joy to realize that I am, after all, only a chip riding on the crest of a wave of a great movement to build up Presbyterian colleges. There is a deep, swelling, mighty tide lifting the college cause to a prominence hitherto unknown." Can we say as much of the revival of college endowment among the Disciples of Christ? We believe there are signs that such is the case. The Presbyterians have fixed an Educational Day in which the claims of their colleges are to be presented. Our board of education has already recommended such a day.

—Casper C. Garrigues has resigned as minister of the South Philadelphia Mission Church. During the initial year of this work, conducted under the auspices of the Philadelphia C. M. S., assisted by the A. C. M. S., a Bible-school of 58 has been built up and a membership of ten gathered. The sum of $225.38 was contributed toward local work and $58.52 raised for American and foreign missions—an average of over $28 per member for all purposes. The last month has been the best in attendance and in offerings and shows an average aggregate attendance of 103 per week and a total of $52.14 raised. Mr. Garrigues' labors with the south Philadelphia church closed June 30; he has accepted a unanimous call to the Kensington Church, where he enters upon his new work July 5.

—Coming out of Indianapolis on a train a few days since we met with a man who wore a new badge. It was a pitcher and a lamp. He was a "Gideon." He told us the organization was four years old, that it had just completed its fourth annual convention at Indianapolis, and that it consisted of over 3,000 members—the conditions of membership being that one must be a traveling man and a church member. He said, "Twenty years ago we had bummers; ten years ago they were drummers; now we have traveling men, and ten years from now they will practically all be Christians." If this brother, Mr. H. A. Collins, of Havana, Ill., is a specimen member, the Gideonites are an enthusiastic band of Christian workers. This is only one of many illustrations of how Christianity is invading the business world. Mr. Collins said their convention passed a strong resolution condemning the use of whisky, and gave it to the associated press, but he did not know whether or not it would be printed. Success to the Gideonites!

Kansas Day.

In harmony with the spirit of a resolution passed at our last state convention, we designate the fourth Sunday in August to be observed by the Kansas churches as the Kansas Day, on which all arrearages for Kansas missions are to be raised. To date, sixty-five churches have paid their apportionments in full, so there are over three hundred yet to hear from. Many of these have paid part of their apportionment, but should pay in full.

Let all delinquent churches get ready for Aug. 23, if not before, and let us have the greatest offering in our history for our Kansas work. The outlook for this is bright indeed, much more so than at this time last year. The K. C. M. S. expects every church to do its duty.

Topeka, Kan.

WHAT IS YOUR EXCUSE?

If you are offered happiness and refuse it, What is your excuse? If some one offers to supplant misery and distress with peace, enjoyment of life and comfort of body, and you allow it not, What is your excuse? Mr. Theo. Noel and the Theo. Noel Company of Chicago, whose announcement appears in these columns, wants to know what is your excuse, if you are sick and ailing and refuse to accept the offer of thirty days' trial of Vita-Ore at the Company's risk which they are making to the readers of this paper.

The offer "PERSONAL TO SUBSCRIBERS" has appeared in these columns a number of times during the past two years and hundreds are to-day blessing the day they read and accepted it, else the Company could not continue its announcements from time to time. If you fear its genuineness, ask any of your fellow subscribers who have accepted it, and then, if YOU don't accept, What is your excuse? You need the medicine; you can have it for the asking, you take no risk; What is your excuse?

The editors of the best periodicals in the country endorse the Company and the offer—let their endorsement be YOUR EXCUSE for writing to-day for a package on trial. See large announcement in this issue.

Statistics of Our Colleges.

The following statistics are compiled from recent reports furnished by the presidents of the several colleges in response to a request from the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. We believe that the people will be more interested in our schools and will be more inclined to give to them if there is a frank statement of their condition and needs.

The sixth and seventh columns refer to the recommendation of the centennial celebration committee, approved by the Omaha convention, that our colleges make a special effort to raise centennial endowment funds by 1909, and that each college decide upon the amount which it will try to raise. All the colleges which have considered the matter have adopted the suggestion, but all have not yet fixed upon its amount.

No report was received from Hiram College.

Christian College (Columbia), Camden Point and William Woods Colleges have boarding accommodations for young ladies, and their receipts for the year include the amount paid for board.

Kimberlin Heights is an industrial school. It has no endowment, and does not want any.

Correspondence

A Day on Hiram Hill.

It is always a privilege to get among the Buckeyes, and especially among the folk who gather at commencement time in the little village in Portage county, known as Hiram. Whether named after the renowned King of Tyre or not, I know not, but it is a great place for artificers and laborers and for timber, stones and other material used in the building of temples and palaces. The Hiram fellowship is of the best. The work that Church and Errett and Mason and Rudolph and Ryder and Ford and Hayden and the rest of the fathers started in this little corner of God's country fifty-three years ago, lives after them, and it is a glory to stand where they stood and share in the cause for which they gave themselves.

Hiram was a country crossroads when the career of the Western Reserve Eclectic Institute began. It is to-day a very respectable village with neat cottages surrounding an eight-acre campus of great beauty, on and about which are fine college buildings. The site is a commanding one, 1,300 feet above the sea and 700 feet above Lake Erie, with a varied and noble scenery on every hand, of rich farms and forest clad hills. Here A. S. Hayden, Thomas Munnell and Phoebe Drake started the Hiram life, Nov. 27, 1850, and later were joined by Almeda Booth, James A. Garfield, Norman Dunshee, J. M. Atwater, H. W. Everest and others whose name are immortal.

Garfield came into this fellowship in 1851 as a student, and served for two terms as college janitor, making the fires, sweeping the floors and ringing the bell. In 1853 he is a teacher in the English department and of ancient languages, and the same year preached his first sermon on "The First and Second Comings of Christ." The subject might be well-illustrated in his first and second coming to Hiram—first, in 1851, he came "unobserved, a student poor and plain," his second coming in 1881 was with banners and music, an applauding multitude, and a host of correspondents to tell it to all the world, the head of the greatest of the nations. In 1857 he became the principal of the school, and served in that office until 1861. The Garfield house is one of the sights of Hiram, and over the front of Professor Dean's house is shown a specimen of his carpentry. Everest succeeded him as president.

Hiram College began its work on the foundations of the old Eclectic, Aug. 13, 1867, and Dr. Silas E. Shepard was its first president, then Atwater, Hinsdale from 1870 to 1882, Laughlin and Zollars, 1888-1902. James A. Beattie succeeded President Zollars. June 25 was the thirty-sixth annual commencement. The past year has been a good one. Three hundred and twenty-seven students were enrolled, and $13,500 was added to the endowment fund. The net income of the college is about $18,000. There were thirty in the graduating class, representing five states, Canada and Japan. One seldom sees as fine a body of young men and women receive the honors of their alma mater. President Beattie delivered an address to the graduates and presented the diplomas. Prof. Elmer E. Snoddy was the class professor and presented them for graduation. The whole service was a most dignified and impressive one. Hiram now requires each graduate to prepare a thesis, and there are no speeches from the class, but an invited commencement day speaker is given the hour. The exercises were held in the tabernacle, and there was the usual throng from Cleveland and the near-by towns and country side. Music and brilliant sunshine and happy reunions of old students, and the pathos of parting marked the occasion such as one always sees at the breaking up of the college session.

Among the trustees in attendance were, Charles Fillius, Charles E. Henry, H. E. McMillin, F. C. Robbins, W. S. Hayden, F. A. Derthick, W. J. Ford, O. G. Kent, C. B. Lock-wook, F. A. Henry, M. L. Bates, W. G. Dietz, F. M. Green, Robert Miller, Alanson Wilcox, Abram Teachout and Lathrop Cooley. The last named are the patriarchs. Such men as Teachout and Cooley are worthy of peculiar honor. Nothing on Hiram hill interested me more than the library and telescope presented by these two loyal friends of the institution. They are beautiful gifts and of untold benefit. Professor Bancroft gave me a vision of some of the handiwork of God through the instrument which is his special pride.

Six received the degree of M. A.: Mabelle Benton Beattie, Frederick C. Lake, Mark S. Peckham, Robert Lee Pruett, George A. Ragan and Daniel E. Dannenberg. Hiram is to be honored that it confers few honorary degrees. The woods are too full already of "doctors."

Among the preachers in attendance during these festivities may be mentioned A. B. Griffith, G. P. Simmons, W. F. Rothenberger, F. D. Butchare, S. H. Bartlett, J. S. Ross, J. L. Garvin, W. M. Logan, M. L. Bates, William Adams, H. F. Miller, H. B. Cox, A. P. Frost, G. A. Ragan, J. L. Darsie, B. N. Tanner and G. L. Wharton. The missionaries were also represented in Dr. Ozer, Miss Gordon and Miss Kelley. G. L. Wharton has resigned as pastor at Hiram and goes back to India after some months of work for the foreign society among the churches. President Beattie has resigned the presidency of the college. He has rendered most faithful service. The board is undecided as to his successor. One other change will take place in the faculty. Professor Feuchtinger, the director of music, giving place to Professor Thomas, of Alliance.

Hiram has a strong corps of teachers. It would be difficult to find abler men than those who fill the chairs at present. My old friends of Bethany days—Dean and Wakefield—grow better with the years, and Colton, Peckham, Bancroft, Paul Snoddy, Hall, Wells and the rest are all worthy successors of the noble men that have made Hiram. O. G. Hertzog, another friend of the Bethany time, is one of the leading Hiram figures. Who does not know Hertzog? When have two or three gathered together that Hertzog was not in the midst of them? Where have men cultivated in any place the sinews of war that Hertzog did not appear to claim Hiram's share for the conflict? Hats off to Hertzog! He is all right.

It may not be amiss here, however, to call his attention to Hiram's need of better transportation facilities. Compelled to use shank's mare both coming and going, it is proper for us to speak. No hacks at Hiram station, for they said, "We go the Garrettsville way by electric car. You are behind the times." Trying the alleged electric on my departure, it was half an hour behind, and having pulled us half way to Garrettsville, it decided to stop and rest, and we had to walk the remainder of the way. Then, having been lightened of its load, it managed to get started again and overtook us in the edge of the town. It recalled the story of the Englishman traveling in America, who, hearing a continuous tooting of the locomotive, asked an American what was the cause of the beastly noise, "don't you know," and was told it was a "cow on the track." Presently the train stopped again after the repeated and prolonged whistle, and the Englishman asked again, "What's the trouble now?" "O," was the reply, "that confounded cow has caught up with us again!"

It is fair to say this lack of power on the Eastern Ohio Traction Company will be corrected before the opening of another session. And let me close with a watchword which I trust will be heard from sea to sea and from the lakes to the gulf: Half-million each for Hiram and Bethany by 1909!

"Reverent" or "Destructive."

The article in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of June 11 and the appended remarks of the Editor have cracked the shell of the arcanum of so-called higher criticism, so that we "ignorant and unlearned men" can begin to see some of its inside mysteries. Brother Latham's question, "Why do we have two schools of higher critics?" is thus answered by the Editor: "All reverent criticism of the Bible recognizes the divine element in the Bible. If, by the 'two schools of higher critics' our brother refers to the destructive and the evangelical schools of critics, the difference is accounted for by the fact that the latter accepts the supernatural element in revelation, while the other does not."

That editorial remark is a stalwart blow that hits dangerously near the solar plexus of higher criticism. Possibly the Editor moved his right arm more vigorously than he intended. The "destructive" higher critics do not accept the divine, the supernatural element in the Bible for the simple reason that they see no supernatural element in the Bible. They are altogether unbelieving critics. Their critical work is only "destructive" and in the interest of unbelief. Their single aim is to destroy faith in the Bible.

On the other hand, the "reverent" higher critics "recognize the divine element," they "accept the supernatural element" in the Bible. That is, they accept part of the Bible, they accept an "element" in it. They are a little higher than the "destructive" higher critics, for they stand on somewhat higher ground; they are semi-believers in the Bible, they are only semi-unbelievers.

That editorial note gives the chief characteristic of each school of higher critics. The "destructive" critics do not accept any part of the Bible, not even an "element" in it; the "reverent" critics believe part of the Bible, they find an "element" in it which they accept. us a half dozen or more names of leading critics of each of those two schools?

We would be thankful if some "reverent" taller critic would give us a few of the "infallible proofs" by which we may know, beyond a doubt, whether any particular passage in the Bible belongs to the accepted or to the rejected "element," or how much of the passage belongs to each "element."

We people of the common sort are impatiently awaiting the publication of "the assured results" of the criticisms of the high and the higher and the highest critics, those "certain results" which we have heard of since the nineteenth century. We want to see their revised, winnowed, expurgated Bible, containing only the "divine," the "supernatural element." We want to know speedily and definitely how much of our old Bible they will leave us.

Bethany Assembly.

The National Chautauqua of the Christian Church.

The time is drawing near for the opening of our assembly meetings for the season of 1903, July 24-Aug. 17. Every indication points to the greatest meeting in the history of Bethany assembly. A very carefully prepared program has been arranged, so that Bethany's platform this year will be graced with some of the best talent that the brotherhood can furnish.

The school for preachers, inaugurated last year, proved so satisfactory and successful, that we have arranged to greatly strengthen and enlarge it. Read the list of Bible teachers and lecturers on the faculty, and see if you can afford not to attend it. There ought to be large numbers of our preachers from every state in the union in attendance. Many others will find it one of the most enjoyable weeks of the entire assembly.

The costly entertainments that will be given nearly every night that week, and the favorite assembly lectures each day, will make it a great week, not only for the preachers, but for all who may attend.

There will be five night entertainments, and as many assembly lectures during the school for preachers, either one worth more than the price of your assembly ticket for one week.

No tuition is charged; no separate admission fee either to entertainments or lectures. All it will cost in addition to board will be 25 cents for admission to the grounds during the week. The different conventions will be better than ever before. The C. W. B. M. will have some of its best talent on the platform.

The Y. P. S. C. E., in addition to its convention, will have a school of methods. W. F. McCauley, of Cincinnati, will deliver a course of lectures running through the entire convention. The Sunday-school association has secured McNeill, and they expect a great revival from start to finish of their convention. The Ministerial Association will hold its annual meeting for the first time in connection with the assembly.

Brother McLean says that foreign missionary day will be a "stem-winder." No such program has ever been provided for foreign missionary day as they have provided this year. The temperance people this year will outdo themselves. They offer us Hon. Oliver W. Stewart, Mrs. Beauchamp and a gold medal contest among their attractions. Butler College will give us the greatest program they have ever offered a Bethany audience.

Children's day will beat their own great record. Two prize banners will be given, one to the school coming on the cars, and one from county schools sending the largest delegations. For the first time in Bethany's history we have arranged to make closing day a great day.

Wm. Jennings Bryan, the "silver-tongued orator of the Platte," will deliver one of his great addresses on that day. Remember that the assembly opens July 24 and closes Aug. 17. Remember that every day will be a great day. Remember that there will be half-fare on all railroads in Indiana. Remember that the hotel, cottages, etc., will be thoroughly renovated and refurnished. Remember that the mineral water will be as free as God's air. Brethren, all of you come.

L. L. CARPENTER, Pres.

DEAR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST:—We would be glad and thankful to have you make brief mention of the fact that we have been the recipients of a series of very pleasing events recently.

Dr. and Mrs. T. R. Butchart recently gave a dinner in our honor, inviting the Red Oak ministers and their wives. A delightful evening was spent together.

On last Friday evening, the church in a happy manner surprised us, presenting us with a handsome three section bookcase. Ice cream and cake were served, and a royal time enjoyed.

Then on last Wednesday evening, the Y. P. S. C. E. (consisting of 50 or 60 young people), perpetrated another surprise. It was well executed and much appreciated. Refreshments characteristic of the good taste of the young people were served.

These little courtesies make life's pathway brighter. They make one feel also a sense of unworthiness, and to feel like doing more to make other lives more bright and happy. Our prayer is for the good people we leave behind us here. May God richly bless them and crown their labors with success.

JNO. WM. WALTERS.

South Dakota Convention.

The South Dakota Convention convened June 17-21. It was an enthusiastic gathering and a great inspiration. The reports showed a large gain in all receipts over the previous year. The increase over last year's receipts were as follows: Home missions, 151 per cent; foreign missions, 25 per cent; church extension, 182.3 per cent; other benevolences, 10 per cent.

The most of our churches are supplied with efficient pastors, and hence progress is made possible.

Bro. C. C. Smith delivered several inspiring addresses, and Brother Wharton, of Hiram, brought a message from India that thrilled his hearers with the missionary spirit.

E. A. Orr, of Sioux Falls, gave two Bible lectures each day which were simply grand. Bro. C. C. Smith and others spoke in very complimentary terms of our Sioux Falls pastor. Brother Orr is certainly a master in this work, and during the year will conduct several Bible institutes for different churches in the state.

The addresses made by the pastors and delegates were above the average, and altogether the convention was a complete success. All came away with a deeper faith and with renewed energy for the work of the present year. M. B. AINSWORTH, Cor. Sec.

Christianity at the University of Missouri.

[A rumor having gotten into circulation and finally into print to the effect that nine young men from one county had gone to the State University and returned skeptics, we clipped same and sent it to Dr. Jesse for verification, if possible. Following is his reply.—EDITOR.]

MY DEAR DR. GARRISON:—I thank you for sending me your letter of June 3 enclosing the printed attack upon the university. This is another proof of your kindness. I venture to enclose you a letter which was written to me by the secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association. Will you be kind enough to return it to me? It explains itself. The membership in the Y. M. C. A. has been far larger this year than it ever has been in the past.

I do not know whether nine men came here believers and left infidels or not. If it is true, I am sorry. It is absurd to hold the university responsible unless the change can be traced to the influence of the university. Every sensible man knows that the religious views of young people are often shaken—nay, perhaps in the case of intellectual people, are generally shaken—as they pass from childhood into manhood. When they give up the faith of the child resting upon the statements of father and mother, they often pass through periods of doubt before they reach the faith of men, and some never reach it. phenomenon of life which is according to the law of nature. This change from the faith of childhood to the faith of manhood comes generally about the college period. Sensible people ought to know this. In the change some lose their faith for a season. The college should not be held responsible unless the loss of faith is plainly attributable to the influence of the college.

How many men become infidels here I do not know. I hope with all my heart that the number of them is small. Certain it is that the administration of the university throws around its students every good influence which it can possibly command. Near the university is a Bible college which our students attend in considerable numbers. We have here the largest chapter of the Y. M. C. A. to be found in any college in Missouri. If it be urged that our numbers are larger, let me reply that the per cent of our men that belong to the Y. M. C. A. is larger than in any college for men in Missouri.

We write in the fall to the pastor of every church in Columbia asking him to come to the university and make a roll of the students that belong to his church or that prefer it. On the entrance blank to the university is this question: "What church do you belong to?" Immediately following it is a second question: "If you belong to no church, what church do you prefer?" These entrance papers are given to the ministers that call for them that they may find out what students belong to their churches and what students prefer their churches. The president earnestly exhorts the students on all proper occasions to identify themselves with the churches of their preference and to attend some Sunday-school, and to join the Y. M. C. A. The largest Bible classes in Missouri are to be found in the Sunday-schools of Columbia churches. A large number of students professed religion here last year, most of them identifying themselves with the churches. Ministers are brought here to preach the gospel and Christian workers come here to co-operate with the Christian association. If there is an infidel in the faculty of the university he is not known to me.

But the mouth of slander is ever open and sometimes it is a so-called Christian mouth. Men do not hesitate to hurl at the university charges which they cannot for a moment substantiate. Do you think that Christ approves of such things? Certainly not the Christ in whom I believe.

Very truly your friend,
R. H. JESSE.

Working for an Education.

Texas Christian University is looking forward to the establishment of an education department where worthy young men and women who must earn a part of their expenses in order to get an education can do so. As to just how soon this department can be set on foot, we do not know, but some things are possible right now in a small way. For instance:

We need a barber shop in close proximity to the school. Two young men who can do such work satisfactorily can earn enough to pay their way through school.

In the next place there is good opportunity here for a small printing business. There is a printing office here that does from $60 to $100 worth of work every month. Two students who understand the printing business can run this office, or possibly it would make a support for three, as the work can be largely built up. This whole outfit can be secured for $500. A small payment in cash, say $100, would be all that is required, and the balance can be paid in monthly or quarterly installments. Two energetic young men that understand the printing business, that have $100 to start on, can buy this office, make enough to pay expenses in school and pay for the outfit in a year or two.

I will be glad to lend any assistance in my power to any young men who would like to undertake either of the enterprises suggested above. Address, E. V. Zollars, Texas Christian University, North Waco, Tex.

The Spiritual Side of Our Plea

By A. B. JONES

This new volume is a notable contribution to a better understanding of the spiritual significance and value of our Reformatory Movement. It accentuates a side of our plea which has been too much neglected by many. It deals, in a profound manner, characteristic of its author, with such questions as "The Letter and the Spirit," "The Real and the Formal," "Alexander Campbell on Remission of Sins," "The Word and the Spirit," and "Righteousness and Law." The views herein expressed are the result of long and mature deliberation by one of the clearest thinkers and writers in our ranks.

Iowa C. W. B. M. Convention.

The convention was held in Des Moines, June 22, 23. As the previous convention was in September, the reports at this one covered only eight months. The state treasurer reported all bills paid and $200 in the treasury. The corresponding secretary, Miss Newcomer, had spent six months in the field, and organized 16 auxiliaries. Money received for all purposes was $9,200.

Plans were laid to increase our offering to the Burgess Memorial Fund. Helpful conferences were held on junior and auxiliary work. Good addresses were given by C. C. Smith, Anna Hale, of Illinois, Mrs. Gilliam, of Fairfield, and one by the writer. Iowa workers were all glad to greet Mrs. D. R. Dungan in convention once more.

Mrs. Emma Ogburn had a very instructive junior demonstration.

It was counted one of our best conventions, and we hope that the inspiration derived may be sufficient to largely increase our offerings to the Burgess Memorial Fund until it shall reach one dollar per member and that the Miss Mills' birthday book may be crowded full because of the large number desiring to pay the day's salary.

The convention was glad to have the opportunity of re-electing their efficient set of officers and hope to so support them in their work that the coming year may see greater results than has the past. The next convention will be held in June at Albia. May the year's work be so fruitful that it will be a time of rejoicing.

WRIGHT.

Isaiah Wright, 72 years old, a Christian about fifty years, died of heart failure, June 10, 1903, and many mourn their loss in his departure. God bless all the bereaved, especially an only invalid sister, his noble Christian wife and worthy children. His sons Edward, James C. and Lawrence are all excellent preachers. All six of his children are in Christ. He sweetly sleeps in the cemetery, four miles West of Jefferson, Iowa. May all meet in heaven.

SMITH.

Mrs. Amanda J. Smith, died at her home in Woodfield, Ohio, on Wednesday, June 24th, 1903, aged 84 years. Eldest daughter of David and Pluma Kirkbride, she was born near Armstrong's Mills, Belmont County, Ohio, but had lived in Woodfield since 1827. In 1841 she married Dr. James Smith, and in August 1844, she united with the Church of Christ under the ministry of Wesley Lanphear, of pioneer fame, and has been a most faithful and beautiful Christian ever since. Few persons ever manifested a riper Christian life. Her unselfishness, her humility, her increasing devotion to the church, her inspiring example of noble living has been a joy and strength to many. "She rests from her labors, and her works do follow her." She leaves two children, M. C. and Miss Ida, in the old home at Woodfield, to mourn her departure. But they love her Lord, and will one day be with her in glory. The funeral was conducted by Sumner T. Martin, minister of the Bellaire Christian Church, in the presence of one of the largest congregations ever seen at a funeral in Woodfield. She was loved by all, and all were present as a mark of esteem and sympathy.

Harrison, O., July 2, 1903

ARKANSAS.—Hot Springs.—Our first effort at a down town revival closed Tuesday night with 64 additions: 30 by confession and baptism, 34 from the denominations and restored. The audience was large, and many heard our plea for the first time in their lives. Of the 64 only 30 will take membership here, the others scattering out among our churches from New York to Texas. This shows what a great mission field Hot Springs is, and demonstrates that this is a field for the church at large to take hold of and support. We must have a new church house and Christian home. Bros. Geo. T. Hall and J. V. Updike did the preaching, and it was well done. Brother Hall preached the first two weeks, with 14 additions, and Brother Updike the last three, with 50 additions. These men are too well known for me to make any commendations. They are great.—T. N. KINCAID.

CANADA.—Grand Valley, Ontario, June 29.—L. A. Chapman closed a two weeks' meeting at Grand Valley, on June 28, with 14 additions, all by primary obedience. D. Dick, of Acton, Ont., conducted the choruses and assisted with the personal work. He is a true yoke fellow. On the last evening of the meeting Miss Cloa Lamson, a teacher in the deaf and dumb asylum at Columbus, O., recited "Rock of Ages" and "My Country 'Tis of Thee." A local preacher and his wife from the Brethren were added at Marsville on June 28.—L. A. CHAPMAN.

ILLINOIS.—Watseka, June 29.—Two more confessed Jesus Christ yesterday. Our quartette furnished some special music for two of the sessions of the 4th district missionary convention at Lexington, Ill., last week. Observed Children's day June 21. Good program and offering.—B. S. FERRALL.

Camp Point, June 29.—Preached here at home yesterday to a full house. One accession at morning service. Took the offering for home missions. This church is still pastorless. I will begin evangelistic work again the last Sunday in July, with a meeting at Brooklyn, Iowa. Time all taken until Jan. '04.—R. A. OMER.

IOWA.—Council Bluffs, June 28.—Five additions to the church; two confessions, two from the M. E.'s, one by commendation.—W. B. CREWDSON.

Moulton, June 29.—Had D. A. Wickizer with us yesterday. Raised all our old debt. Started on the weekly contribution system. Have had one addition by baptism since last report.—S. B. ROSS.

KANSAS.—Oxford, July 1.—There were 3 baptisms here last Lord's day. We begin the work at Bethany, Mo., July 5.—O. ORAHOOD.

Caldwell, June 29.—There were 2 additions at the morning service yesterday and 3 at the evening service; 2 were by confession and 3 by statement; 1 from the Baptists and 1 from the Methodists. Nine added since last report.—B. A. CHANNER.

MARYLAND.—Baltimore, June 29.—Three additions to the 25th street Christian Church. All from the Baptists.—FLOURNEY PAYNE.

MICHIGAN.—Saginaw, June 29.—We baptized 4 more yesterday afternoon, took 3 confessions at the morning service, 1 at night; all adults, 2 heads of families, a business man and a railroad engineer. Our ex-treasurer, W. H. Borrowman, a great worker, has returned to the city and will again be one of us when settled. We are rejoicing.—E. E. COWPERTHWAIT.

place closed last night with 47 additions: 37 by baptism, 5 by commendation, 4 from the Baptists and one from the Presbyterians.—A. J. WILLIAMS, district evangelist.

Kidder, June 29.—Please report one addition at Kidder yesterday, reclaimed. We had our children's exercises yesterday. Our apportionment was $10, but we raised $11.25. This was the best offering ever taken at Kidder. All departments of the church work are prospering nicely. Our Bible school has increased until we only have room for a few more.—C. E. HUNT.

King City, June 29.—One addition by statement to Pleasant Hill, Dekalb Co. Church yesterday. Good attendance both morning and evening.—C. W. COMSTOCK.

Kirksville, July 2.—Two additions last Lord's day, and two last night at prayer service. Baptismal services immediately following the regular prayer service.—NORTHCUTT AND WAGNER.

Maitland, June 1.—Two baptisms here last Wednesday evening. Children's day exercises netted $10 for mission work. Subscriptions are being solicited for new church building. Prospects good for success. Work in fair condition.—T. B. DRY.

Platte City, July 1.—One addition recently from the Baptist Church. Our ladies have just recarpeted the church with an elegant velvet brussels, costing $350. One of our good brethren here and his wife are preparing to give $40,000 for a building for the Bible College at Columbia in the near future. Our board to-day employed S. D. Dutcher for a revival in October. I get about a month's vacation in August.—LOUIS S. CUPP.

Richland, June 30.—I had two confessions and baptized five the last time I was at Stoutland; also five accessions the last appointment at Crocker, one by baptism, one from the Baptist, and three by statement. We went to the county seat yesterday in a body, and fought a saloon petition and won a victory for Richland. This is the second victory for us, as we have shut down a blind tiger.—J. R. BLUNT.

Seneca, June 29.—Bro. Joseph Gaylor's meeting here resulted in 62 additions, 21 baptisms and the church thoroughly organized and at work. Have $450 raised and expect to build a house soon. Seventy-one present at Bible-school and $5.16 collected on last Sunday. Will organize a Christian Endeavor next Sunday. Bro. W. S. Deatherage will preach for us every fourth Lord's day. We are rejoicing.—A. R. MOORE.

St. Louis, July 6.—The following is the report of the churches for Lord's day, July 5: Fourth, one confession and two baptisms; Hamilton Avenue (formerly West End) one by statement; Mt. Cabanne, one by letter; Tuxedo, two by letter; Carondelet, two by letter.

Elvins, June 30.—The protracted meeting conducted by our pastor and Bro. T. J. Head, during the past week resulted in 19 additions, mostly by confession and baptism. Brother Head is the Bible-school evangelist, and an enthusiastic Christian preacher. He is earnest and loyal to the truth. Both he and our pastor, Bro. J. G. M. Luttenberger, labored hard to make the meeting a success. The church has been greatly benefited. There have been 13 additions prior to Brother Head's arrival. So in all we had 32 additions. It is the intention of the church to dedicate the house of worship in August. The church, Bible-school, Christian Endeavor and other departments are in good working order. Brethren, remember us in your prayers.—J. B. McDANIEL, clerk.

Carrollton.—The Christian Bible-school of Carrollton, Missouri, has an enrollment of 270 in the Home Department, and 131 on the Cradle Roll. The Home Department has been the means of increasing the attendance at the main school. It has given the superintendent of the department an opportunity to enter homes, to ascertain the relation of the families to the church, and give a cordial invitation to attend the church services. We have endeavored to promote the department spirit by bringing its members together in the main school at least once during the quarter. The greatest difficulty which we have encountered has been the slowness on the part of some members to comprehend the full meaning of the work. The disciples of Christ ought to lead in this work on account of the emphasis we place on the Bible and Bible alone as our rule of faith and practice.—MISS JENNIE JENKINSON, pastoral helper.

NEBRASKA.—Arapahoe, July 1.—I preached at Alma, Neb., morning and evening, June 14, and baptized 4, which with 1 addition by letter made five in all.—C. P. EVANS.

York, June 29.—The large auditorium filled yesterday and 5, 2 baptisms, added to the church. During the rainy quarter just closing we have had 17 added at regular services. Since June 30, one year ago, we have had 69 additions, 35 baptisms. Seven of these were added in a meeting held by Bro. Simpson Ely, Bro. J. B. Frickey, our beloved Bible-school superintendent, is pushing the Sunday-school. We now have 322 enrolled in this department. If there is a ripple in the work, it has not come to the surface. We now have a church membership of 300.—G. J. CHAPMAN.

OHIO.—Dayton, July 1.—Six additions to Central Church in June; 1 by letter, 2 from the Dunkards, 3 by baptism.—I. J. CAHILL.

Minerva, June 29.—Two added at our regular services here yesterday; 1 by baptism and one by statement.—GUY HOOVER.

New Philadelphia, June 29.—There has been 3 additions to this congregation recently. About 500 people assembled yesterday evening to hear our children in the interest of world-wide missions. The program was pleasing, and the offering, $21.83, more than double our apportionment.—C. B. REYNOLDS.

Cleveland, June 29.—Franklin Circle Church of Christ. Children's Day Offering $211.32. Home Missionary Offering $313.96 and more coming in. Four persons united with the church by letter yesterday morning. Edgar D. Jones, of Erlanger, Ky., becomes our pastor, Sept. 1.—MRS. N. H. McCORKLE, helper.

OKLAHOMA.—Norman, June 29.—We have had 2 baptisms and 9 added otherwise during June. 151 additions in 21 months. The people of Norman raised $52.30 and a large amount of Euell, of Bonham; held 4 services with 2 confessions, when he took sick and left. We begin next Sunday at the cotton mills, over one mile from First church. Twelve additions not reported.—J. A. SHOPTHUGH.

Fort Worth, June 29.—Have just closed a successful meeting with the First Church here. The pastor did the preaching and John Brower conducted the song service. Sixty-two additions, 30 by confession and baptism, the balance by letter and statement. Have had 76 additions in my 3 1-2 months' pastorate here. Sunday-school has increased 60 per cent.—R. R. Dedication at Tamalco, Illinois.

Lord's day, June 28, was an ideal one as far as weather was concerned. It was a red-letter day for the church at Tamalco, and one that will be long remembered by the people of the entire community. The Christian Church there had completed a new house of worship, and on that day it was formally opened and dedicated to Almighty God. On arriving at Tamalco, we found the brethren unanimous in the opinion that the debt could not be provided for. When we left on Monday they were greatly rejoicing because, through their liberality, it was all handsomely provided for. Bro. J. E. Story, their pastor, worked hard for the consummation of this work. To him and Brother Shank is due much of the praise for the successful prosecution and completion of this house.

L. L. CARPENTER.

A New Service.

Last Lord's day evening a new and interesting service was introduced; it was the first annual graduating exercises of the Junior Christian Endeavor society. A nice program was rendered. Other societies would profit by trying it. The main reason for starting the custom is this. Our Junior president, Miss Pearl Griffin, says that after a child reaches the age of 15 or 16, they desire to be classed as seniors, and the smaller children are too timid to take an active part in the meeting when the older ones are there, hence this new service. There were 43 in the graduating class. The ranks will be filled again from the primary class of the Bible-school.

The Anti-Mormon Association.

The National Anti-Mormon Missionary Association of the Churches of Christ will hold its next meeting in Detroit, Mich., on Monday, Oct. 19, 1903, at 1 P. M., at the Central Christian Church, corner of Second Ave. and Ledyard St.

While our association is not a year old, yet we have made substantial progress. We hope at this meeting to perfect arrangements for very effective work.

Our general secretary, John T. Bridwell, goes this week to old Virginia to debate with a Brighamite. So soon as he gets through there he will be ready for another Brighamite or any other Mormonite. Give him a call. You need not fear results when Brother Bridwell is at the helm.

Let all interested in the Anti-Mormon work be present at the Detroit meeting.

DEAR MADAM: Please Read My Free Offer

Words of Wisdom to Sufferers from a Lady of Notre Dame, Indiana.

I send free of charge to every sufferer this great Woman Remedy, with full instructions, description of my past sufferings and how I permanently cured myself.

You Can Cure Yourself at Home Without the Aid of a Physician.

It costs nothing to try this remedy once, and if you desire to continue its use, it will cost you only twelve cents a week. It does not interfere with your work or occupation. I have nothing to sell. Tell other sufferers of it; that is all I ask. It cures everybody, young or old.

If you feel bearing down pains as from approaching danger, pain in the back and bowels, creeping feeling in the spine, a desire to cry, hot flashes and faintness, or if you are suffering from any so-called female complaint, then write to Mrs. M. Summers, Notre Dame, Ind., for her free treatment and full instructions. Like myself thousands have been cured by it. I send it in a plain envelope.

Mothers and Daughters will learn of a simple family remedy, which quickly and thoroughly cures female complaints of every nature. It saves worry and expense and the unpleasantness of having to reveal your condition to others. Vigor, health and happiness result from its use.

Wherever you live I can refer you to well-known ladies in your neighborhood, who know and will testify that this family remedy cures all troubles peculiar to their sex, strengthens the whole system and makes healthy and strong women. Write to-day, as this offer may not be made again.

THE PULPIT

"Sickness and Its Compensations" By E. B. Bagby

Psalms 37:7. "Rest in the Lord and wait patiently for him."

The gospel of Jesus is a gospel of work. The Master says, "Why stand ye all the day idle?" "Go work in my vineyard to-day." His call is a call to service. While this is true, God sometimes says to his servant: "Come ye apart and rest awhile." But the servant demurs: "There is so much to be done, the harvest is ripe and the fields are waiting." The Master replies: "I want to test your loyalty in another field of service. I want to teach you lessons which can only be learned in the school of suffering."

Sometimes the command is given, "Speak unto my people that they go forward;" and again, "Stand still and see the salvation of the Lord." Sometimes the Christian soldier must say, "In the name of the Lord will we lift up our banners;" and then again, "Wait on the Lord, be of good courage and he shall strengthen thy heart." Sometimes the call comes to us as to Abraham, "Get thee out of thy country and from thy kindred and from thy father's house to a land that I will show thee;" and then again with Job bereft we must say, "Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither; the Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." We can manifest our devotion by patiently submitting to affliction as well as by faithfulness in the field of service. "They also serve who only stand and wait."

A literal translation of the text is, "Be silent to Jehovah, let him mould thee." For an illustration we can cite the experience of the apostle Paul. At one time in his career, Paul says there was sent him "a thorn in the flesh," and that he "besought the Lord thrice that it might depart from him," but God said, "Be silent, I am moulding thee; I would have you learn that my grace is sufficient, and that my power is made perfect in weakness." Paul learns the lesson and says, "Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my weakness that the power of Christ may rest upon me. I take pleasure in weaknesses, in injuries, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses, for Christ's sake; for when I am weak, then am I strong." It is not possible for us all to rejoice in sickness. "Chastening seemeth for the present to be not joyous, but grievous." In the spring the rise of the sap in the trees is no easy process, to make its way through the toughened fiber, chilled and retarded by the cold wind to every limb and twig of the tree; but when the fall comes and we see the ripe fruit hanging from every branch we recall the apostle's words, "Nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruits of righteousness to them that are exercised thereby." The Master said, "In this world ye shall have tribulation." The tribulum was the beam used in olden times for threshing the wheat. It was a hard experience for the wheat to be flayed beneath the heavy tribulum, but only thus could the grain be separated and gathered into the barn. So by our tribulation, God is sifting the chaff from our lives that he may gather us as pure wheat into his garner. John learned that those who stood upon the throne were "they who had come up out of great tribulation and had washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." Above all things God desires character. He has no other way to produce character than by burning the dross and refining the gold in the fire of affliction; only when there are tears and the dark cloud of sorrow can he show us the bow of his promise.

"The world's great altar stairs slope through darkness up to God." "Sweet are the uses of adversity." "Crosses are the ladders by which we climb to heaven." "He had foreordained us to be conformed to the image of his Son." "But the Captain of our salvation was made perfect through suffering."

There are many forms of trouble, and God's purposes in them all are beneficent. Let us consider, for example, sickness and its compensations. First, it teaches us we are not indispensable. God says, "Stop." We answer, "How can I; who will do my work?" But God says, "Wait." The work goes on, the family machine continues to run, the store is not closed, the church is not ruined, the Sunday-school does not go out of existence. The tendency of sickness is to humble us. It shows that God's work is not dependent upon an individual. The kingdom of God made progress before we were born and will go on after we have departed. While many a man may be useful, he is not indispensable.

Secondly, that man is not immortal. One who is free from sickness for many years begins to regard himself as immune to disease. He will learn better. His time will come sooner or later, and then he realizes upon what a feeble thread hangs his immortal life. The fever has only to climb a notch higher, the spark of life burns low and is ready to flicker and go out. The lesson comes, "Watch and be ready."

Thirdly, the value of human sympathy. It reveals the number of our friends and the depth of their love. It affords opportunity for heroism. The wife puts in jeopardy her life for the sake of her husband; the mother, frail and feeble by nature, ill-fitted to perform the ordinary duties of the home, spends watchful days and sleepless nights in coaxing back the spirit of the child from the gates of death.

Fourthly, the perfection of divine sympathy. There is a limit to human sympathy. Every one has troubles of his own. No one can enter fully into the consciousness of another's suffering. But there is One who knows. "He bore our griefs and carried our sorrows." "He knoweth our frame." "He is about our path and about our bed." "Who forgiveth our iniquities and healeth all our diseases." We know that "the eternal God is our Refuge and that beneath us are the everlasting arms." "So shall we rest in the Lord."

Never Neglect Constipation.

It means too much misery and piling up of disease from all parts of the body. Death often starts with constipation. The clogging of the bowels forces poisons through the intestines into the blood. All sorts of diseases commence that way. Most common complaints are dyspepsia, indigestion, catarrh of the stomach, liver complaint, kidney trouble, headaches, etc. The bowels must be relieved, but not with cathartics or purgatives. They weaken and aggravate the disease. Use Vernal Saw Palmetto Berry Wine instead. It is a tonic laxative of the highest order. It builds up and adds new strength and vigor. It assists the bowels to move themselves naturally and healthfully without medicine. One small dose a day will cure any case, and remove the cause of the trouble. It is not a patent nostrum. The list of ingredients goes with every package with explanation of their action. It is not simply a temporary relief, it is a permanent cure. Try it. A free sample bottle for the asking. A Great Railroad.

It may be truthfully said that railroads, more than any other medium, make a great city. St. Louis is truly great in her railroads, having some twenty-one important lines terminating within her borders.

One of the most important of these roads to St. Louis is the WABASH LINE, from the fact that it draws the commerce of nearly all sections of the country to this metropolis, as a magnet draws kindred metals to itself.

The great arms of this growing system reach to Kansas City, Omaha, Des Moines, Albia and Ottumwa, Ia.; Chicago, Toledo, Detroit and Buffalo, and attract business from beyond these important gateways, even from the remote Pacific Coast, the extreme Northwest, the Great Lakes and the Atlantic borders.

It is commercially aggressive, and in its never ceasing activity is to-day reaching its great steel tentacles toward Pittsburg, Pa., and Baltimore, Md. In a little more than a year these two beehives of industry and all their tributary territory will be bound to St. Louis by the continuous rails of the WABASH.

Its through-car system is perfect, running solid, fully equipped trains for night and day service to Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, Des Moines, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Toledo, Niagara Falls and Buffalo, and through sleeping cars to New York, Boston, Montreal, Denver, Portland, Ore., Los Angeles and San Francisco.

Its train equipment is modern in every particular, there having recently been placed in service many new passenger cars, consisting of Observation-Cafe and Library Cars, Reclining Chair Cars, Dining Cars, Day Coaches and Combination smoking and Baggage Cars, which are models of beauty and neatness, representing the highest state of development in car building.

This road will be called upon to transport hundreds of thousands of visitors to the World's Fair in 1904, and its facilities will be found ample for so gigantic an undertaking.

THE WABASH is essentially a St. Louis line, having its General Officers, from the President down, located here, and has an army of employees, necessary to carry on this vast system, who are citizens of St. Louis.

It spends its money largely in St. Louis and it has the interest of St. Louis always in mind.

Truly this is "A GREAT RAILROAD," and above all things, it is a St. Louis railroad.

Dingdong.

By George Darsie.

The most forcible word in the English language, so says a high authority, is the word dingdong. And the secret of its power is not far to seek. It is in that old and familiar thing we call repetition.

No one can instruct, impress or train who does not appreciate the value of dingdong. Human beings, old and young, are both inattentive and forgetful. The truths that tell upon them are those made familiar by iteration. The lessons that count are those repeatedly enforced. Child-rearing is not infrequently a failure because the necessity of telling the same thing over and over is not understood. Solomon's "train up a child in the way he should go," involves in it nothing more manifest than endless repetition. Isaiah made his message to his countrymen a burden on their souls by everlastingly harping on it. "Precept upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little, there a little," was what made them feel its power. The pulpit that in fear of Mrs. Grundy severely rules iteration from a discourse will leave little impression upon the memory of its hearers. The sermon that sticks and pricks like Spanish-needles repeats and re-repeats its leading points till the people cannot get away from them. The power of Phillips Brooks' preaching was his habit of going over and over his leading thoughts till the most listless auditor was forced to retain them. He well knew the value of dingdong. It is better for a preacher to run the risk of tediousness than to fail of being understood and remembered.

And from year to year the pulpit must again and again go over the cardinal points of Christian doctrine, however familiar to many, that all may be instructed therein. The cry once so common, that some preachers preached nothing but "faith, repentance and baptism," indicated a habit of repetition that, so far as the preaching went, was at least effective. Better a limited range of teaching well impressed, than a wider and fuller range but slightly impressed.

And nothing is truer than that a doctrine at first repugnant to the mind, often comes to be accepted and believed when made familiar by frequent explanation and enforcement. Mrs. Browning truly says, "Mankind gets its opinions by iteration chiefly." It is not argumentation so much as felicitous statement and re-statement that shapes men's belief. They yield to the pressure of constant repetition. There is a mental as well as a physical inertia, and it is best overcome by continued applications of the moving force. "The world does not stand in need of instructing so much as it does of reminding." Each wise repetition of doctrine and duty, like the ceaseless flowing of the stream, wears deeper the channels of conviction and conscience. And the very familiarity of a truth well presented, and of an obligation well enforced, gives power to the utterance which brings them afresh to the mind.

In a word, he who hopes to accomplish anything worth while in the instruction and training of human beings, must learn the power and value of dingdong.

America Revisited.

saw that the Disciples had solved the problem involved, and that was why I was lead among them. To my great astonishment I even find that some of the master minds amongst the American Baptists are strenuously advocating the view that baptism is not an essential to church membership. I say that this astonishes me, for I had thought that while some of the denomination were prepared to go in for open communion, no minister of influential standing would proceed further. But I commence reading the report, and I find that the first paper, read by the Rev. Dr. Rufus P. Johnston, of New York City, very powerfully claims that no Christian should be excluded from membership simply because unimmersed. This Baptist clergyman shows that the constant tendency in religious history is to the subordination of the inner to the outer, of the vital to the formal, of the substance to the shadow. "To make baptism essential to membership," says he, "is to perpetuate a cleavage in the body of Christ along the line of ceremony only. It is also to emphasize ceremony rather than character, and to exalt the letter above the spirit. Such a position of exclusion compels us, is the further argument, to disregard the fundamental principle of the Bible with respect to individual interpretation of Scripture." Now, I confess I should never have expected to find a representative American Baptist prepared to take up the position of the "Open Church Baptists" of England. The position of Spurgeon was that of open fellowship with strict membership. This I believe to be very near to the ideal. Therefore I am a little bit bewildered when I find prominent leaders in America pulling up their anchors and quitting their moorings, and, more than that, going off to sea with no anchor at all.

However, I have many things to learn while I am happily here once again for a season. And some of them may be acquired while I rusticate in the glorious groves of chestnut, white oak, rock oak, butternut, hickory, hemlock, pine and birch, with wild strawberries ripening about my feet among the thick lichens and mosses, orioles and robins darting here and there, the chipmunk, unknown in England, attracting my delighted attention now and then, and the great grey squirrels rushing with amazing velocity up and down the trees. A great snapping turtle has just been brought in captive, and a garter snake a yard in length has been killed with cries of excitement. I cross the lake in my kind host's steam-launch, or mount a cycle for a somewhat hilly ride along the road between the glades. Hopatcong lies about a thousand feet above New York. It is a fisherman's paradise, abounding in bass, perch, pickerel, catfish and sunfish. Being sixty miles in circumference, this lovely lake affords scope for countless different excursions. Its islands, bays and branches are romantic in aspect, and are associated with singular traditions. Here dwelt some of the various Delaware tribes of Indians, and of these I am learning fascinating histories which, if I were a novelist, would furnish me with pivots for many a plot.

The Child.

When Mary sang to him, I wonder if His baby hand stole softly to her lips
And, smiling down, she needs must stop her song
To kiss and kiss again his finger-tips.

I wonder if, his eyelids being shut,
And Mary bending mutely over him,
She felt her eyes, as mothers do to-day,
For very depth of love grow wet and dim.

Then did a sudden presage come to her
Of bitter looks and words and thorn-strewn street?
And did she catch her breath and hide her face,
And shower smothered kisses on his feet?

A Good Investment.

John and James were twins fourteen years old. Their father was very wealthy. On every birthday they expected a rich present from him. A week before they were fourteen they were talking over what they most wanted.

"I want a pony," said James.

"And what do you want, John," asked his father.

"A boy."

"A boy!" gasped his father.

"Yes, sir, It doesn't cost much more to keep a boy than it does a horse, does it?"

"Well, no," replied his father, still very much surprised.

"And I can get a boy for nothing, to begin with."

"Yes," replied the father, hesitatingly, "I suppose so."

"Why, papa, I know so. There are lots of 'em running around without any home."

"Oh, that's what you are up to, is it? Want to take a boy and bring him up, do you?"

"Yes, sir; it would be a great deal better than the St. Bernard dog you were going to buy me wouldn't it? You see, my boy could go about with me, play with me, and do all kinds of nice things for me—and I could do nice things for him, too, couldn't I? He could go to school, and I could help him with his examples and Latin."

"Examples and Latin? God bless the boy, what is he aiming at?" and Judge Roding wiped the sweat from his bald head.

"I know," laughed James. "He wants to adopt old drunken Pete's son."

"Yes, papa; 'cause he is running about the streets as dirty and ragged as he can be, and old Pete don't care a cent about him, and he's a splendid boy, father. He's just as smart as he can be, only he can't go to school half the time, 'cause he hasn't anything decent to wear."

"How long do you want to keep him?"

"Until he gets to be a man, father."

"And turns out to be such a man as old Pete?"

"No danger of that, father. He has signed the pledge not to drink intoxicants, nor swear, nor smoke, and he has helped me, father, for when I have wanted to do such things he told me his father was once a rich man's son, and just as promising as James and I."

"Do you mean to tell me that you ever feel like doing such things as drinking, swearing, smoking and loafing?" asked his father, sternly.

"Why, papa, you don't know half the temptations boys have nowadays. Why, boys of our set swear and smoke and drink right along when nobody sees them."

"Don't let me ever catch you doing such things."

"Not now, father, I think, for I am trying to surrender all—every vice, every bad habit, unnecessary pleasures. I don't see how I could enjoy a dog or a pony when I know a nice boy suffering for some of the good things I enjoy."

"You may have the boy, John, and may God bless the gift."

And God blessed the gift. John Roding grew up to be a much better man because of the almost constant companionship of drunken Pete's son, and as for the drunkard's boy, everything he touched seemed to prosper. John and James' mother said it was because the Lord teaches us, "When your father and mother forsake you, then will the Lord take you up." The Lord had taken up drunken Pete's son, and he could not help prospering.

Pete's son not only lifted up his own fallen family, but became as much of a prop for Judge Roding's family. His delight was "in the law of the Lord." He was like a tree planted by the rivers of water, and whatsoever he did prospered.—National Advocate.

A Prize Letter on Training Children.

One of the St. Louis daily papers recently offered a prize, for the best letter on the training of children. The following is the letter which won the prize:

Blessed is the child who early learns from his best friends that he cannot have everything he wants; for he shall escape much tribulation.

Despotisms make slaves or anarchists. Commands should be given only for good reasons; but, once given, obedience must be exacted.

Whippings should be resorted to as rarely as possible, and never in anger. The loss of some expected pleasure, a kiss, or meditation in solitude often prove more effective in conquering a little rebel.

Hope of reward, which enlists the child's will in the cause of right, is a better motive than fear of punishment.

Beware of nagging. It wears away love. Win and keep your child's confidence by sympathy and interest in all his joys and woes. It is a mighty bulwark against temptations.

Teach him to be courteous to all, even the humblest.

Love without law and law without love both fail to teach the child self-control. There must be a combination of law and love, wisdom and sympathy, firmness and gentleness, justice and mercy, so that out of the government of the child, for the child, by the parent there may grow the government of the child, for the child, by the child.

The mother who neglects her child for society, the club, church work, or others reasons, is laying up trouble for future years. God gave the precious souls into our keeping, and how shall we answer for it if through our fault one of his lambs goes astray?

Copper Cures Consumption

New Treatment for Consumption Indorsed by Member of British Tuberculosis Congress—
"Antidotum Tuberculose" (the Copper Cure), Marvel of the Medical World—Hope for All, No Matter How Bad Off—Large Trial Treatment Absolutely Free.

Benefits Congressman Dingley's Son and others of Consumption in Their Own Home—Remember there is No Expense or Obligation Attached to the Offer of Free Trial Treatment.

O. K. BUCKHOUT.

Chairman Kalamazoo Tuberculosis Remedy Co. (Ltd.); Member of British Tuberculosis Congress; Member National Association for the Prevention of Consumption.

Consumptives need not worry about their future any more, as the long-looked-for cure for consumption has at last been found. To satisfy yourself of this you have only to write for free trial treatment to the Kalamazoo Tuberculosis Remedy Co. (Ltd.) 534 Main St., Kalamazoo, Mich., of which the chairman is Mr. O. K. Buckhout, a noted member of the British Tuberculosis Congress and also of the National Association for the Prevention of Consumption, composed of world-famous men who have made consumption—its cure and prevention—a life study. This cure is something entirely new and is called "Antidotum Tuberculose," or the Copper Cure, and is the only discovery known that kills all tuberculosis germs which cause consumption, as unless this is done the disease cannot be cured.

You can tell if you have consumption by the coughing and hawking, by continually spitting, especially in the morning when you raise yellow and black matter, by bleeding from the lungs, night sweats, flat chest, fever, weak voice, peculiar flushed complexion, pain in chest, wasting away of the flesh, etc. Find out how the Copper Cure kills the germs, then builds up the lungs, strengthens the heart, puts flesh on the body and muscles on the bones until the consumption is all gone and you are again a strong, healthy, robust man or woman.

Don't doubt this, for the very same discovery benefited A. H. Dingley, a son of Congressman Dingley of Dingley Tariff Bill fame, who after going West and South for relief was benefited by "Antidotum Tuberculose" after all else had failed.

So don't give up hope and don't spend your money in travel. Attend to it right away, for consumption spreads to other members of the family if you have consumption or fear you are predisposed to it, write to-night to the Kalamazoo Tuberculosis Remedy Co. (Ltd.) 534 Main St., Kalamazoo, Mich., for the FREE Trial Treatment and the plain and comprehensive literature which they will gladly send you, all charges prepaid. Remember the trial treatment is absolutely FREE.

CANCER and tumors cured (mild cases in one hour); no pain; no knife or burning plaster; patients return home same day. Investigate; not as represented I will pay your expenses. Cancer symptoms, references and consultation free.

Four T's.

There are four T's too apt to run,
'Tis best to set a watch upon:

Our Thoughts.

Of when alone they take them wings,
And light upon forbidden things.

Our Temper.

Who in the family guards it best,
Soon has control of all the rest.

Our Tongue.

Know when to speak, yet be content
When silence is most eloquent.

Our Time.

Once lost, ne'er found: yet who can say
He's overtaken yesterday?

Starved to Death.

A bit of biography, as told by another, is suggestive here: "Early Carlyle wooed and won one of the most brilliant girls of his day, whose signal talent shone in the crowded drawing-rooms of London like a sapphire blazing among pebbles. Yet her husband lacked gentleness; slowly harshness crept into Carlyle's voice

"Soon the wife gave up her favorite authors to read her husband's notes; then she gave up all readings to relieve him of details; at last her very being was placed upon the altar of sacrifice—fuel to feed the flame of his fame and genius. Long before the end came, she was submerged and almost forgotten.

"One day, two distinguished foreign authors called on Mr. and Mrs. Carlyle. For an hour the philosopher poured forth a vehement tirade against the commercial spirit, while the good wife never once opened her lips; at last the author ceased talking, and there was silence for a time.

"Suddenly Carlyle thundered: 'Jane, stop breathing so loud!' Long years before, Jane had stopped doing everything else except breathing; and so, obedient to the injunction, a few days afterward, she ceased breathing so loud. When a few weeks had gone by, Carlyle discovered, through reading her journal, that his wife had, for want of affection, frozen and starved to death within his own home, like some poor traveler who had fallen in the snows beyond the door.

"For years, without realizing it, she had kept all the wheels oiled, kept his body in health, and his mind in happiness. Only when it was too late did the husband realize that his fame was largely his wife's. Then did the old man begin his pathetic pilgrimage to his wife's grave, where Froude often found him murmuring: 'If I had only known! If I had only known!'"

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers, that they offer one Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

By J. Breckenridge Ellis

Jennie Hollandsworth, Bismarck, Ill.: "I come back to-day, bringing my report with me. I suppose everybody is getting ready for the Fourth of July." (By the way, why not tell us how you spent the Fourth? I mean this to all the Av. S. members.) "I wonder why we never hear from Alta Tucker and Madge Masters? But then, I suppose hot weather is very trying. It surely is for the hens." (And so you conclude it must be for the chickens. If I were Alta or Madge, I would n't stand that!) "I hope the account given by Jessie Underwood will be very beneficial to the owners of hens, if not for the hens themselves. For fear I stay longer than I am welcome, I had better make my exit." (I don't think you stayed near long enough. The next time, you really must take off your hat!)

Lois A. Ely, Memphis, Mo.: "I have succeeded in keeping the Av. S. rules 12 weeks. It does not tax a person's memory much to keep them after once getting started. Your name never appears on the Honor List. Have you tried keeping the rules and not succeeded? (I do not put my name on the List because I keep it right here in the house. It's like kinfolks. And I would have to pass upon my own report and give myself the prize, if I won it.) "Horace Wyndum must be quite an interrogation-point. I wonder if he is kin to the boy we read about, who was always asking 'Why?' I can beat E. Searcy in size. I am the same age she is. I measured five feet and almost eight inches to-day. I said there is an Advance Society organized in Rochester, Minn. I don't know how it is progressing. Probably quite slowly. There was only one person who had kept the rules when we left there." (You?) "We moved in May. I will close, as I have said fully enough of nothing." (I think you are too hard on your family.) "I never could write letters, but of course there is no use telling you that, as you have found it out by this time." (Indeed, I had not made the discovery.)

Flossie Davis, Des Moines, Ia.: "I was on my 12th week when I got sick and didn't read my Bible. I had read my poetry, and learned a quotation. Now isn't it a shame that I have to lose all that?" (It will be a shame if you do. Of course you can't go on the Honor List, but the good we do is never lost. Even if it is forgotten, it has helped to strengthen our hearts or minds while it was going on; we are always the better for it afterwards.) "I am going to begin again next week. Some time ago, in one of Lois Ely's letters, she wondered if I remembered her. Why, to be sure I do! I will tell you about one of my most enjoyable days at Lake Minnetonka, two years ago. My cousins have a little launch which holds about a dozen. There were nine of us that summer day who rode across the lake to Big Island, where we landed and climbed up a high, steep bank, at the top of which was a lovely place for dinner." (I have a splendid place for dinner at this very minute; it's inside.) "We took some fruit, a watermelon and some roasting-ears, and, oh, yes! some ham and eggs, which the girls fried over the fire and made ham anns. Did you ever eat any ham anns?" (Never.) "Oh, my! they are delicious while they are hot." (Oh, my! I wish I had some. All the Ann's I ever knew had to be spel'd with big a letter, and I never saw any difference in them, hot or cold.) "We stuck the roasting ears on the ends of long sticks, and roasted them over the fire. After dinner we sat there and rested and talked quite a while. It was such a high place we could see ever so far. On our way home we landed at Stork Island. It isn't a nice place, at all, the brush is so thick. It is only inhabited by storks. We were pretty tired when we got home, but were well pleased with the day."

Clara R. Pfrimmer, Corydon, Ind. "Like George Burne, I am puzzled about Zella Manley's letter, Zella, what are shakes? A few weeks ago we had an operetta here called the 'National Flower,' that I was in. It was a red rose." (Must have been a big one.) "Have any of you seen it? The roses, daisies, lilies, sunflowers, goldenrods, clover, and even the onion and thistle came to compete for the honor of being the national flower. No one knew who the jury was going to decide, and it was very interesting guessing who was to be the one. We were all in costume to represent the flowers." (The one who represented the onion must have used 'most a bottle of perfumery.) "When the time came for the secret to be disclosed, what do you think was the national flower? Why, a sack of flour! The second night we gave it, they wanted a different one. Well, there was an old maid among the characters; so of course wall-flower was the one chosen."

NEW HONOR LIST: Clara R. Pfrimmer, 6th quarter; Lois A. Ely, Olive Leavitt, Frankfort, S. D., (6th); Maud Gorman, Ozark, Ark. (2nd); Claire Saunders, Ozark; Eva Hawkins, Ozark (2nd); Lizzie McLain, Thayer, Mo.; Vina Hawkins, Ozark, (2nd); Burleigh Cash, Hood River, Ore., (15th); Harry Cash, (15th); Irma Cunningham, Mantion, Cal.; Lula Taylor, Mantion, (6th); Bessie Taylor, Mantion, (6th); Ruth Taylor, Mantion, (4th); Eunice Saunders, Ozark; Maude Kelley, Saskatoon, Sask, Canada, (7th); May Speece, Bucklin, Mo, (3rd); Manie Bayless, Mulkeytown, Ill. I am proud of this Honor List. I should like to hear from the Fourth of July celebrations and picnics. Who got burnt? Who got left at home? Who had too much lemonade? Tell us about it.

Publishers' Notes.

Are you needing a Baptismal Suit? We can furnish first-class suits at reasonable prices. We will be glad to give full information to those who want to buy a Baptismal Suit.

Let us send you our Tract Circular. This circular gives titles and prices of 122 different tracts and small books. Send for a few cents' worth of tracts, and read them, and then hand them to your neighbor.

Your church, Sunday-school or Endeavor Society may need new song books. We publish several different books and will be glad to give list of our music books and prices. Write us and your letter will have prompt attention.

The Christian Hymnal Revised is strictly a church Hymnal. It contains spiritual songs and hymns that will give any church an uplift in the song service. We can furnish the book in board binding at $25 per hundred, and in cloth binding with gilt stamp and red edges at $50 per hundred.

We can furnish first-class communion ware, quadruple plated. Our communion ware is manufactured by one of the most reliable houses in this country. Write us stating the number of pieces of communion ware your church will need and we will take pleasure in giving prices.

Send to us for our catalogue if you want to know what books have been written by our people from the time of Alexander Campbell to the present time. We publish a large per cent of the writings of our people and in our catalogue will be found a list of their books. Our catalogue mailed free on receipt of request.

The books composing the Bethany Reading Course should be read by the young people in our Endeavor societies, Sunday-schools and church members. The nine books were prepared by the following: B. B. Tyler, F. D. Power, J. W. McGarvey, H. L. Willett, A. McLean and W. J. Lhamon. Price of each book 35 cents. Write us for full description.

The Missionary Intelligencer has the following to say in a recent notice of "The Fundamental Error of Christendom." "This book is a very able discussion of a very important subject. It is not claiming too much to hold that the main argument is unanswerable." This book is a late publication from our press and the price is $1.00 postpaid.

A Shaped Note Edition of the Christian Sunday-school Hymnal has just been printed by us. We have published this book in attractive board

If you are teaching children in the Sunday-school who cannot read, you should use the lessons in the Beginner's Course.

The Easy Book contains the lessons for children who are just beginning in the Sunday-school. The Easy Book has 52 lessons, being all the lessons for the first year of the Beginner's Course.

The price of the Easy Book is 30 cents per copy postpaid, or $3 per dozen prepaid.

binding and greatly reduced the price from former prices. We have frequent calls for music books with shaped or character notes, and can recommend this edition of the Christian Sunday-school Hymnal as a splendid, all purpose music book. We can furnish this music book at $2.40 per dozen, or $18 per hundred copies, sent by express not prepaid.

PERSONAL TO SUBSCRIBERS!

NOEL SAYS:

If you are sick with any disease of the Circulation, the Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder or Throat, VITÆ-ORE WILL CURE YOU!

NOEL is the discoverer of Vitæ-Ore, has been familiar with its wonderful properties for two generations, has watched its remarkable action in thousands upon thousands of cases, and HE OUGHT TO KNOW.

NOEL SAYS he doesn't want your money unless Vitæ-Ore benefits you, and NOEL is old enough to know what he wants. NOEL SAYS that the Theo. Noel Company has instructions to send a full sized one dollar package on thirty days' trial to every sick or ailing reader of this paper who requests it, the receiver to BE THE JUDGE, and not to pay ONE CENT unless satisfied, and NOEL is the President and principal stockholder of the Theo. Noel Company, and what HE says goes. Here is his SIGNATURE ON IT:

Theo Noel

Read This Special Offer

WE WILL SEND to every subscriber or reader of THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST or worthy person recommended by a subscriber or reader, a full-sized One Dollar package of VITÆ-ORE, by mail, Postpaid, sufficient for one month's treatment, to be paid for in one month's time after receipt, if the receiver can truthfully say that its use has done him or her more good than all the drugs and dopes of quacks or good doctors or patent medicines he or she has ever used. Read this over again carefully, and understand that we ask our pay only when it has done you good, and not before. We take all the risk; you have nothing to lose. If it does not benefit you, you pay us nothing. Vitæ-Ore is a natural, hard, adamant, rock-like substance—mineral—Ore—mined from the ground like gold and silver, and requires about twenty years for oxidization. It contains free iron, free sulphur and magnesium, and one package will equal in medicinal strength and curative value 800 gallons of the most powerful, efficacious mineral water drunk fresh at the springs. It is a geological discovery, to which there is nothing added or taken from. It is the marvel of the century for curing such diseases as Rheumatism, Bright's Disease, Blood Poisoning, Heart Trouble, Dropsy, Catarrh and Throat Affections, Liver, Kidney and Bladder Ailments, Stomach and Female Disorders, La Grippe, Malarial Fever, Nervous Prostration, and General Debility, as thousands testify, and as no one, answering this, writing for a package, will deny after using. Vitæ-Ore has cured more chronic, obstinate, pronounced incurable cases, than any other known medicine and will reach such cases with a more rapid and powerful curative action than any medicine, combination of medicines, or doctor's prescription which it is possible to procure.

VITÆ-ORE.

A geological wonder, discovered by Theo. Noel, Geologist, and mined from the ground like GOLD AND SILVER.

Vitæ-Ore will do the same for you as it has for hundreds of readers of this paper, if you will give it a trial. Send for a $1.00 package at our risk. You have nothing to lose but the stamp to answer this announcement. We want no one's money whom Vitæ-Ore cannot benefit. You are to be the judge! Can anything be more fair? What sensible person, no matter how prejudiced he or she may be, who desires a cure and is willing to pay for it, would hesitate to try Vitæ-Ore on this liberal offer. One package is usually sufficient to cure ordinary cases; two or three for chronic, obstinate cases. We mean just what we say in this announcement, and will do just as we agree. Write to-day for a package at our risk and expense, giving your age and ailments, and mention this paper, so we may know that you are entitled to this liberal offer. This offer will challenge the attention and consideration, and afterward the gratitude of every living person who desires better health or who suffers pains, ills, and diseases which have defied the medical world and grown worse with age. We care not for your skepticism, but ask only your investigation at our expense, regardless of what ills you have, by sending to us for a package. ADDRESS book: "In my opinion John F. Anderson's book 'An Endeavorer's Working Journey Around the World' is the most interesting book of travels published since Mark Twain wrote 'Innocence Abroad.' Anderson has caught the proper method of writing. Simply tells what he knows in a plain, simple, unaffected style. Mrs. Clark read the book, my little boy read it, and I read it, and we all thoroughly enjoyed it.' The book contains more than 300 pages. Price postpaid $1.50. CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING Co. St. Louis, Mo.

What We Stand For.

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

Current Events

The respective platforms of the Iowa Republican and Democratic conventions are interesting objects for comparison. The former conceded nothing to the "Iowa idea" of fighting the trusts through tariff reduction, except a general statement that schedules that are too high ought to be lowered and those that are too low ought to be raised. This proposition has the value of being invulnerable, but it lacks the virtue of meaning something. To say that whatever is too high ought to be lowered is to say what economists and politicians of every possible complexion cannot dispute without casting a doubt upon their sanity. But the statement is as meaningless as $X \text{ equals } X$, unless one defines his terms. What schedules are too high? What is the criterion by which it shall be determined whether a schedule is too high or too low? If this reference to rates that are too high and too low is to be interpreted solely in the light of the paragraph re-affirming the historic doctrine of protection, then it might as well have been omitted, for it adds nothing to that paragraph. Could it have been intended to hold out a specious hope of tariff reduction to those who favor that policy, while really committing the party to nothing more revolutionary than the first axiom of logic? If it was meant for a promise with a loop-hole, one would suggest that it lacks subtlety. The loop-hole is more conspicuous than the promise.

The new Iowa Democratic platform has been generally characterized, by those not in sympathy with it, as foolish and vain because it demands some things which, whether desirable or not, are at present unattainable. The criticism seems to us to lack force. It is not always in vain that one voices a demand for the unattainable. The Iowa Democrats ask for the removal of the tariff from trust-made articles; not a very definite demand perhaps, because of the difficulty of saying just what articles are trust-made, and one not at all likely to be granted so long as the lobbies of the capitol are thronged with representatives of the trusts whenever tariff revision is in the air. And yet it may be a very sane demand. They ask for a tariff for revenue only; improbable, of course, but no more improbable than Democratic victory in Iowa on any platform. If they must fail, why not fail on a frank expression of their sentiments? The Iowa Democrats refused by a decisive vote to endorse the Kansas City platform of 1900 which Mr. Bryan considers the test of Democratic orthodoxy. But they accepted some so-called "socialistic" features, notably a demand that the federal government be empowered to seize the sources of supply and control the distribution of any staple product whose price becomes unreasonably high by reason of monopoly or combine, and that railroad rates should be so limited as to yield only a fair dividend on the capital actually invested. Personally, we think President Roosevelt's method of dealing with the trusts, as in the Northern Securities case, is likely to produce more good results and fewer bad ones than any of these sweeping programs. But that is no reason why a man or a party should be condemned for utter fatuity for advocating policies which there is no reasonable chance of carrying into effect at once. What we have more than once said regarding the present duty of the Democratic party is in a general way true of any and every party—that the true policy is not to go into a quadrennial spasm of anxiety to find a set of issues that will win a campaign, but to settle calmly and deliberately upon some principles that ought to win and that will be worth something if they win, and then stick to them till they do win or until they are seen to be erroneous. One cannot but admire Mr. Bryan for one thing—his unwillingness to admit that defeat is a proof of error. It does not follow that the party must forever cling to the free silver doctrine, but it must in all honesty do so until it has a better reason for deserting it than the mere fact that it has twice led to defeat. A great many Democrats see no convincing reason for giving up the free silver propaganda; others think they have had such a reason and are honorably discharged from further service to the Chicago and Kansas City platforms; in the case of others the search for new issues is but the opportunist casting about for some sort of craft on which he can ride to victory. And the third class is the least honorable of all.

There seems to be a reasonable probability that Maryland is about to witness a gubernatorial campaign that will be almost unique in its freedom from corrupt practice. Such a prospect is especially surprising when one remembers that Senator Gorman has been rehabilitated and restored to the United States Senate, and that he is now the dominant factor in the Democratic party in Maryland. It happens this way. The most probable candidate for the nomination on the Democratic ticket is Mr. Edwin Warfield, president of the Fidelity Trust and Deposit Company of Baltimore. Mr. Warfield is a man of business honor who has never discovered how a man can consistently be honorable in business and dishonorable in politics. So he declares that if he is nominated he will not spend a cent except for legitimate campaign expenses, and that at the end of the campaign he will publish an itemized account of all disbursements, to whom they were paid and for what. Here is a laudable plan. It may, however, work out disastrously for the party, for some who are on the inside say that it will cost fifty thousand dollars to elect the Democratic ticket in Maryland. It will be a hard blow to Senator Gorman's leadership if he does not carry his own state. The probable Republican nominee, Mr. S. A. Williams, is also known to be opposed to the usual Maryland method of using campaign funds.

For ten days the world has been hourly expecting the news of the Pope's death. A complication of pulmonary and heart troubles brought him to the point of death more than a week ago, but there he lingers. The wonderful degree of vitality, which he retains in spite of his ninety-three years and his apparently frail physique, enabled him to rally when his heart seemed to be almost at the last beat, and for a few days there seemed to be some prospect of his recovery. But a relapse is reported, and it is asserted that the end can not be delayed more than a day or two longer. Unlike most of his fellow-countrymen, the pope is said to have been during his whole life a total abstainer from wine, and this fact gave added efficacy to the stimulants upon which his strength has been kept up during these last days. Leo's name before his election to the papacy was Vincent Joachim

Pecci. It is now sixty-six years since he entered the priesthood, fifty years since he became a cardinal, and twenty-five years since he entered upon his pontificate. He has witnessed many and wonderful changes in the church and in the civil governments of Europe. Out of the Napoleonic cataclysm have arisen the modern states of France, Germany, Italy and Greece. The papacy has ceased to be a temporal power, and in so doing has made possible a united Italy. As an Italian, Leo cannot but rejoice in the emergence of his country from the old regime of wars and revolutions into the new era of peace and stability; but as pope he has never forgiven his country for purchasing national unity at the price of what he considers an affront to the church, the abolition of the pope's temporal sovereignty. In all the manifold complexity of his situation, as one who was a sovereign and yet not a sovereign, with more than royal claims and less than royal power, Leo has shown a rare quality of statesmanship and a lofty character which have won the admiration of many who have been compelled to disapprove and oppose his plans. Considering his long life, his wide experience, his shrewd insight into men and movements and his unique position, a volume of memoirs written by him and giving his view of the events and men with whom he has been contemporary would be the most valuable memoirs of the century.

An increasing volume of adverse sentiment is confronting Secretary Root in regard to the proposed Philippine opium monopoly. We have already expressed our opinion and have given our reasons for it at some length. The proposed arrangement would ally the government with a commercial monopoly, which is bad; it would ally the government with a monopoly for the sale a commodity that everyone admits is harmful, which is worse; it would add nothing to the difficulty of smuggling and would make it no harder for Americans and natives to get opium than at present; it would, like all limited and half-way measures, be hard to enforce. It seems to us worth while to quote the editorial opinion of one of the prominent illustrated weeklies on this subject. Leslie's Weekly for June 9 says:

Regarding the use of opium, except for medicinal purposes, there is not, as in the case of alcoholic stimulants, any difference of opinion among rational men; it is everywhere regarded as a terrible vice, an unmitigated curse to humanity. To propose, therefore, to create a monopoly in this deadly and loathsome drug, to sanction its sale to a single race already enslaved to its use, seems on the face of it to be a measure so repugnant to an enlightened conscience, and so contrary to the principles of our so-called Christian civilization, that we are led to wonder why a body made up, as the Philippine commission undoubtedly is, of clear-headed and high-minded men, should have brought it forward for serious consideration.

The only attitude which our government should assume toward the opium traffic—and the only attitude it can assume, in our judgment, consistent with its declared policy and aims in the Philippines—is one of absolute prohibition, except for strictly medicinal purposes. In no form, direct or indirect, by license laws or monopoly concessions, should the United States government be a party to the spread or the perpetuation of one of the most damning and demoralizing habits known to erring humanity, a vice which in China alone is said to number over five million victims and to be responsible for the ruin and death every year of over a hundred thousand persons.

Not dollars, but immigrants. At the present rate of increase over the records of earlier years, it is estimated that not less than a million emigrants will enter the United States during 1903. This is the estimate of Marcus Braun, who was sent by President Roosevelt as a special commissioner to Europe to study the problem from that end of the route. One day in April, 12,500 immigrants entered the port of New York. During 1902 the total number was about 750,000. The increase this year over the corresponding months of last year is striking. March showed an increase of 21 per cent, April, 30 per cent, and the percentage is increasing during the summer months. It is almost certain to reach the million mark. Here is a race problem of another sort. It less frequently breaks out in the form of a positive resistance to law or an incitement to mob violence, but it furnishes a steady negative force opposed to American ideas and menacing our institutions, by reason of the incapacity of the naturalized immigrant to perform those functions of citizenship which our institutions assume that he is capable of performing. The wonder of the age is that we have been able to assimilate this foreign stock so rapidly. The pity is that we have been willing to receive it so much more rapidly than we could assimilate it. It is one thing to talk grandiloquently about our land being "an asylum for the oppressed of all the earth." It is another thing to keep our government so clean and strong that our land will be a fit asylum for anybody. There is such a thing as over-crowding a life-boat until all are lost; and a country which goes into the asylum business with no limitations may likewise be swamped. Mr. Braun says: "In Russia, Italy and Austria-Hungary the tide is simply uncontrollable. Whole communities are undergoing depopulation. Austria-Hungary alone is making sincere efforts to check the movement. Italy frankly regards the United States as a convenient haven for its surplus masses. The Kishineff massacre will greatly increase the emigration of Russian Jews. Unfortunately, it is probable that there will be a decrease of emigration from Germany and Scandinavia." If we could apply a moral test to those who seek admission to our country, that would be the best. But moral standards are hard to apply in any such wholesale manner. The next best plan is an educational test more rigid than any that has yet been applied.

President Loubet has returned King Edward's recent visit. During the French president's sojourn in the British capital there were many evidences of friendly popular feeling toward him and his country. In this respect the visit afforded a gratifying parallel to King Edward's visit to Paris. The British, people, however, have never been quite so demonstrative as the French in giving expression to the traditional antipathy between the two nations. The visits of rulers are seldom without a political significance, and it is being generally conjectured that these friendly overtures of King Edward and President Loubet, indicating as they unquestionably do a rapprochement between England and France, will have a special significance in the far east. Hitherto France, by her alliance with Russia, has been arrayed against the Anglo-Japanese alliance and practically against all the other powers who are represented there. Perhaps it has begun to dawn upon the makers of French policy that their government has nothing to gain by standing as the ally of Russia in her disreputable struggle for Manchuria and that she might profitably hedge by making friends with her neighbor across the channel, who, with the United States, stands for the open door as opposed to the Russian demand for exclusive privileges. If a tacit and informal agreement of this sort can be made between England and France—and of course there cannot at present be more than that—it will leave Russia in something of the status of "splendid isolation" which has been considered the distinguishing trait of British foreign policy—only there will be even more isolation and considerably less splendor.

The plan to hold union evangelistic services in St. Louis during the entire period of the World's Fair, under the direction of Mr. Campbell Morgan, has been abandoned, owing to the failure of the committee and Mr. Morgan to agree upon plans. Mr. Morgan's idea was to erect a large central building to be used as the headquarters for religious work, but the committee thought it would be impossible to raise enough money to carry out this plan. Mr. Morgan has therefore withdrawn and other plans will be adopted.

Brevities.

Perfecting Organization.

The scientific name for what we are to speak about in this article would probably be, harmony with environment; that is the co-ordination of the life-principle in the church with surrounding conditions and needs. This is the meaning and object of what we call church organization. We have already seen what this was in its outline, at least, in the early church. We see no reason why all necessary development in the organization of the church for work and worship should not be based upon these main lines. They constitute, as it seems to us, the true form for church organization and government. These are, as previously pointed out, the local church as a self-governing body, with suitable persons set apart to supply its material and spiritual needs, and such relations of fellowship and co-operation between these local churches as would naturally grow out of their common faith, their common life and their common aim.

It is a great misconception of the spirit and intent of the New Testament, however, to suppose that we are limited strictly to the organization which we there find. It must necessarily be that in the growth and development of the church, under new conditions, a further development of its organization should take place, but along lines in harmony with the principles expressed in the original organization. We see evidences of this growth in organization in the New Testament itself, and there is no reason for supposing that it ceased, or that it was intended to cease, with the close of the first century. We have no exact pattern for what we now call the Sunday-school, for instance, in the New Testament, although it cannot be doubted that there was an effort to meet the same fundamental need which the Sunday-school is intended to supply, not only in the apostolic church, but in subsequent centuries until the idea of the modern Sunday-school was developed. There is no such official in the New Testament as a Sunday-school superintendent, secretary, librarian, or teachers specially for such organization.

What, then, is the real authority for this addition to the organization which we find in the New Testament? Does it not lie in the fact that the Sunday or Bible-school is accomplishing a work which has been laid upon the church, that of teaching the word, and that it is in perfect harmony with the whole spirit and aim of the New Testament? If this be so, we have here an illustration of the principle stated, that it is the life of the church that determines the quality and quantity of organization. If a church were dead, having no spiritual life prompting it to teach others, or propagate its principles, it would need no Sunday-school nor any other form of organization, because it would have no life to express or communicate. We have, then, the same authority for any other organization that has a legitimate work to do, and which can be done better by such organization than otherwise, as we have for the Sunday-school. If we had remembered this plain principle, and had acted upon it, it would have saved us from an endless amount of discussion and of wasted resources and opportunities.

It is in the principle stated above that we have the necessary authority for our missionary, educational and benevolent organizations. These are but methods by which the churches of a common faith and a common life co-operate to carry out the work which has been laid upon the church by her divine Lord. They in no way interfere with the autonomy of the local churches nor with their local internal organizations. On the contrary they stimulate and greatly strengthen the local churches by furnishing channels through which the divine life that is in them may flow out for the blessing of mankind. The very moment such organization should assume authority to dictate to local congregations, or exercise any sort of tyranny over the consciences of individual members of the church, they would violate New Testament precedent and teaching and would forfeit the confidence and support of the brotherhood. In this fact we have a sufficient guarantee that no such role will ever be assumed by these general organizations. Besides, they are the creatures of, and are controlled by, the local churches and their representatives.

We have found now the divine intent of church organization, the New Testament pattern, in bold outline, and the law which must govern the expansion of organization. It remains for us to consider the question as to whether our organization to-day, as churches of the reformation of the nineteenth century, is adequate for carrying forward successfully the work which we are seeking to accomplish, and what, if any, modification or extension is demanded to make it more successful.

Church Arbitration.

The Pacific Christian has been discussing the problem of the settlement of disputes and misunderstandings among brethren in such cases as do not readily fall within the jurisdiction of the local congregation. Its attention has naturally been called to this subject by recent developments in its own state. In a late issue of the paper the editor says:

But one of the greatest questions confronting the Disciples of Christ to-day is that of the proper exercise of the judicial function. The importance of this question does not grow so much out of any local necessity or method of discipline, good or bad, as out of the necessity of a better understanding of principles of discipline as they ought to be applied in the larger circles of Christian activity; and as they must be applied to avoid confusion and disorder, and to save ourselves from failure and disgrace before the world.

The editor believes, rightly, as we think, that the principle which Paul lays down in the Corinthian letter of the judication of troubles between brethren by the church rather than by civil tribunal, is a wise one which should as far as practical be adhered to to-day.

If this be true, and the brethren generally recognize its truth, then there should be some method of procedure agreed upon by which every case not coming fairly within the limits of the local congregation might be adjudicated. The editor cites a supposed case, which is really an actual case, as relates to the recent attack on the Berkeley Bible Seminary, and asks this question:

In other words, if a man of large influence, however acquired, should spring up among us and attack a local church or attack a body of men representing in an official character a hundred churches, defying the authority of all, is the sense of justice and the love of law and order sufficiently acute and strong among us to compel that man to come himself before a tribunal and to be judged by the saints? If such a man would be above all tribunals and responsible to no one, there must be a dangerous weakness in our church polity that might at any time prove fatal.

While such a defect might not prove "fatal," it certainly is not conducive to good order, but tends to create confusion, weakness and an evil reputation. A religious body that is jealous of its reputation for the orderly management of its affairs, and for good discipline, ought to devise some method of avoiding such unpleasant episodes as that which has recently occurred among us. The editor of the Pacific Christian remarks that "our polity is scriptural, but it must be expanded to cover conditions under which men have done and are doing as they please to the deep humiliation of our wise and best men, and to our disgrace in the eyes of other people over whom we are sometimes inclined to boast." Few will dissent from the sentiment of that remark.

The plan which the Editor proposes, in brief, is that each state convention "appoint a committee of three whose business it shall be to take cognizance of all such cases;" that the "members of these said committees choose a general or national committee of five, centrally and contiguously located; or let the general convention elect this national committee." It is to be the "business of all these committees to arrange for arbitration, not necessarily to sit in judgment themselves. Arbitrators should be satisfactory to both parties to a controversy, but the element of bias should be eliminated by denying either party the right to choose his special friend."

The method of arranging for arbitration is a matter about which brethren may differ, and concerning which there might be exchange of thought in order to secure the best results, but there does not seem to be any doubt as to the wisdom of applying the principle of arbitration to differences in the church, as well as to those which exist between labor and capital. It is a principle that is in entire harmony with the spirit of the New Testament, and is far preferable in every way to the sensational method of going to law before civil tribunals. If one feels his cause to be just, he ought to feel a greater assurance that he would receive justice from the hands of his own brethren than from any civil tribunal, because his brethren would be apt to understand all the facts and influences bearing on the question better than outside parties. The question is worthy of the careful consideration of the brethren. The Pacific Christian has done well to bring this matter before us, and the plan which it outlines does not seem to us seriously objectionable, but if any one has a better one, let him proceed to state it.

Some Special Features.

It is unusual perhaps for religious papers to announce special features in the midsummer, but we have some excellent things prepared for our readers for the remainder of the year, and our readers and friends might as well know it, especially as we are asking their co-operation with us in a six months' campaign to increase our circulation. We mention a few of these good things:

1. A series of articles from representative men of the leading religious bodies presenting, from their own point of view, the things for which they severally stand. This with the view of promoting a better understanding of each other's position, and so helping on the cause of Christian union. There is probably no greater obstacle in the way of Christian federation and ultimate union than the mutual misunderstandings which even yet exist among the followers of Christ. To remove these misconceptions is the first step towards a closer co-operation. It is believed these articles will also bring out the fact that there is much truth, and that the most fundamental, held in common by all who call Jesus Lord.

2. It is our purpose to deal editorially with questions of church order, organization, worship, discipline and instruction; the ministry, its preparation and calling. We shall aim to call out the best thought of the brotherhood on these questions, and stir up general interest in them.

3. The question of evangelization is always one of pressing importance. We want a half dozen or more leading pastors to tell us the kind of evangelists they would like to hold meetings for them, and as many of our popular evangelists to tell us what kind of churches and pastors they like to hold meetings with. This interchange of views will no doubt be mutually edifying.

4. Here are the titles of a few articles which will appear during the next six months:

The Present Status of Christian Union and the Contribution of the Disciples of Christ to Present Results, by M. E. Harlan.

New York's Hotel Chaplain, by S. T. Willis.

The Preacher at Forty, by T. W. Grafton.

A Day on the Desert, by W. H. Bagby.

The Second Coming of Christ, by Peter Ainslie.

Unpublished Letters of Alexander Campbell.

The Antiquity of Man on the Earth, by Prof. Frederic K. Wright.

Pictorial Glimpses of the History of the Disciples of Christ, by C. C. Redgrave.

The Gift of Tongues.

Brother McGarvey, in his Department of Biblical Criticism, devotes a column to the subject of the gift of tongues in the apostolic age, and in a most fraternal spirit he takes the Editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to task for saying that he is "open for further light on the subject." Brother McGarvey quotes McGiffert, by way of showing what bad company anyone is in who thinks it possible that the gift of tongues may ever have been anything else than the speaking in foreign languages, and he says that if the gift of tongues was any sort of ecstatic and unintelligible speech it was no better than the "delirious shoutings" at a backwoods negro camp-meeting. But strangely enough he does not mention any of the considerations which have led some to believe in the theory of ecstatic speech and impelled others to keep their minds "open to further light." Some of those considerations are the following:

Paul says: "He that speaketh in a tongue speaketh not unto men but unto God; for no man understandeth" (1 Cor. 14:2). This statement is just as explicit as the statement that the Parthians, Medes, etc., on the day of Pentecost heard each in his own language. No one has ever yet discovered how this description of the gift of tongues, as something which "no man understandeth," can be made to apply to the miraculous use of foreign languages as a medium of communication with the people who spoke those languages.

Again Paul says (1 Cor. 14:4): "He that speaketh in a tongue edifieth himself; but he that prophesieth edifieth the church." This description of speaking with tongues does not describe a rational discourse in a foreign language addressed to persons who understood that language.

"If I pray in a tongue, my spirit prayeth but my understanding is unfruitful" (1 Cor. 14:14). This seems to indicate an activity in which the emotions participated but not the intellect. This would fit the idea of ecstatic speech. It does not seem quite likely that a special gift would be given to men to enable them to address God in a foreign language.

Paul warns the brethren not to exercise the gift of tongues in the public assembly unless there is an interpreter present; in the absence of an interpreter each must exercise the gift in private, speaking "to himself and God" (1 Cor. 14:27, 28). But why an interpreter if speaking with tongues meant addressing people in their own language? And why should one "speak to himself and to God" in a foreign language? The reference to interpreters indicates that, if it was a gift of ecstatic utterance indicating a state of emotional exaltation, there was a corresponding gift by which another was enabled to translate that mood and its ecstatic manifestation into intelligible speech.

Brother McGarvey quotes Paul's statement, "I thank God I speak with tongues more than you all," and jumps at the conclusion that speaking with tongues could therefore not have been anything so vulgar as unintelligible and ecstatic speech. But Paul himself goes right on to say (1 Cor. 14:19): "Howbeit in the church I had rather speak five words with my understanding that I might instruct others also, than ten thousand words in a tongue." Does this indicate that speaking with tongues meant preaching the gospel in foreign languages for the edification of foreign auditors?

These are some of the facts to be accounted for by any theory in regard to the gift of tongues. The statements in Acts 2 are also to be taken into account. But one who bases his interpretation on Acts 2 and ignores 1 Cor. 14 has no occasion therein to plume himself on his superior loyalty to the Word of God over those who recognize the difficulties and obscurities of the subject as presented in these and other passages, and therefore keep their minds "open for further light." Meanwhile the foundations of our common faith are not tottering nor are the contents of Peter's pentecostal sermon in danger of being invalidated by any uncertainty as to the exact nature of the gift of tongues.

A brother in Minnesota writes: "I want as many of our congregation as possible to read the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, as it makes them better and more earnest church members. I got the paper into one home at the first of the year and last Lord's day the father, who was not a member, came forward and made the good confession." It often works out that way. Of course there ought to be a truly Christian paper in every truly Christian home, and, as a rule, there is. But a Christian paper in a non-Christian home often makes it Christian.

Editor's Easy Chair.Or Macatawa Musings.

Just as well call it by the old name, for muse we will under these surroundings. The Easy Chair this morning sets by the east window of the study as of old. Readers of these Musings may remember that this window looks out upon a wooded ridge, the trees coming down close to the study, while a peach tree, the only thing in sight planted by human hands, lifts up some of its red fruit, now passing into the stage of ripeness, temptingly near the window. The editorial study has been undergoing repairs, as to its foundation, since our arrival, and is only just now habitable. This is a part of the penalty of building on the sand, but there is nothing else to build on in these parts. What beauty and force there are in that figure of the Master about building on the sand! How like the shifting, uncertain sand, are the vain hopes, earthly ambitions and time-serving policies upon which so many men are building! The other two windows of our study look out upon the lake—one to the southwest and the other to the northwest. Some days our mood takes us to the lake-view and at other times to the woodland view, but in either case the spirit is soothed by the whispers of the leaves, and the changing tones and colors of the great inland sea.

The hot days which have prevailed since the coming of July have tended to rapidly increase the population of the Park. Whereas on our arrival the hotels looked lonesome and there were but few row boats on the lake; now the hotel verandas are scenes of great animation, and launches and row boats and sailing craft keep the water of the little lake in constant agitation. The warm weather in this region has been greatly relieved not only by cooling breezes, but by frequent rains. On the last two nights we have had two very different types of summer rain. The first came up over the lake with a rush and a roar, with lightning-flash and thunder-peal, and was on us before we could get the chairs and rugs from the verandas and the decks cleared for action. The rain beat with the pitiless peltings of the storm-king, when his anger is aroused. The other came on quietly, banking its clouds higher in the western horizon until they had reached the zenith, and then they dissolved in one of those gentle summer rains by the music of which we love to sleep. It pattered on the roof, it dripped from off the trees and from the eaves of the house. Its soft plash was heard out on the lake and upon the sand, and we could image the indescribably pleasant music it was making to the farmer's ear as it was falling upon the corn blades and upon the ripening wheat fields, hereabouts. But each in its own way accomplished its beneficent work. We have no more right to demand of the Creator that He shall send us His rains always in the same way, than we have to expect that He will make all human minds to think alike, feel alike and to work alike, upon the great problems of life.

It would be a great mistake to suppose that because a few people have left the cities for rest and recreation, and others to change their fields of labor, that there is nothing going on in the world of business or religion. The fact is the great tides of human interest flow on unchecked very much by the changing seasons. The world is doing its work. Religion is not suffering paralysis. Commerce is not growing rusty. In our own religious circle there is an undertone of movement and activity throughout the brotherhood. Our religious papers show anything but signs of relaxation. They are sounding the key notes of a forward movement, and are lifting up high ideals for the people to follow. Looking through a large number of our own exchanges, as we receive them here by the lakeside, we can see evidences in most of them of improvement, not alone in their mechanical appearance, but in the spirit and tone of their contents. May the blessings of heaven rest upon every one of them that is studying and advocating the things that make for peace, for purity, for unity, for spiritual power and for ultimate victory! Our missionary, educational and benevolent organizations are none of them resting on their oars, but each, without any great noise or clamor, is quietly pushing its work right on through the heated term. The churches that are churches indeed are not taking any vacation, but are keeping up the regular worship, and so much of their regular activities, as is possible. This is all as it should be. Workers must rest and relieve each other, but the work must go on, for the time is short and there is much to be done.

Up here in the lake region, where the air is very clear and the skies are unclouded with the smoke of furnaces, and the mind is untrammelled by the bewildering details of the work, we seem to see more clearly and distinctly the things which are needed among us than when we are in the midst of the hurry and pressure of the work. Looking at our great brotherhood from this geographical altitude, with a deep and passionate love, which grows stronger with the passing years, for the cause for which it stands, we would state some of its most pressing needs and duties thus: Let us strengthen our colleges, and lay increased emphasis upon an educated and trained ministry. Let churches take vastly more care in the selection of preachers, and feel vastly more responsibility in the matter of preparing men for the ministry. Our general interests—missionary, educational and benevolent—represent the unselfish, philanthropic and aggressive power of our Christianity, and should be fostered and supported by all the local churches. Preaching should be vital, soul-piercing, searching. The pulpit should cultivate in the churches a passion for personal purity and for righteousness, and the preachers should lead the way. Greater emphasis should be placed upon the vital things of religion and practical righteousness. Let us have more religion in the home, in the market-place, in our business offices, and in places of public trust and responsibility. Let us keep before the people the reason for our being as a religious reformation, and above all seek to exemplify by our practice what we preach in our pulpits—the unity of Christians. Let us purge ourselves from all party spirit and sectarian pride and seek to be used of the Master in carrying out his great and wide purposes in the world.

Edgewood-on-the-lake.

The silence has at last been broken—cracked, at least, but not shattered. The Christian Standard has the following, which came to our notice too late for mention in last week's paper:

As indicated some time since, we are determined that no one shall draw us from the main question in the matter of the teaching at the Berkeley Bible Seminary until that issue is entirely disposed of. This explains the "silence" of the Standard with respect to irrelevant things which our friend, the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, would press upon our attention. One thing at a time; that disposed of, we have no objection to deal with other questions which our contemporary calls to our attention. Our "silence" has the significance here set forth—nothing more.

The "irrelevant things" which we have been trying, without much prospect of success, to press upon the attention of our contemporary, are just these: first, the fact that the editor of the Standard was, a few years ago, advocating the abandonment of our position on baptism and the reception of the unimmersed into church membership; second, the fact that he has never, so far as we know, publicly acknowledged his error; and third, the question as to whether the same sort of kind treatment which he received in the days of his heresy, might not now be very properly accorded to those whose opinions he considers unsound. That was all. And they strike us as being extremely relevant. But we were not calling for anything so voluminous as to crowd the VanKirk case out of our contemporary's columns. And yet even if it is going to take considerable space to clear the matter up—which Heaven forbid!—it seems to us that, instead of waiting until the Berkeley matter is entirely disposed of, it would be better to shorten the chapters and carry on the two investigations simultaneously. The contrast and comparison would be most interesting.

The Insanity of Doubt

By N. J. Aylsworth

The study of anthropology has brought into prominence the fact that man is a religious being. A few exceptions no more prove the contrary than an occasional hermit proves that man is not a social being. Enforced hermitage would amount to a blotting out of life to the greater part of the race. Robinson Crusoe even makes companions of the animals about him. So the destruction of religious faith would bring a darkness and enormity of disaster such as imagination cannot compass. But if man be a religious being, there is but one rational conclusion—he should live a religious life. So says science, as well as the scriptures. This command is graven deep in his nature.

But there is another science that has somewhat to say on this subject—a word which, so far as I am informed, has not yet been spoken. Medical science deals with the abnormal as contrasted with the normal. The sick body is not normal, and the physician's aim is to restore it to the normal, which is health. But medical science deals not only with physical ailments. A most important branch of it is concerned with diseases of the mind. Great advances have been made in the knowledge of mental disease, and many forms of insanity are now recognized and measurably understood. "The insanity of doubt" is a medical term, designating one of the forms of insanity, or dementia. There are certain drugs which tend to destroy the mind's sense of reality—to make all things seem unreal. A more complete mental helplessness cannot be imagined than that which would result from a complete destruction of the sense of reality. The eyes might see, the ears hear, and the intellect draw conclusions, but all would be as the idle fancies of a dream. All that concerned the beholder most deeply would be to him but visions without reality. Hungering for life, friendship, love, he would look forth upon a world of phantoms, mocking his design. The hell of Tantalus would be his perpetual doom.

Such states belong in greater or less degree, not only to the effects of drugs, but also to disuse. There is an insanity of doubt—a weakening of the sense of reality—and this may take place even in severe neurasthenia, the mental disabilities of which are not usually classed as insanity. In such cases, other things being equal, those truths that are not cognized by the physical senses are liable to suffer deepest occlusion. There is a weakened certitude in general, and some things pass entirely out of the grasp of conviction. This is quite likely to be the case with religion. The patient may come to regard himself as lost and beyond the hope of salvation, or, if he has been in the habit of thinking for himself, those evidences of religion on which he formerly relied may become unsatisfactory, and all become to him unreal. This may even go so far that he will adopt the "slaughter-house way of talking" (as Emerson puts it) regarding immortality and all religious verities; he has become a coarse infidel. If by proper treatment his ailment is healed, he gradually rises from this condition to his former refined and aspiring faith. These things are well-known to those who are familiar with such cases, and they throw a strong light on the question of religious faith. Faith is superior faculty; unbelief is lack of faculty. The stage of the sceptic can only be reached by a large part of the race through a decay of faculty—dementia. As the man of feeble intellect stands at a level that may be reached by the philosopher only through a course of mental decay, so does the sceptic stand in regard to faith in the great religious verities, as compared with those who believe them strongly. He is not superior, but deficient. It may at first seem strange that he should not know this, but the reason is not far to seek. If a man's memory is weak he knows it, but the matter of faith stands so near to the central self that he cannot bring it into judgment; and he is prone to regard all as dupes who believe what he does not.

Feeble capacity for belief is not altogether a native defect. It may be, and often is, the result of neglect. Charles Darwin, who in early life contemplated the ministry, candidly confessed in his later years that complete engrossment in another sphere of mental activity for a long period had resulted in a decay of religious faculty. It is so of every faculty, as well as of every organ of the body. It has been so in the long history of the animal creation. If through changed environment any organ fell into disuse it degenerated. Those who, with religious faculty, do not live religiously must suffer atrophy and enfeeblement of that faculty. Things that have once appealed to them as real will cease to do so; and, with less intelligence than Darwin, they will be likely to regard their later state as superior, and due to a growth of the understanding, forgetting that influences have been at work to weaken the believing faculty.

Long ago the scriptures declared that in matters of faith there were those who, having eyes to see, saw not, and having ears to hear heard not; and now two of the modern sciences, from their different points of view, are declaring the same thing—one that man is a religious being, and that any who are not so are lacking in one of the endowments of the race; the other, that many can reach the stage of the unbeliever only through insanity, or decay of faculty.

The time has come when impotency of faith should be treated like all other mental defects—recognized as existent and so dealt with as to remedy it. The psychology of unbelief, so long out of sight, and working so much hidden mischief, should be brought forth into clear light and become a recognized factor in the estimation of causes, both with the world at large and with the unbeliever himself. It is time that the scientific view—which accords perfectly with that of the scriptures—should be taken of this matter and that infantile or weakened faculty in this, as in all other departments of our being, should be recognized as needing development and subjected to the necessary means of culture—and this with the acquiescence and desire of the defect himself. Were the intellect treated with the same neglect that the faculty of faith suffers, a new Dark Ages would settle down upon the race. Not without penury and immeasurable loss can any divine endowment be treated with neglect and suppression. The world is groaning in pain to-day for want of greater religious faith to enforce moral law. When morality drops to policy it is no longer moral. To be ideal it must be fed with heavenly fires. If God be not behind it it becomes bastard and barren. Religion alone can make the world sweet and just. With the knowledge of right, the world limps all too feebly in its right-doing. A leakage in faith always means a leakage in the life-blood of morality. No substitute can take the place of this benign force. Is the time far distant when, on the broad basis of scientific recognition, a place shall be found for this faculty in the training of the human mind? The case has difficulties, no doubt, but the life of this world will limp heavily until it is done. The time has come when a recognition of the fundamental religious verities should be general, and when life in accordance with them should be recognized by the world at large as essential to a worthy manhood. Be his belief little or much, no man is excusable for not living a religious life in accordance with the light he has; and this will be the surest way to a larger faith. The rationality and importance of this course is put beyond doubt by the sciences themselves. How long shall this continent of our being be neglected? Civilization must remain a marred and soiled product so long as it proceeds from a part of human nature. Naught but a rounded manhood can bring the golden age. A cry of pain will continue to go up till the floods of moral inspiration are sent to all. Shall a self-perpetrated insanity of doubt forever keep this world a madhouse of wrong-doing and self-inflicted pain?

Major Hopper—A Story

By Fremont Warriner

The particular old stone church with which this story has to do, stood flush with the crowded thoroughfare, within a stone's throw of a famous old street where some of the most tremendous financial operations in the world were carried on. This might be demonstrated easily, but for a popular prejudice against stone-throwing in populous districts—which does not matter so far as this story is concerned.

The church itself was the property of old Tim Sharp. That is to say, to be exact and keep strictly within the law, it really belonged to a church corporation, though not much used for purposes of worship, while Tim used it constantly for purposes of business. If use creates ownership, as some say, then we cannot be far wrong in ascribing property rights to Tim, who did odd jobs for the public, using the stone steps of the sacred edifice for his counting-room, and had so done for years. At all events, his long and undisturbed lease had established in his own mind a prescriptive right, which no one knowing Tim's temper would have thought of bringing into question. So we think it may be fairly written down that the old church was Tim's property.

The surging, rushing, tramping crowd, passing day by day before Tim's eyes for years, intent on the multitude of things that engage the teeming minds of men, had come in his own mind to be the normal expression of human activity. Tim admitted as much to me one sultry day as we sat together on the stone steps.

"Although," he said, wiping his brow with an immense red handkerchief, "the case of Major Hopper makes agin' any such theory. Still," he said, blowing his nose thoughtfully, "Major Hopper is a man in a crowd, though separate from the common run in purpose."

I asked him to tell me more about this Major Hopper.

"It all come along of Tom Spottlewood's boy," said Tim. "Tom worked in a shop down below here and lived over yonder," which locality Tim indicated by a jerk of his thumb in the general direction of the big tenements. "Tom stops here now and then of a cool mornin' and smokes for ten minutes or so. Likewise Major Hopper, who is elderly and fleshy and puffs like a tug. Indeed I think he has an office down on the docks somewhere and is interested in a marine way. Something like a year ago Tom stopped and his usual chat.

"It's mighty tough," he says 'for a feller to go to work when he's dead fagged.'

"There's no denyin' that Tom did look fagged. When I asked him the cause, he said:

"You know my little boy Robert, which his mother calls him Robin. The heat in our rooms is something terrible. Robin's not strong, and though I don't say nothin' at home, I fear he's growin' weaker. Last night he was very peevish and wakeful. Nobody seems able to do anything for him but me. I carried him in these arms," says Tom, "all the blessed night through, tryin' to give him sleep. He slept a little, but it's wearin', Tim, though I wouldn't mind if it'd do him any good."

"When Tom went away I thought a good bit of Robin Spottlewood. I thought of him more or less all day, and made up my mind I'd drop over and see him after office hours in the evenin'. Toward night along comes Major Hopper, who climbs the steps, puffin' as usual, and drops anchor alongside of me in jest about the same identical spot as you are now a-settin' on, sir.

"I do believe, Tim," he says, glancin' back into the dark recesses of the stone porch, "that you've got the comfortablest place to do business in the hull city."

"Yes," I says, "a mighty sight comfortable than some of the places where wimmin and babies is swelterin' in the heat."

"It is hard on 'em, no doubt, in some of them tenements," says the Major.

"Pertic'ler hard for Tom Spottlewood's baby," says I.

"Who is Tom Spottlewood?" says the Major.

"Tom Spottlewood," says I, "works in a factory below here, and he has a boy that is dyin' for want of air, which Tom on his present wages can't give him."

"The Major said nothin' at first, but takes a look at the strip of blue sky above the tall buildings, and then blowed his nose a pretty good stiff blow on his silk handkerchief; when he asks whether it would be considered in the light of a liberty if I was to take him over to see Tom Spottlewood's baby.

"Not seein' how it could be looked at in this light, I tells the Major no doubt he'd be perfectly welcome, and in another hour we was there. I introduced Major Hopper, who was made perfectly welcome. Robin was a sick baby, sure enough, which was plain to anyone that had eyes, and the two rooms they were livin' in was small and stuffy and hard to breath in, which made the Major puff harder than ever. Here I discovered in him a peculiarity that I've often noticed since. In business he was direct and to the point in all he had to say. In anything that wasn't business, he was quite the reverse. In the course of the evenin' he asked Tom quite casual whether he considered standing in stalls with plenty to eat and nothin' to do was good for ponies. It astonished Tom to be asked such a question, but he replied very polite that he had never been familiar with horses, but he supposed a proper amount of exercise would be better.

"Which," says the Major, "is my opinion, too. You see, comin' to what he had to say in as roundabout way as possible, 'I happen to own a farm up in the country a good number of miles from the city, and I happen to have a pony there. My man writes me that he has no time to exercise him, and that he kicks up his heels in the stable simply because he has surplus spirits and no other way to work 'em off.'"

"The boys, for Tom had other boys besides Robin, began to look interested at this, and even Robin opened his eyes, all of which that good man noted.

"And," continued he, wiping his forehead and puffing vigorously, "I've no time to go up and exercise that pony, which, by the way, his name is Grip, and he's too small and independent to be any good down here in the city. So if anybody was to find me a boy that would like to go up and give him a spin now and then to keep him from kickin' his stable into kindlin'-wood, it would be a great favor to me."

"Tom looked as though he was goin' to speak, but he never got no further than to open his mouth when the Major continued:

"Besides that, there's a cottage on my farm, a rather small affair, furnished, too, in a sort of a way, and there's cows and oceans of milk and butter, a lake, a boat, and good fishing, and the air there is good. I've worried a good deal tryin' to find someone to go up and occupy that cottage that had a boy big enough to drive and care for a pony. You see, here the Major looked hard at Tom's eldest boy, who was starin' at him with both eyes wide open, 'you see, I want a boy that likes ponies, and I want a boy that has a mother to be with him. If there was several boys it wouldn't matter. If I could find the parties that suited me I'd be willin' to pay reasonable for the service.'

"Could he find such a party? Well, with such art had the Major concealed what I saw he intended as an offer to save, perhaps, the life of Robin Spottlewood, that even Tom swallowed the bait whole. But as he was about to speak the Major interrupted him again.

"If Mr. Spottlewood here would not consider it in the light of a liberty," said he, suddenly turning to me, as though I had anything to do with the matter, "if he would be willin' to part with his family for a few months, which I know is askin' a great favor, I would be willin' to pay reasonable, and possible it might be the means of bringin' back the roses to the cheeks of little Robin here. The milk and butter and other things they'd be quite welcome to. Bless you, there's plenty of it, more'n we know what to do with, and as I said, the air is good. But I want it understood that the pony is to be driven reg'lar, every day, except in case of storms.'

"Here Tom, no longer to be restrained, jumped up, seized the Major's hand, shook it heartily, and declared his offer accepted. Likewise Mrs. Spottlewood did the same with, I suspect, a tear in her eye and a voice that trembled with emotion. Likewise also the children one and all took him by the skirts of his coat and begged to know how soon it would be possible for them to make the acquaintance of Grip.

" 'Why, as to that, you know,' said the Major, who appeared to gasp after his exertions, 'as to that, I'm afraid I would have to insist on the arrangement bein' completed at the earliest possible moment. If such a thing was possible as makin' a start to-morrow mornin'—

" 'To-morrow it is,' said Tom interrupting, 'your word is law in this matter. Name your hour and I'll agree that the family shall be ready.'

"And so the arrangement was made. It was carried out to the letter. I myself went up one Saturday night with Tom. I could wish, sir, that you could have seen Robin before and after. It's almost beyond belief what fresh air and milk done for that boy, and likewise for the others, and how happy they all was. It's my belief there wouldn't be no Robin Spottlewood in this present world if it hadn't been for that. But, sir, they wasn't none of 'em happier than the Major, who often come puffin' up my steps, chucklin' and laughin' deep down in his throat as he told me how fat and hearty Robin was gettin' and how strong they all would be when the summer was over.

"But the Major done more than that. He got Tom better employment and found him a small house over the river where there was better facilities for breathin' than in the stuffy tenement rooms. And then, still later, when Christmas time come, there was a party in the cottage to which I was invited. The Major himself sat at the head of the table and carved the biggest and juciest turkey to be found in the best market in the city. More than that, when all were gathered about the table, the Major bowed his head and gave thanks to the great Giver of all good. This, to me, was a new character for him to appear in, but after acquaintance developed that he was full to the brim of just such deeds as what he'd done for Robin Spottlewood. Which," said Tim, looking thoughtfully at the sky, "in my humble judgment, comes almost as near bein' right as buildin' churches like this one of mine."

Paying Church Debts

By A. McLean

These years are like the seven years of plenty in Egypt. The country was never before so prosperous. It may not be so prosperous again in the lifetime of the present generation. In these good times the churches that are in debt should put forth special efforts to pay what they owe. In most instances this can be done with perfect ease. If the whole amount cannot be paid off at once, an installment can be paid now, and after a breathing spell, another can be paid. Churches, like individuals, should make hay while the sun shines. The Lord's money should not be wasted in riotous living or in the purchasing of luxuries, but in doing his own work.

It should be remembered that church debts are a serious hindrance to the work the Lord has assigned his people. When worthy calls are made, the plea is urged that the debt on the church must be paid. People say they must be just before they can be generous. So it comes to pass that most calls are positively refused, or are answered with meagre amounts. There is no disposition to branch out and take up new work as long as old work is not paid for. Debt is a lion in the path. It is a millstone around the neck. It is an obstacle to the progress of the kingdom.

Debts prevent the widest triumph of the gospel. Men do not care to unite with an organization that is heavily encumbered. They do not wish to have to bear a burden they did not create. They do not attend church, and therefore do not hear and believe, and consequently do not obey the gospel. Debts hinder in every way.

Some years ago one of our ablest and most eloquent men went to a certain city to serve a church. The congregation was large and far from being poor. The building was an admirable one. But there was a debt on it. Every effort he put forth to secure funds for missionary and other purposes was met with the reply, "We are in debt." No one seemed willing to give anything for any outside purpose as long as the debt was unpaid. The man of God felt that his hands were tied and that he was working in vain. He called the officers together and told them that he was doing no good, and that he could do no good, and that he had made up his mind to resign. They were in consternation, and asked the reason for this resolution. He said that whenever he proposed a step in advance he was met with the statement that the church was in debt, and that because of the debt the energies of the church were paralyzed and nothing could be done in that community. They said if that were all, there was no reason for his resignation and removal. They proceeded at once to make provision for the payment of the debt. In a few weeks the last mortgage and note were burned, and the church started at once on a new career of life and usefulness. New churches were planted in that and in other cities, and the church soon took a foremost place among those contributing to all our great general enterprises.

It is sometimes said that a church should never go into debt. There are those who think a debt is never justifiable. This is probably an extreme view. A small body of Christian people with large faith, build not for themselves, but for the future. They see by faith the time when there will be hundreds of names on the register where now there are only tens. They feel that they must build on a scale larger than would be necessary if they were thinking of themselves and their present needs only. Those who come in later on can help bear this burden. They will not hesitate to do this if those who have led in the work show that they are determined that the debt shall be paid at the earliest moment practicable. Every year should see it reduced till it disappears entirely. Then new work should be begun.

The report on our centennial celebration, adopted at the Omaha convention, suggested that, by the year 1909, all debts on churches now in existence should be paid off. This suggestion is one that should be heeded. It will be a great thing for the churches themselves and for the Lord's work everywhere if this is done. Every mortgage burned and every note paid should be reported to G. A. Hoffman, our national statistician. Every report of this character will provoke other churches to go and do likewise.

The Bell-Buoy.

By Walter Scott Hayden.

Upon the bosom of the sea

Fitfully and slow,

The bell-buoy is tolling mournfully,

Tossing to and fro.

It speaks the sea's vast mystery,

Voice of the misty deep,

The beat and throb and the endless sigh

Of the boundless ocean's sweep.

Of far dim shores and savage rock,

The crested breakers' edge,

The hurricane's shriek and tempest's shock,

The ship on the sunken ledge.

The spirit of the ocean wild

Is in its tones for me.

Scream of the sea-bird, tempest's child,

Voice of the hoary sea!

The Devotional Side of Church Life

By W. S. Goode

Church life, like individual Christina life, presents two clearly marked phases: the devotional and the practical. This does not mean that the practical may not be devotional. Emerson says, "A man kneeling and weeding onions is praying for a good crop." Nor that the devotional is not practical, for "More things are wrought by prayer than the world dreams of." Both are necessary—"Useless each without the other." One represents inspiration, the other achievement. Without the practical, the devotional would be at last empty. Without the devotional, the practical would at last be blind.

By the devotional, we mean the worshipful; the reverent seeking of the soul after God; quiet meditation before him; holy contemplation and adoration; loving spiritual communion; the daily practice of the presence of God. Nothing is more manifestly clear than that God's people are to be filled with the spirit of devotion. Jesus, the only Begotten, complete expression of the Father, perfect example for every child of God, spent days and nights in worship. He gave the law of worship. "God is a spirit, and they that worship him, must worship him in spirit and truth." He expressed God's great desire, "The Father seeketh such to worship him."

In this time of rapid material development, it well may be doubted whether the devotional keeps pace with the practical. "Hustle" is the watchword in church and state. Workers in the vineyard sometimes wear a worried expression. A hectic flush marks the cheek, and lines of care furrow the brow. Yet the Lord would have a church "without spot or wrinkle or any such thing."

We are in danger of the fever of zeal for tabulated results, due to the million microbe which is no respecter of persons, but attacks saint and sinner alike. Let us beware lest we find too much satisfaction in statistics—the "how many" of our churches, preachers, missionaries and accessions, rather than the "what kind;" the "how much" of our offerings, rather than the "how willingly." Given true worship, and all things else are possible, nay, inevitable.

Test our people for the presence of this element. How attractive to them is the thought of worship? Issue a call to prayer—how many will gather? Think of your last thanksgiving service; consider the prayer meeting of the average church. 'Tis at best but a gathering of the prophetic remnant. Then, too, it is not purely a prayer meeting. There are spicy talks. Suppose it were simply for quiet contemplation and prayer. Would the remnant dwindle like Gideon's army? Watch an audience during communion. To how many is it a spiritual exercise, a real communion with the divine One?

What can we do? "How would you warm up a cold church?" said some one to Moody. Like a rifle shot came the true answer, "Build a big fire in the pulpit." Ask Brother McLean how to make a missionary church. He will answer, "Get a missionary preacher." When we have true worshipers in the pulpit, we have them in the pews. Like Moses, the minister must often go up into the mount with God. He shall come back with shining face and his message will be tinged with the glory and sweetness of his communion. Brethren, we can always lift up more than we can push up. If we are men of God, our presence will suggest God to men. If we have been with him, we cannot hide it.

Phillips Brooks said the greatest compliment ever paid him was that of a working man, a worshiper in his church. Meeting Brooks on the street, he grasped his hand and said with feeling, "Mr. Brooks, I cannot think of you without at once thinking reverently of God." What minister would not give much to have that testimony? There is a sure way. Brooks was a worshiper. Like begets like. If all ministers were true worshipers, those born into the kingdom by their ministrations would likewise be worshipers in spirit and truth. Says Emerson, "I cannot hear what you say; what you are, speaks so loud." We teach what we are. The first step, then, is to kindle the flame of devotion in the pulpit.

We should constantly ask, How can the church service be made more worshipful? How can it best help man to feel God's presence? What will contribute better to an atmosphere of devotion!

A call to worship at the beginning is good. The Psalms are full of them: "Oh, come let us worship and bow down. Let us kneel before the Lord our Maker, for he is our God and we are the people of his pasture and the sheep of his hand. To-day! Oh, that ye would hear his voice!" Follow this by a chant of praise known to all and sung by all. As much responsive work as possible should be used. This draws people into the worship, giving them a feeling of participation. It is not likely to be overdone at present in our churches. Encourage the whole congregation to respond with the amen at the close of the prayer. It makes it more truly their prayer, giving them a feeling of ownership and responsibility.

The one who leads in prayer should get ready to pray. He should know intimately the lives of the people for whom he prays. He should have a deep sympathy for their needs. All the week before, he should have been gathering knowledge and power for the prayer, as the cloud gathers electricity for the lightning's flash. (Beecher says that more can be done by such a prayer than by a sermon.) Then with his heart full of the needs of his people, and a great trust in the hearing One, let him bear his people up to the very throne of grace. Such prayers lead men to God. Such prayers were Christ's, and men came yearning with this petition: "Teach us to pray." Ministerial courtesy should never delegate the prayer to one unprepared.

Scripture reading should contribute more largely to worship. It is God's voice to us. Yet 'tis often read as trippingly as a Mother Goose rhyme, or else as heavily and mechanically as a legal document. It is often evident that the reader does not expect people to attend, and I have rarely seen him disappointed.

The music, too, is a great hindrance or a great help. Wisdom here is all-important. No man ever yet worshiped God to two-step or "rag-time" music. Some of our hymns are little better. But the great hymns, how they thrill the soul! How sometimes they touch hitherto unsuspected depths within us; now soothing and now stirring and quickening, until we catch the spirit of the great hearts who felt them first, and thus we share with them their thoughts, their hopes, their longing. Sing the great hymns; there are plenty of them, and life means too much to dally with the insignificant. An understanding of the hymns is second only to an understanding of the Bible.

What an opportunity the Lord's Supper offers us for communion with God in Christ! Its suggestiveness; its solemn quiet; the thought of the living Master present in Spirit; the prayers of thanksgiving that have just been offered; the tender hymn of sympathy that has just been softly sung.

And now as the emblems pass, is offered a blessed opportunity for worship in spirit and in truth. I believe that the very simplicity of our service, with the recognition given the Lord's Supper, gives us opportunity above others for impressiveness in worship.

There is one serious defect in church worship of to-day that must be corrected. It is that church worship is carried on without the children. The church children, where are they? They seem to be in the church, but not of it. They get but little worship in the Sunday-school. Most of them get none at home. What then? The future church is growing up, neglecting worship, untrained in worship, ignorant of worship. What percentage of Sunday-school children are church goers? Perhaps fifteen per cent. How many boys and girls there are, members of church, gathered in from Sunday-school, who yet rarely partake of the Lord's Supper? Is the communion of spiritual value, then they must have it. It is Christ's will that the children be in the worship of his church. It is our work to see that they are there. Do the parents object? Then convert them. Is the service too long? Then shorten it. Is it not interesting to the child? Then make it interesting. Is the child indifferent? Set motives before him until he comes, and then recognize and welcome him. The church that lives and plans for its children will have them live and plan for it. The church that neglects its children, will in time be neglected by them. We dare not be indifferent to the child's indifference.

Recognizing this, efforts are being made to hold the child in church, and some are meeting with great success. In some churches to-day, the children have a service of their own, adapted to their needs, containing all the elements of regular church worship. In others, Sunday-school and church have been combined. The intermission, that loop-hole between Sunday-school and church, has been done away. Sunday-school and church service have been shortened. Parents are then in Bible-school and the children in church service. My own church has tried this plan with fair success the past year. Other churches have devoted the first part of the church service to the children, then dismissing them and proceeding with the service for the older ones. This has been found successful also.

Yet church and school will largely fail without the home as their ally. What home has, the nation will have. What home lacks, the nation will lack. Why so many Christian homes to-day that lack the element of worship? Parents say they have not time, or they do not know how. It must be shown that there is always time for best things, and family worship is a best thing. Moreover, like most best things, it is a simple thing. Who can measure the potent influence of daily home worship in the child's life? It can be made second to nothing, not even to mother's love. Yet a Christian father once told me that he had never had worship in his home, but that as soon as his children were grown and gone, he and the wife would take it up. Of his large family of children, not one was a Christian. It was a case of locking the door when the horse was stolen; of bringing food when the young birds had flown.

Brethren, are we who are called to lead God's people, quietly giving our consent to the prayerless home? What are we doing to change matters? Do we preach on it? Do we pray about it? Do we set before our people the importance and simplicity of home worship, and then plead in public and in private for its establishment? In one church a list of all families having the home altar was made. It was hung up in the church, and minister and officers exerted themselves to have it extended. They succeeded, too. Why might not minister and church officers, as shepherds of the flock, visit the various family altars from time to time? Why might not devotional books be circulated industriously in church families? They would make greatly for devotional family life. Such books as Garrison's "Alone with God," "Half-Hour Studies at the Cross," "The Heavenly Way," enrich the soul. We should use them and see that others use them as well.

Then, too, as a mother in Israel said recently, "We need in our church papers less of controversy and more of Christ." They are his papers and not ours, and they should breathe only his spirit. Thank God, they grow better day by day, but now and then we see a disheartening reversion to the original type—that of the days when the office devil was much in evidence. Indeed, it looks as if some writers agree with the old colored brother, that "without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness," but with controversy, and plenty of it, all things will become plain and godliness will stand forth fully revealed.

What of Christian endeavor and devotion? Is it helping? Greatly. Its membership pledged to daily worship and searching of the word, make it a haven. Its use of the quiet hour means much now and for the future. Yet, by wise oversight and suggestion in devotion, by heart to heart talks with the endeavorers in the meetings, the pastor can assist, enriching the worship and deepening the spiritual life.

And now, finally, what of the mid-week prayer-meeting? Is it an index of the spiritual life of the church? Not always, but often. In general, the warmer the church, the bigger and better the prayer meeting. I believe that the prayer meeting should be kept a prayer meeting. Stereopticons, socials, lectures should be kept out. It should be the people's meeting, and the pastor should, in general, be kept in the background. He should be the planner, but the execution should be largely left to others. Throughout, the aim should be, devotional rather than didactic. Instruction there must be, but let its end be worship. Let us not fret over the "how many" of the prayer meeting, but let us rejoice in the "what kind." At present, many look upon the prayer hour as the best part of their church experience, and as the church grows in Christlikeness, this number will grow. It is God's presence that men need. All must learn to say, "In the secret of his presence how my soul delights to hide."

The psalmist voices the deepest yearning of the soul: "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so doth my soul after thee, O God." God speaks the divine method, "Be still and know that I am God."

In worship we find rest and calm and peace. In worship, we place our lips to the water of life, that allows no more thirsting forever, and here we find inspiration for the achievements that will yet catch the eye of all men and will lead the great wide world to cry with us:

"Holy! Holy! Holy! is the Lord of hosts!"

SLOW STARVATION

The Dyspeptic's Diet Leaves no Chance for Regaining Strength.

The dyspeptic who starves body and brain because food will not digest, has no chance to get strong again because bodily strength cannot be built up except on food that will digest.

That is the mission of Grape-Nuts which any dyspeptic can digest and which will begin to build up and nourish at once.

A Wisconsin man says: "For the last 7 years I have been a great sufferer with stomach trouble, and for 18 months I could not eat or drink anything, not even a spoonful of milk, without great suffering.

"It seemed I had tried every remedy in the world, and I had given up all hopes of ever getting better when a friend advised me to eat Grape-Nuts food. I was just about too much discouraged to do so, for I expected to die, and all my friends expected I would, too, but I finally did send for a sample box, and when it came I was so weak I could not turn over in bed.

"Then I began to take the Grape-Nuts, just a little bit at first, moistened with hot milk, and from this time I began to grow stronger and before I had finished the fourth package I could eat and drink anything I wanted, and it did not hurt me in the least. So the right food helped me to health after everything else had failed.

"Experience, actual use, proves absolutely the great power of the scientific food, Grape-Nuts." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Jesus and His Apostles in the Inquiry Room

X.—Human and Divine Methods

By W. T. Moore

The sermon to-night was on the text: "Ask and you shall receive, seek and you shall find, knock and it shall be opened unto you." The evangelist made the following points: (1) Salvation is within the reach of everyone; (2) The only thing that hinders is the unwillingness of the sinner to receive salvation; (3) Salvation may be received for simply asking for it.

These points were urged with great earnestness. It was contended that this is what Jesus meant in the text. If we ask we are sure to receive, if we seek we are sure to find; if we knock the door will surely be opened unto us.

At the conclusion of the sermon the preacher announced that he proposed to change the order of things on this evening. For a time, at least, he would conduct an "after-meeting" in the audience room. He said he would give an opportunity for those to leave who did not wish to remain longer, but all were cordially invited to stay until the close of the meeting. After a short interval, the evangelist began an earnest appeal for what he called "decisions." He said the time had now come when everyone who had been attending the meetings should take some definite position with respect to the salvation of his soul. At the close of his exhortation, he asked all who are willing to trust in Jesus and give themselves unreservedly to his leadership, to hold up their hands. More than fifty hands were raised. He then asked all of these to join earnestly with him in prayer, while he asked that their sins might be pardoned, and that they might be accepted by the Father as his children. Then followed an earnest prayer by the evangelist, which was supplemented by three or four short prayers by some of the workers.

At this stage of the proceedings, one of the men who had held up their hands arose and asked that he might be informed just what his position was now in respect to the matter of his salvation. He said he believed in Jesus Christ with all his heart, and was anxious to be loyal to him in every respect. "But," said he, "I am not sure just where I stand. I have never been a very great sinner, according to the usual understanding of that term. I have been attending the different churches ever since I was a little boy, and have never known the time when I did not believe in Jesus. I learned to lisp his name from a sainted mother, and then to sing his praise in the Sunday-school. I am now thirty years old, and have been all my life associated with religious people. But for some reason or other I have never come out definitely on the Lord's side. I have been attending these meetings from their beginning, but to-night is the first time I have been able to even lift my hand on the Lord's side. Now I am not satisfied with that. Having made one step in the right direction, I want to go on to the end of the chapter. I am here to be instructed. What is the next thing for me to do?"

Evangelist: "I am glad our friend has spoken so plainly and courageously. There is nothing at all peculiar in his case. He is simply laboring under a false impression. He has what is a very common notion. He thinks that he must do something in order to secure salvation, when, as a matter of fact, everything has been already done for him. Jesus paid it all. When he died upon the cross, then and there every sinner's sin was cancelled. What the sinner now has to do is to believe that it is cancelled. Our friend tells us that he believes in Jesus; then why not trust him for all the rest? Why not cease to have trouble about doing anything else. We are not saved by doing. We are saved by Christ, and when we believe in him he saves us at once without our doing anything else."

Inquirer: "Why, then, did you pray that all these convicted souls might receive the forgiveness of their sins and acceptance with the Father. At least fifty persons held up their hands to indicate their faith in Jesus and their willingness to follow him. You prayed that all these might be pardoned and adopted into the family of God. Now I do not quite understand how these have their salvation secured the moment Jesus died upon the cross, and yet they have to believe on him before they can receive remission of sins; and then I am furthermore puzzled, when you say that we are all pardoned as soon as we believe, and yet you pray for our pardon and our acceptance with God. Nor is this all. Jesus has died on the cross for me. I do heartily believe in him. You have prayed for the forgiveness of my sins; and yet when all these things are taken together, I do not realize that my sins are forgiven, or that I have actually finished everything that ought to be done in order that I may have a definite assurance of pardon."

Methodist: "Let us all pray (congregation kneeling)."

"Dear Father, have mercy upon this young man who has just spoken. He evidently has no clear vision of the cross. He is looking too much to himself. We want him to see Jesus. Be pleased to give him a clear vision of duty. Help him to make a complete surrender, such as saving faith will enable him to do."

The prayer was answered with a chorus of "amens" from every part of the house. For a few moments there was silence, and then there was an earnest response.

Inquirer: "I thank my Methodist friend for his earnest prayer. I feel confident he has a deep interest in the welfare of my soul. However, I fear he does not understand me. I surely do have a very clear vision of the cross. I see Jesus plainly crucified for me. I even hear him say, 'Come unto me and I will give you rest; take my yoke upon you and learn of me, and ye shall find rest for your soul.' But how am I to come to Jesus? What is it to take his yoke upon me? This is precisely my difficulty. I realize that my mental states are all right, as far as they go. What I want to know is, must I do anything else in order to reach assurance of salvation? I am not satisfied as the matter now stands."

Presbyterian: "Of course there is something else to be done, but it has nothing to do with the pardon of sin. Our brother should now unite with

EXPERIMENTS

Learn Things of Value.

Where one has never made the experiment of leaving off coffee and drinking Postum, it is still easy to learn all about it by reading the experiences of others.

Drinking Postum is a pleasant way to get back to health. A man of Lancaster, Pa., says: "My wife was a victim of nervousness and weak stomach and loss of appetite for years, and was a physical wreck; although we resorted to numerous methods of relief, one of which was a change from coffee to tea, it was all to no purpose.

"We knew coffee was causing the trouble, but could not find anything to take its place and cure the diseases until we tried Postum Food Coffee. In two weeks' time after we quit coffee and used Postum, almost all of her troubles had disappeared as if by magic. It was truly wonderful. Her nervousness was all gone, stomach trouble relieved, appetite improved, and above all, a night's rest was complete and refreshing.

"This sounds like an exaggeration, as it all happened so quickly, but we are prepared to prove it. Each day there is improvement for the better, for the Postum is undoubtedly strengthening her and giving her rich, red blood and renewed life and vitality. Every particle of this good work is due to Postum and to drinking Postum in place of coffee." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Ice cold Postum with a dash of lemon is a delightful "cooler" for warm days.

News From Many Fields

California.

The tide is flowing toward Santa Cruz. Each golden sunset may make its ebb on the restless, but the rising moon brings the inflow from all over this great, of all the wonderful states. The clans are gathering; tents are being folded, trunks packed, new gowns made, hats trimmed, suits pressed, and sun-bonnets starched, all for the state meeting. New cottages are going up at Garfield Christian Park; thus cords are being lengthened, stakes strengthened, and enlargement is the watchword.

The program has appeared and promises a feast of good things, and the good people are preparing to have their reason brightened and their souls filled, but they will not forget their fishing tackle nor their bathing suits.

We are all pleased to know that the Junior editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will be with us. He must not make as fast a wheeling trip through California as he did through Europe. Besides, if he tries much of an extended tour on a 'bike' he may say "it's a rocky road to Dublin"—but we will put his wheel on the finest country roads he ever saw. The fact is we have so much oil that we are pouring it out on the country roads and making typical highways for the wheel and wagon. We can furnish, however, steam driven wheels in most every direction, even into the Pacific as well as into the mountains, but we are afraid "ye editor" would go so fast that he could not say as many nice things about us as he did about his "wheeling through Europe." But come anyway and be happy. [The Junior editor has, to his deep regret, found it impossible to make his contemplated trip to California and has cancelled his engagements at Santa Cruz and elsewhere.—EDITOR.]

Brother Allen Wilson will give his best in evangelistic work which will be a privilege that will be greatly enjoyed, while it is enough to say that Brother E. T. Nesbit is to be the music man. With such a force in word and song we hope and pray for good results.

All the departments of our state work have been very prosperous this year, more so than for many previous years. Brother Dargitz, our busy state secretary, has kept the ball rolling. Brothers Gallahorn and Carroll, and Cal Ogburn have done grand work in the evangelistic field. They are busy now and will hardly have time to go to Santa Cruz.

The church work in every direction is pushing to the front, yet all the Macedonian calls cannot be met.

Again, where is our friend and Brother Aaron Prince Aten, the laureate poet?

J. DURHAM.

Iowa.

G. W. Burch, of West Liberty, has accepted the pastorate of the church at Pittsburg, Kan., and will begin work in his new field August 15. We regret to have Brother Burch leave Iowa.

Clinton Aber has closed his work at Akron. It is hoped that the brethren at Akron will lose no time in securing a pastor.

Ute is still looking for a pastor. By co-operating with Soldier a man can do a good work and secure a support for a family.

Jas. T. Nichols and wife are taking in the Endeavor convention at Denver this week.

Bro. C. G. Stout, our new state evangelist, is in a tent meeting at Coon Rapids. Brother Stout held a ten days' meeting at Meloy that resulted in adding 14 new members to the church. Had it been possible to secure a place of meeting there would certainly have been 50 additions. We hope to increase our evangelistic force so as to have as many evangelists as we have districts.

At a meeting of the district boards and state board the month of September was selected as the time to hold the district conventions.

The I. C. C. minutes will be ready to mail week after next. A copy will be mailed to each preacher and each church clerk whose name can be secured. It has not been possible for us to secure statistics from all of the churches, and as a result cannot send to those churches that did not respond, unless I have been able to secure the name from some other source. We would like a corresponding secretary in each congregation, to whom we can look for information in case there is no pastor. We want the name of such a person so that we can send to each church literature or facts that will be helpful in the church work. Each congregation should select a corresponding secretary and send in the name at once. The minutes cost too much money for them to be sent out promiscuously. Take the matter up at once and help us secure a complete list of church correspondents.

The time has come when we should begin planning to attend the national convention that meets at Detroit, Oct. 16-22. Detroit is a beautiful convention city, and we should send from Iowa a large delegation.

Sias and McVey are in a promising meeting at Harlan.

W. B. Crewdson is at Atlantic preparatory to his removal there as pastor.

J. H. Carr and assistants are in a meeting at Anthon.

Noah Garwick, of Griswold, has resigned. Brother Garwick is a splendid preacher and pastor.

Dedication at Tulsa, Indian Territory.

The writer made his second trip into the Indian Territory last month. The reports of that country are certainly not over-stated.

It is a great agricultural country. My object in this visit was the dedication of the new Christian church at Tulsa. This is a thriving town of about 4,000 inhabitants, located on the north bank of the Arkansas river, and on the Frisco railroad. The M. K. & T. railroad is just building into the town; this, with a branch railroad, gives them three roads, with a prospect for a fourth.

The town is a veritable hive of energy. Many new buildings are being erected, with two large brick plants just ready to begin operation. Their two oil wells add much of interest to the place. We have a fine nucleus here for a good church. We have perhaps more than one hundred members in the town. A few of these have not forgotten the Lord in their search for wealth. Several months since, an effort was made to erect a building, which was greeted with a success superior to all expectations. The church is a brick veneer, and will seat 250 people. A good basement has also been arranged. Cost of the building was about $2,500; $500 loan had been arranged for with the Extension Board, and between three and four hundred dollars above this loan was needed.

July 14 was the day set for dedication. It was an ideal day. The churches of the town dismissed their services and the house was soon filled, leaving many to go home. Eight hundred dollars was called for and the audience repented very readily, until $850 was secured, together with some other pledges which came later, making nearly $900. The ladies had banked the rostrum with flowers, which was most beautiful. The Mahr Brothers, who are doing a banking business, have been among the foremost in the construction of this building, and among the most liberal donors. One of the Mahr Brothers will be remembered as one of Missouri's young ministers, being a pastor for some 12 years. Brother Roberts, who has been the "bishop" among us in that region, and has done most excellent work among the churches, was present and assisted in the services. However, it seems to have been generally accorded to Bro. W. L. Darland, who was chosen as their elder, the moving spirit in the construction of the building. Brother Darland was one of the elders of the Oskaloosa, Ia., church during the five years the writer was pastor there. We much regretted that, on account of Sister Darland's failing health, he was obliged to return north just before the dedication. Brother Darland was one of our pioneer preachers, but his age seems not to have impaired his usefulness, as at Tulsa he doubtless has accomplished the best work of his life. We regretted very much in not meeting our old friend, Bro. H. D. Robertson, who is located not far from Tulsa. As a people we have many members moving into this part of the country. Now is the time for us to do our best work there.

Fourth District Illinois C. W. B. M. Convention.

The annual C. W. B. M. convention of the fourth missionary district of Illinois was held in Lexington, Ill., on the afternoon and evening of June 23. Many who have attended previous conventions pronounced this one the best ever held in our district.

The afternoon session began promptly at 2 o'clock. The devotional exercises were led by Mrs. George Dement, of Lexington. Mrs. Dement also gave the address of welcome giving the delegates a very cordial welcome to their little city.

Following the devotional exercises was an excellent paper on "C. W. B. M. as an Organization," written by Mrs. J. C. Davidson, of Eureka. Mrs. Davidson, being unable to be present the paper was read by Miss Anna E. Davidson.

Next came a discussion of the question: "Resolved that the work of the C. W. B. M. in the foreign field is of greater importance than the work in the home field." The question was affirmed by Mrs. Ethel H. Johnson, of Stanford, assisted by Mrs. Gertrude Gamble, of Gibson City, who told of the work in India. Mrs. J. N. Thomas, of Carlock, told of the work in Jamaica. The orphanage work was presented by Mrs. George Waddington, of Bloomington and the work in Mexico by Mrs. A. Martini, of Washburn.

The negative was led by Miss Mary E. Monahan, of Saunemin. She was assisted by a member of the El Paso auxiliary, Mrs. M. L. Miller, who told of Negro Education and Evangelization. Miss Barbara Young, of Pontiac, told of our work among the Chinese and Mountain Whites. Mrs. Helen Wright, of Normal, presented the work of our U. S. Bible chairs and Miss Mildred Campbell, of Bloomington, the work of state boards.

The discussion was then closed by a ten minute paper by Miss Anna E. Davidson, of Eureka. In this paper we were shown that the work in each field was equally important.

Mrs. Ada Granfield, of Cooksville, gave the next paper, telling "How We Started Our Auxiliary, and Results." This paper, showing how from a very small beginning great results may be accomplished, was followed by a report of our young people's department by Miss Lola V. Hale, of Athens.

Our district secretary, Miss Bertha Wagoner next gave her report which was very encouraging. Comparing this year's work with that of last year we find we have made a gain in membership, a gain in the number of "Tidings" read and a better attendance at the meeting. Our district was apportioned $1,000

The evening session was opened by devotional services led by Miss Bertha Wagoner, of Normal.

Miss Theta Radford, of Eureka, gave a fifteen minute talk on "Our Special Work" in which she set forth the vast opportunities before us in the Calcutta work and the importance of our grasping these opportunities.

After Miss Radford's address came the closing address of the convention by Mrs. Mary Pickens Buckner, of Macomb. In this address the speaker very ably told of the prime object of our organization as set forth in our constitution.

At the close of the evening session the ladies of the Lexington church gave an informal reception in their church parlors. This gave the delegates an opportunity of becoming acquainted with each other and all went to their homes feeling "It is good to be here."

ETHEL H. JOHNSON.

Stanford, Ill., July 6, 1903.

We desire to call attention to the report of the home board for June, published below. There are some matters for earnest thanksgiving and congratulation. First, during June there was a gain in the offering from the churches of $5,000. This compensates for the loss in the month of May.

Another thing to be noticed is the loss in the offering from the Endeavor Societies and from individuals. This ought not so to be. The loss in special funds is accounted for in the fact that the home board made a special appeal last year for Jacksonville, Fla., which was not made this year.

If this rate of gain can be continued for two months more, we are sure that the home board will go over the $100,000 line this year—a consummation devoutly to be wished.

In the comparative statement for receipts for the entire missionary year, since Oct. 1, it is to be noticed that there is a net gain of $8,738.63, as compared with last year up to July 1. We earnestly hope that this rate of gain will be continued until the home board shall be able to sweep over the $100,000 line before the great convention to be held in Detroit in October next. We ought, by all means, to do this to correct our previous neglect for this work of home missions.

Kentucky.

The meeting at Glasgow, in which the regular minister, W. M. Baker, was assisted by Mark Collins, of Lexington, closed with 21 additions.

Edgar D. Jones, who has done such efficient work at Erlanger, Boone Co., for several years, has resigned and accepted a call to the Franklin Circle Church in Cleveland, where he expects to begin work Sept. 1. We are sorry to lose him from "Old Kaintuck."

S. Boyd White has resigned at Athens, Fayette Co., after a faithful service of several years. His successor has not yet been chosen.

E. L. Powell, of Louisville, is furnishing a series of interesting articles to the Louisville Times on his travels in Europe. He will be gone several months.

Jos. D. Armistead, who has been preaching at Kirksville, Madison Co., for some time, is now at work in his new field, Woodland St., Nashville, where he recently accepted a call.

H. B. Smith, of Sulphur, will assist J. Randall Farris in a meeting at Oxford, Scott Co., next month.

Yutaka Minakuchi, the young Japanese student who has been attending the College of the Bible for several years, was married on July 9 to Miss Olivia Buckner, of Paris. The secular papers have announced that he will take his Ph. D. at Harvard before returning to Japan.

John A. Shishmanian, a son of a faithful missionary to Constantinople, George N. Shishmanian, was awarded second prize at the Kentucky Chautauqua Inter-Collegiate Oratorical Contest held in Lexington on July 9. He represented Kentucky University. Four other colleges were represented. The first prize was won by the representative of Kentucky State College, Clark Tandy.

We are much pleased with the new form of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

Prof. B. J. Pinkerton, at one time connected with the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, has been added to the faculty of Campbell-Hagerman College for young women, Lexington.

W. G. Eldred, of Rochester, has begun work with the church at Fulton, where he succeeds E. M. Waits.

Wm. Phillips, of Lexington, with Horace Kingsbury as singer, recently closed an eleven days' meeting at Beattyville, which resulted in 33 additions.

Our tenth district convention will be held this year at Richmond on Sept. 9, 10.

President J. W. McGarvey will be one of the speakers at the county meeting to be held at Station Camp, Estier Co., on Aug. 22.

E. J. Willis has resigned as general evangelist under the South Kentucky convention, and J. W. Gant, of Elkton, has been selected to fill the position until the close of the present year. H. A. Macdonald, of Cadiz, was also chosen to devote half time to evangelistic work in the Purchase district.

Clarence H. Poage, of Princeton, will begin a meeting with the church at Bethany, Bracken Co., on July 18.

E. W. Elliott, of Eminence, recently assisted W. F. Rogers in a meeting at Vine Grove, which resulted in 15 additions.

G. P. Taubman, of Portsmouth, O., will assist E. K. Clarkson in a meeting at East Union, Nicholas Co., beginning July 26.

The Summer Bible School, recently held at Hopkinsville, was a success and will be continued each year.

The Broadway Church, Lexington, is undergoing repairs. Services are now being held in Morrison Chapel.

T. S. Tinsley, of Louisville, has just dedicated the new church at Union, Bath Co.

The meeting at Uniontown, in which T. T. Roberts, of Morganfield, assisted the minister, J. W. Ligon, closed with 13 additions.

We are glad to report 8 additions at Midway at regular services during the month of June.

C. W. B. M. in Missouri.

The secretary enjoyed a delightful and it is hoped a profitable season with the auxiliary at Maryville, being with the sisters in their regular meeting at the handsome home of Sister Storm. In spite of a steady downpour until 2:30 P. M., twenty-two braved the elements and muddy roads to be there, and were refreshed by the good things prepared by the leader for July, Sister J. W. Ray, in papers, talks and music, as well as by that offered by the genial hostess, for the inner woman.

A brief visit was made to Pickering, on prayer-meeting night, when two members and two Tidings were added to the auxiliary.

Only six weeks are left to round up the year's work, and they promise to be exceedingly trying ones, but, sisters, we must not falter because of the heat. Let us remember our dear workers in India, Jamaica, Porto Rico and Mexico. They are all in warmer latitudes than ours. Let not one auxiliary abandon its meetings. Do not let the tempter reach you, with the heat for an excuse, nor with any other thing.

Now is the time for those to whom much has been trusted to make large gifts to the Calcutta Mission. Is there not one disciple in Missouri close enough to God to hear our prayers for one or more large offerings to this most worthy plant? Are there not many who will send $25, $10 or $5 for it now?

SAUL REJECTED AS KING.—
1 Sam. 15:13-23.

Read 1 Sam. Chapters 13-15.

Memory Verses: 20-22.

Golden Text.—To obey is better than sacrifice. 1 Sam. 15:22.

The Old Conflict Revived.

There had been peace for some years between Israel and their inveterate enemies on the south, the Philistines. After Saul had been king two years he made an attack on the Philistine garrison at Geba. The attack was apparently quite unprovoked. It was a sort of border raid, involving only three thousand men. Under the immediate command of Jonathan, the raid was successful, but it was a costly victory, for it was no very serious blow to the Philistine power as a whole, and it only enraged a dangerous enemy. In retaliation the Philistines sent an army of overwhelming numbers, before which the Israelites fled in terror, some into the barren places of their own land and some across Jordan.

Saul's Presumption.

Saul was no coward. He had his faults, but that was not one of them. He did not run away when his people were in danger. Saul was at Gilgal and there he stayed, and many of the people came to him there, trembling with fear of the Philistines yet feeling somehow that there would be safety in Saul's presence. It was an unconscious tribute to his real kingly qualities.

Neither did Saul lack faith in Jehovah. He recognized that safety lay only in an appeal to divine aid. And so he waited at Gilgal for Samuel to come and offer a sacrifice. But Samuel did not come. Seven days Saul waited, while the terror of the people increased and the danger became every moment more imminent. Still Samuel did not appear. Saul had no right to offer the sacrifice; that was the function of the priest or the prophet. But the peril was pressing and Saul dared not go out against the Philistines without seeking Jehovah's favor. So he called for the sacrifices and offered them himself, thus disobeying God's command at the very moment when he was seeking His aid.

A Mis-use of Prayer.

Saul's sacrifice and prayer were of a sort not uncommon in our day. They were an attempt to persuade God, or almost to compel Him, to do Saul's will, instead of an expression of willingness on Saul's part to do his will. Saul had stirred up the Philistines quite unnecessarily and without making any adequate preparations to meet the counter-attack which he ought to have known would follow. He had rushed blindly and rashly into an enterprise which he could not carry out, and when the inevitable danger threatened, he rushed to the altar as if he would by sacrifice compel God to save him from the consequences of his own folly. Such prayers are common. But it is an abuse of prayer to consider it as giving license to recklessness and as absolving one from the duties of intelligent foresight and reasonable caution. To rush into unnecessary dangers, either physical or moral, expecting to call upon God for deliverance, is a presumptuous sin. It is the sin which Saul committed here and it is the sin which the tempter set before our Lord when he urged him to cast himself down from the pinnacle of the temple, relying on the hand of God to sustain him.

The Beginning of Failure.

But God sometimes answers even a presumptuous prayer, perhaps not so much for the sake of the one who offers it as for the sake of the innocent persons who would be involved in the catastrophe. So Israel was delivered from the hand of the Philistines, but Samuel, the prophet, foretells the failure and fall of Saul's kingdom and the setting up of another dynasty. "But now thy kingdom shall not continue. Jehovah hath sought him a man after his own heart and hath appointed him to be a prince over his people, because thou hast not kept that which Jehovah commanded thee." The beginning of Saul's downfall dates from this hour.

The Degeneration of Saul.

Saul's faults now begin to show themselves more clearly and more seriously. More and more Saul became the military dictator. Less and less did he understand the true meaning of Israel's history and the true place of religion in the national life. He became more arbitrary, more cruel, more headstrong and willful. One illustration of this was in his command to his men to eat nothing during a long day of battle. The command was faithfully obeyed by all who heard it. Only Jonathan disobeyed through ignorance, for when the order was given he had been away from the camp performing a feat of daring which was the chief factor in winning the victory that day. But Saul insisted that the death penalty should be inflicted upon his son because he had disobeyed a command which he had not heard. But the people who loved Jonathan, interfered and rescued him. They knew that Jonathan spoke the truth when he said, "My father hath troubled the land." It was characteristic of Saul that he put this command in the form of a curse upon anyone who should disobey, thus attempting to make God a party to his own arbitrary and foolish project.

The Expedition Against Amalek.

At the command of Jehovah, spoken through the prophet Samuel, Saul made an expedition against the Amalekites, who dwelt on the east side of Jordan and were troublesome neighbors to the trans-Jordanic tribes. The command was that they be utterly exterminated, young and old, male and female, ox and ass. It was a harsh command, but those were harsh days and there were harsh people to be dealt with. In a cruel age God must use cruel instruments.

But Saul did not follow out this command. It was not pity which moved him, for he slew the common people. It was perhaps a desire to bring back visible tokens of his victory, as the old Roman generals used to bring home captives to grace their triumphal processions. So he saved the best of the cattle and sheep and brought home Agag, the king, alive.

Sacrifice or Obedience.

When Samuel questioned Saul about his course in bringing home the spoil of the Amalekites, his excuse was that they were intended for sacrifice to Jehovah. Very likely this was a false explanation, in part at least. But Samuel did not stop to discuss that point. Even if Saul really intended to sacrifice them, it was a plain issue between formal worship and the spirit of obedience. Saul had accepted the command to destroy as from Jehovah. And yet he had dared to substitute something which he thought would do just as well and would please himself better. Here was the clearest embodiment of that willfulness which was Saul's fatal weakness. Not Thy will, but mine, was his motto. He believed in Jehovah, but his sacrifices and prayers were bribes by which he would wheedle God into doing his will. He would disobey God by sparing the best of the Amalekites and their cattle, and would make it right by dividing the spoil with Jehovah.

Samuel's rebuke was clear and firm. It is one of the high points of inspired wisdom under the old dispensation. "Behold to obey is better than sacrifice and to hearken than the fat of rams." In a later age it was to be revealed through Paul that obedience to law was not the highest category of religion. But for that earlier time the lesson that was needed was that formal worship and ritual performance can never take the place of obedience. And it is needed also in this time, for until one has learned the sacredness of God's law he cannot pass on to the still higher conception of the gospel of God's grace.

Corrections.

Readers of the Sunday-school article in last week's paper were perhaps surprised to see the statement that "righteousness and prosperity are converted." What we wrote was that "righteousness and prosperity are connected"—and the compositor did the rest.

A more serious error was caused by the omission of part of a sentence. It was said that the statement that Saul marshalled 300,000 men of Israel and 30,000 men of Judah, indicates that the narrative was written after the division of the kingdoms. The intention was to state this as only one possible conclusion. The alternative is to assume that the line of cleavage between the northern and the southern tribes was already somewhat clearly marked and that when the division of the kingdom came it was only the political separation of two communities which had for a long time been conscious of having separate interests. It will be remembered that the division between Israel and Judah was even more marked at the beginning of the reign of David, who was king of Judah seven and a half years before he became king of Israel.

Don't "Do It All."

The business man superintending a Sunday-school cannot "do it all." And he oughtn't to, if he could. By just so much as he does what others might be doing, is he lessening his own usefulness and depriving the school organization of strength. It is harder to delegate your work than to do it yourself. It means studying others, knowing their capabilities, watching their growth, training them, testing them. But it means the organized strength that is the secret of the preeminently successful Sunday-schools. Even in schools where the personality of the superintendent is strongest, this principle will be found to hold good. John Wanamaker's famous Bethany Sunday-school feels in every department the impress of its chief, as do his great stores. But in both school and stores his motto is, "Never do yourself what you can get some one else to do as well." You say there are no others in your small school or congregation you can depend on? Then you must make them. Hunt for rough diamonds; trust them with a little work; add to their responsibility gradually but steadily, and don't be contented till you've trained up a corps of trusty, dependable associates. One caution: Don't do it half-way. It is ruinous to delegate a piece of work and then half do it yourself. In order that others may feel the responsibility, they must have the responsibility.—Sunday-School Times.

Do You Know What it Means to Cure Constipation?

It means to turn aside and throw out of the body all the woes and miseries caused by a clogged up system, and they are many. Constipation means that the bowels are weak, so that they cannot keep up that constant motion the doctors call peristaltic action. When that stops passages cease, the blood begins to absorb the poisons through the walls of the intestines and thus disease is scattered everywhere. Death often lays its foundation in this way. Torturing diseases like dyspepsia, indigestion, kidney troubles, liver complaints, heart disease, headaches and a hundred and one other complaints start that way. A cure must come through toning up, strengthening and invigorating the bowels. This can be easily, gently and permanently done by Vernal Saw Palmetto Berry Wine. It is a tonic laxative of the highest class. It builds up the bowels, restores the lost action and adds new life and vigor. Only one small dose a day will positively cure constipation of any degree by removing the cause of the trouble. Try it. A free sample bottle for the asking. Midweek Prayer-MeetingBy Frank G. Tyrrell.
July 22.HOW THE HOLY SPIRIT COMFORTS.—
John 14:15-27; 15:26.

These promises of comfort brought no comfort immediately to the sorrowing disciples. Their Master stood under an impending calamity; the Shepherd was about to be smitten, and the sheep scattered. Sorrow filled their hearts. Nevertheless, it was expedient for him to go away. Out of the dark disguise would come radiant joys.

And they did; to those first disciples on Pentecost came a rapturous revelation. The days of their mourning were ended. They rejoiced in new life and courage and triumphant faith. And from that day on, the sacred narrative recognizes the presence and power of the Holy Spirit. He is the Comforter, the Advocate, the Helper. The Holy Spirit's reign was inaugurated on Pentecost; we still live under his sway, for he has never been taken from the earth. But are we always the happy recipients of his comforting and sustaining power?

1. The Holy Spirit bears witness of Christ. The followers of Christ could not think of his leaving them. Who would not have said, "Let Jesus Christ stay in the world until the last soul is saved; he must be here to direct the affairs of his kingdom. The world cannot spare him." And yet he declares that he must be the first to go. Well, he strengthens our hearts by promising the Holy Spirit, who will testify of him; so that after all, it will be as if he were still here, only he is not subject to the limitations of the flesh.

Evermore this blessed Spirit has dwelt in the church. Her history attests his presence, and the ages reveal and extend his power. He brought to the remembrance of the apostles all that Jesus had told them. He quickened their mental faculties, and enabled them to comprehend the truth. Larger and fuller, day by day, grow the revelations of Jesus Christ, through the witnessing power of the Holy Spirit.

2. By the Holy Spirit comes the assurance of forgiveness and adoption. No sinner in his right mind wants to be comforted in his sins. The whole process by which the sinner is convicted and converted is for his comfort and salvation. Every saved man ought to know that he is a child of God; that he lives in God; that should death smite him at any moment.

3. The comfort of the Holy Spirit is transcendent. No other ministry can be substituted for his; neither can his be dispensed with. When the church walked in the fear of the Lord, "and in the comfort of the Holy Spirit," it was multiplied; it was edified (Acts 9:31). We know how a human friend comforts us; what sweet words he pours into our hearts. How far above all human comforters is the help of the Holy Spirit, for he has the words of Christ. When the minister stands by the black bier, and the mourners are sobbing about him, does he attempt to soothe with his own poor words? Involuntarily he breaks forth in the language of John 14, "Let not your heart be troubled."

Study the word of God; for there you have the testimony of the Spirit. None are so well fitted to be guided and helped by him, as those who make his word their daily delight. He cannot dwell in a wicked and impure heart. Cleanse the mind. Bind the sacrifice upon the altar. Live with but one purpose,—to know God and Jesus Christ whom he hath sent.

Prayer.

May there be none of us O God, who are ignorant of Thy Spirit, or indifferent to him. Help us to honor Thee in receiving him, and yielding to him in all the events of life. May he fill the church, and empower it, and make it victorious. Enlarge our own hearts, that we may receive him in larger measure day by day, through Christ the Lord. Amen.

A MISSION STUDY OF SOUTH AFRICA.
Luke 2:25-32.

South Africa is one of the newest and most promising mission fields. It is a region under Christian government and containing a large number of Christian people. But there are native tribes who need to be taught the gospel and there is a new and vigorous civilization springing up which needs the saving influence of Christianity to keep it from falling into bondage, to commercialism and practical materialism.

The early Dutch settlers in South Africa were a God-fearing people, and their descendants are men who love their Bibles and their church. But religion has been to them rather a possession to be kept than a message to be proclaimed, and they have not impressed their Christianity either upon their white neighbors or upon the native tribes.

The late war, whatever may have been the right or wrong of it, has had the effect of bringing South Africa to the attention of the world, opening up a vast area to settlement under just laws and a stable government, and giving a tremendous impetus to commercial and industrial affairs. Henceforth South Africa is to be a part of the civilized world, not a far-off settlement on the frontier of an unknown continent.

But the question that remains to be answered is: What kind of a civilization shall it be? Shall it be one in which Christian principles are dominant, or one in which Christ has no part? If Christianity is to be the corner stone of this new empire, then the time to lay that corner stone is while the structure is being begun. It is too late to put in a corner stone when the roof is going on. When Christianity goes into the old and settled civilizations, like those of China and India, it has a problem of destruction and reconstruction on its hands. In these new countries it has the inspiring task of seeing that the construction is right in the first place, so that there will be no need of the tedious and expensive processes of destruction and reconstruction.

In this respect, South Africa as a mission field is like our own western states. It is new. It is growing. Good and evil forces are racing to secure the points of vantage in it. Everything depends upon promptness of action. While we hesitate, the enemy gets ahead of us and is in on the ground floor, where we ought to be. In these great fields where the seeds of new civilizations are springing up, the command is especially urgent, "What thou doest, do quickly."

The Disciples of Christ have at present not a single minister or missionary in South Africa. Our Foreign Society would gladly send representatives there if it had the means. Preparations are under way for the establishment of an independent and, it is hoped, self-supporting mission in South Africa. Missionary work there will have this important advantage, that it can be conducted in the English language.

Since the close of the Boer war, there has been a considerable stream of emigration to South Africa from Australia and New Zealand. We have a considerable membership in these colonies, and many of our brethren have been among this number. But the Australian churches have not felt able to send a minister with these emigrants. A missionary from this country would, however, have their support and would find in South Africa the nucleus of a Christian community.

"An Endeavorer's Working Journey Around the World."

By John F. Anderson.

$1.50 Postpaid.

The reviewers are saying many pleasant things about this book. Here is what the St. Louis Globe-Democrat says of it:

"Robert Louis Stevenson wrote in his 'Inland Voyage' his belief in the fact that there was much excuse for a young fellow who got tired of sitting on a high stool recording rows of figures and struck out on a pedestrian tour of leisure and idleness on a search for knowledge. Mr. Anderson is not to be regarded for an instant as an idler, as his book amply testifies. But in other respects he has followed the advice of the lovable vagabond preacher, and has seen a surprising number of places with a pair of eyes which seem to have been more practical and alert than those of most travelers.

"One hesitates to call this a volume of travel, lest it be placed on the shelf unread. It is rather a document of frank comment, and the subjects are as wide as the world itself. We learn that eastern farmers—in the United States—are less hospitable than those of the west, and the proof of this is a statement to the effect that the youthful traveler was permitted 'to camp on that part of a field farthest from the house, on condition that he pay his host 25 cents.' There was no thought of admitting him to the house. In the west the people wished to detain him, and objected to payment for food and lodging. In Ireland he found also a spirit of hospitality, and he took occasion to see how bog fuel was made, and how the front room was carpeted—if at all. In Egypt he helped to build a bridge, so that he might find out how fared the poor people in that country. In Germany he studied the process by which a laborer with a large family could live better than a man in the same position could in this country with less payment for his work. In London he was a barber, in order that he might eat and sleep, and in India, Japan and other countries he was always willing to work hard to make an honest dollar. He never begged, and he came back to the United States richer than when he left it. Incidentally he met Robert J. Burdette on his travels, that gentleman taking note of the fact that the traveler was a fine, independent type of young American, appearing to advantage where others would have made a very bad showing, indeed. Mr. Burdette writes a short introduction to the book.

"Incidentally the illustration is excellent, and the book-making a credit to the publishers."

Our Budget

—C. A. McDonald closed a two years' pastorate at Kent, O., June 22, and began work at Coshocton, July 1.

—B. F. Manire is visiting his daughter, Mrs. W. B. Young, at Fayetteville, Ark., and preaching as opportunity offers.

—E. F. Mohan, of Shelbyville, Ind., and C. R. Hudson, of Franklin, Ind., are attending the summer School of Theology at Harvard University.

—The church of Christ at Carneiro, Kan., wish a pastor for half time; a young man preferred. Can pay $260 per year. Write A. W. Sheridan, elder.

—S. D. Dutcher, pastor at Oklahoma City, O. T., desires to correspond with a good singing evangelist at once. Address, Box 636, Oklahoma City, O. T.

—Geo. E. Dew has accepted the call to the church at Neosho, Mo. The church has thus secured a good man, and Brother Dew has entered into an excellent field.

—Last week the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, Cincinnati, Ohio, received $1,275 on the annuity plan. The annuity fund of this society is rapidly approaching $200,000.

—We regret to chronicle the death of the mother of Bro. H. H. Moninger, pastor at Steubenville, O. She was sixty years old and was ill only one week with appendicitis.

—J. M. Van Horn, who resigned at Worcester, Mass., three weeks ago, has withdrawn his resignation at the earnest request of the whole church and will remain at Worcester.

—The First Christian Church, Cedar Rapids has about 125 copies of "The Standard Church Hymnal," in very fair condition, which they would be glad to donate to some worthy church.
F. J. STINSON, Pastor.

—The church at Queensville, Ind., where Willis M. Cunningham ministers on the first Lord's day, and the church at Braytown, Ind., where he preaches on the fifth Lord's day, will both be improved within and without during the summer.

—H. H. Moninger, of Steubenville, Ohio, writes: Our Children's day offering was $463.27. A part will go for foreign missions and a part for a local Sunday-school mission. We hope that next year the mission school will contribute for foreign missions.

—L. A. Chapman, of Grand Valley, Ont., Can., is enjoying a respite from his labors by filling the pulpit of Charles Bloom, of Scio, N. Y., during the month of July. He finds the work there in good condition. The people say that Brother Bloom is one of the strongest preachers in New York.

—The second annual encampment of the West Texas Christian Churches will be held at Brady, Tex., July 28–Aug. 9. Last year 500 people camped on the beautiful camp-ground and the Sunday services were attended by twice that number. For information address Arthur W. Jones, Comanche, Tex.

—"Our friends will, no doubt, be glad to learn that an eight and a half pound daughter came to our house on July 9. I hardly think I will be able to hold any more meetings for a month. Both mother and child are doing well at present."
HAROLD E. MONSER.

Speed, Mo.

—"We have two dates open for meetings between now and Dec. 1. We could begin either from the first to the middle of August or from the first to the middle of September. Address us at Ohio, Ill., where we are just beginning a meeting."

LAWRENCE WRIGHT AND L. R. SMITH.

—On Friday evening, June 19, Bro. J. R. Miller, our pastor at Granby, Mo., was ordained to the ministry with fasting, prayer and the laying on of hands. Dean W. J. Lhamon, of Columbia, preached the sermon, and W. F. Turner conducted the services. Brother Miller is held in high esteem by the church and community. He will return to Lexington, Ky., in September to finish his education.

—For the first nine days of July the foreign society received $7,761.26 for heathen missions, or a gain of $1,337.53 over the corresponding time one year ago. The Sunday-schools increase their offerings for this world-wide enterprise each year.

—"The fortieth annual meeting of the Ministerial Association of the Disciples of Christ of eastern Ohio, will be held in Hiram, Ohio, Sept. 1-3, 1903. Let all members take notice and prepare to be present if possible. A good program will soon be ready for announcement."
F. M. GREEN, Cor. Sec.

Kent, O.

—E. S. De Miller has accepted the invitation of the Ontario board to continue a third year as provincial evangelist. Churches wishing his assistance should apply to Amos Tovell, corresponding secretary, Guelph, Ont. Brother De Miller is spending July at his home in Columbus, O., and expects to be ready for work Aug. 1.

—The Hammett Place Church, St. Louis, will open a new branch school at the corner of Prairie and Hebert Avenues next Sunday morning. The Hammett Place school conducts its mission Sunday-schools or branches of the main school holding their sessions at the same hour, instead of having afternoon missions according to the usual city custom.

—The American Christian Missionary Society received two annuities during the last week, one for $1,000 and the other for $500. The home board has received $23,000 on the annuity plan since the national convention at Omaha, Neb. This plan is growing in favor. Write for annuity booklet to Benjamin L. Smith, Cor. Sec., Y. M. C. A. building, Cincinnati, Ohio.

—D. E. Dannenberg, who is now leading our young people in the student campaign movement, is visiting the churches and Endeavor Societies in different parts of the country under the auspices of the foreign society. He is a graduate of Hiram College and will go to the foreign field next year. He is a man of great enthusiasm and awakens a larger interest wherever he goes.

—The faculty for the Christian Conservatory, which has just been established in Chicago, is now being formed, and there is an opening for a fine soprano singer and teacher, as well as for a man director. The director must be a vocal teacher and a good singer, capable of conducting. It is preferred that he be interested in the Christian church. Address Mr. Frank Felton, Christian Conservatory, corner of Monroe and Francisco Sts., Chicago, Ill.

—H. G. Bennett, pastor at Carbondale, Ill., called at this office last week and reported his church prospering. On July 5 a special service was held celebrating the first anniversary of the dedication of the new building. During the past year $19,600 has been raised for all purposes, most of which was for the church debt, which is now all paid except $2,700, and that is partly covered by pledges. There has been a net gain of 40 in the membership during the past year.

—W. E. Harlow has resigned his pastorate at Springfield, Mo., to take effect Sept. 30, and will re-enter the evangelistic field at that time. He has been notably successful in the past, and even while holding a pastorate has found time to hold some remarkable meetings. One of the best was the recent meeting at Jacksonville, Fla., with nearly one hundred additions. Brother Harlow will be a valued and tried addition to our splendid corps of evangelists in the field.

—The Metropolitan Church of Christ, Chicago, of which Charles Reign Scoville is pastor, was rendered homeless a few weeks ago by the burning of the People's Institute. The congregation is now meeting in a large tent seating about 2,000, located at the corner of Harrison Street and Irving Avenue. But this is only a temporary make-shift. The church has decided to build a permanent home worthy of itself and of the work which it proposes to do. A large lot has been bought on the corner of Oakley Boulevard and Van Buren Street. The lot cost $30,000 and is partly covered by store buildings and flats which bring an income of $160 a month. The building to be erected will include some rooms to be let for business purposes, which will insure a permanent income to the church. The building will be equipped for institutional church work, will probably have a roof garden among other features, and will be open seven days and seven nights in the week. We look for great things under Brother Scoville's leadership.

—B. B. Tyler, of the South Broadway Church, Denver, is preaching a series of short Sunday evening sermons which he calls the "Reason Why" series. The topics are: Why I believe in God the Father. Why I believe in Jesus as the Son of God and the Savior of men. Why I believe in the Bible as the supernatural book. Why I believe that Jesus will come again. Why I believe in the Resurrection and the life eternal. Why I believe in the church. Why I believe in my fellow-man.

—The steamship, "China," sailing from San Francisco, September 29, will have on board the following missionaries of the foreign society: M. B. Madden and wife and three children of Topeka, Kans., to Sendai, Japan; Dr. A. L. Shelton and wife, of Oswego, Kans., for Nankin, China; Miss Rose T. Armbruster, of Springfield, Ill., to Osaka, Japan; Dr. Susie C. Rijnhart, of Chicago, to Nankin, China, enroute to Tibet, and possibly three others. This is the largest number of our missionaries ever sailed from the American shore on any one steamer.

—Dr. C. L. Pickett and his wife, Dr. Leta M. Pickett, of Tecumseh, Neb., have just been appointed medical missionaries by our foreign society to Laoag, Philippine Islands. They will be associated with Hermon P. Williams and W. H. Hanna. They both graduated at Drake University, and afterwards both took a four years' course in a medical college and received their degrees. They are members of the University Place Church, Des Moines, Ia. They will sail from San Francisco on the S. S. "Hong Kong Maru," Sept. 19. Our work is prospering in the Philippine Islands above anything we had any right to expect. We now have a church in Manila and a native preacher. This church enjoys constant growth.

—"We thought you would be pleased to know of the 'great day' at Muncie, Ind., at the first church. There has long been a debt hanging over our church, and our beloved pastor, T. A. Reynolds, recently secured pledges to liquidate a $7,000 note held by the bank. To celebrate the event of the burning of this note there was a fine musical program prepared and the auditorium handsomely decorated. At the close of the sermon nine were added to the fellowship, two by confession. Then 'Aunt' Emily Adamson, a beloved charter member, performed the rite of burning the note, while the congregation sang, 'Praise God from whom all blessings flow.' At night three others were added, one eminent lawyer of some 70 years made the good confession. At this same service the church voted our pastor a six weeks' vacation on full salary and given a substantial purse."

C. C. PAVEY.

—The college of the Disciples at St. Thomas, Ontario, is in need of a principal for the coming session beginning Oct. 1, school year lasting six months. This college has been doing an excellent work in preparing young men for the ministry and young men and women for efficient Christian work. Its curriculum embraces English, Latin, Greek and Hebrew, also science, philosophy and other branches. The principal must be a man consecrated and enthusiastic, of thorough education, and efficient also in gathering students and soliciting funds, and he may require for the present to supplement his salary by preaching for some neighboring church or churches. A broad field is open for this school, it being the only one our people have in Canada. Apply at once with references and stating experience and salary expected to R. W. Ballah, Box 601, St. Thomas, or to John Campbell, "Erie Mills," St. Thomas.

—We learn from the Christian Standard that our venerable brother, J. H. Lockwood, of Cincinnati, has departed this life. He was a charter member of the American Christian Missionary

Correspondence

Washington Letter.

The capital is getting down to summer conditions. Ninety-seven in the shade July 3 means business. The exodus to mountain and seaside has fairly begun. Wesley's bicentennial and the glorious Fourth had their proper consideration. The postal scandals and prospect of complications with Russia received all necessary notice. The doings of King Peter and Sir Thomas Lipton of the Blue Hen state and "the dark and bloody ground" have been duly discussed. Now for the dies caniculares, Old Sol and the festive mosquito.

What a fine season is the "good old summer time" for doing good? Those who go forth on their holiday recreation find many opportunities to let their light shine, and those who tarry by the stuff are not without unusual privileges in the church and community where they dwell. In season and out of season, is the scripture motto. Too many, when they go away from home for rest, are like the little girl in the prayer before her visit to the Hub: "Good-bye God, good-bye Jesus Christ, I am going to Boston to-morrow!" A young lady recently added to the Vermont Avenue Church, went for her vacation to a northern city where we had no representation. On the first week of her stay there she put a notice in one of the papers, asking that any disciples in the city would communicate with her. Several found her out, and in finding her, found each other, began soon to meet for the breaking of bread, and now there is a strong church in that great center of population. It is not always summer, and many have been compelled to cry, "The summer is past, the harvest is ended, and my soul is not saved." To every one the Lord presents good days and good openings ripe for service, as to Amos of old when he said, "Behold a basket of summer fruit."

Among the inviting places for thought and rest and useful work during the hot season is Bethany Beach on the Delaware Coast. It is readily reached from Philadelphia or Baltimore by either Pa. or B. & O. to Rehoboth, Delaware. It is a resort for the Disciples by the seaside, and there are cottages and hotels and a summer assembly. Gospel meetings are to be held in the tabernacle from July 26-31 by evangelists W. J. Wright and J. A. Hopkins. August 2-16 will be the assembly. Missionary day, Christian Endeavor day, Sunday-school day, temperance day, woman's day, and patriotic day are some of the great days. Lectures by Herbert Yenell, G. P. Rutledge, E. B. Bagby, T. E. Crambley, and others; sermons and Bible lectures by B. A. Abbott, H. C. Kendrick, W. S. Hoyer, J. W. West, Andrew Wilson, and others; concerts and elocutionary entertainments, and many other good things. Nine new cottages are going up, the board walk is nearing completion, and the pavilion under way.

Come and see the works of the Lord who made the sea and all that therein is, who layeth the beams of his chambers in the waters. Our Master loved the seaside, and his first disciples were fishermen. People living inland know but little about the ocean, only what comes to them in the rain and tempests. They are like some Christians who dwell far from the great sea of God's infinite love, catching only the droppings of his grace and joy and truth. They need to draw near to hear what the wild waves are saying in their ceaseless ebb and flow, "Thy way is in the sea and thy path in the great waters!" It is the sublimest of all music. Well might Xenophon's ten thousand cry out in their joy: "Thalassa! Thalassa!" the sea! the sea!

W. L. Harris, of Bristol, Tenn., takes the place made vacant by the death of the lamented Kimmel, and has already entered upon his work. He is a native of Normal, Ill., and was educated in the public schools of Lincoln, Neb., and in Cotner and Drake. His first charge was Dixon, Ill., and he afterward preached in Nebraska. For the past year he has been located at Bristol, Tenn., and did excellent service there, adding 164 to the church. He is thirty-one years of age and has a wife and two children. The church at Whitney Avenue is wide-awake, united, and thoroughly in earnest, and should make rapid progress under the leadership of their new pastor. Kimmel Hall, their new addition to the house of worship, will be pushed and is greatly needed for their Sunday-school and other services.

An ordination service of unusual interest took place at the Vermont Avenue Church Sunday, July 5. John McDonald Horne, of Mt. Pulaski, Ill., was set apart formally to the work of the ministry. Brother Horne recently completed a course of four years at Eureka. He married in September last one of our best young women, Miss Goldie Gideon, who is herself quite equal to good pulpit service in case he needs a substitute. He takes the church is Brockton, Mass., a town near Boston, of 50,000 people, where we have 75 members. It is gratifying to see our capable young western preacher entering this eastern field, especially New England. There never were better opportunities, nor more satisfactory results for faithful and intelligent labor. It is painful to notice how many of our preachers are getting away from the duties of the ministry and entering upon lines of secular service, while here are great fields and a sad lack of laborers to gather the harvest. There is point in George MacDonald's little poem:

I said, "I will walk in the fields." God said,
"Nay; walk in the town."

I said, "There are no flowers there." He said,
"No flowers, but a crown."

I said, "But the fogs are thick, and clouds
Are veiling the sun."

He answered, "But hearts are sick, and souls
In the dark undone."

I said, "But the skies are black; there is Nothing but noise and din."

And He wept as He led me back. "There is more."

He said, "there is sin."

I said, "I shall miss the light, and friends will Miss me, they say."

He answered, "Choose ye to-night if I must Miss you, or they."

I pleaded for time to be given. He said,
"Is it hard to decide?"

It will not seem hard in heaven, to have Followed the steps of your guide."

Our efficient and faithful M. E. Harlan has been getting some free advertising. He and Dr. Henson have been interchanging views on the union question. Then a reference of his to a well-known Salvation Army hymn called forth a holy remonstrance from that guardian of public morals and regulator of the pulpit which we call the press. The Brooklyn Eagle writes freely of the "Harlan horror," and our pious Washington Post feels called upon to devote an editorial to this wayward divine. Both papers had to back down from their hasty statements. And now here comes the Pulpit Treasury with Harlan's picture, and an excellent sermon on "The Authority and Significance of the Communion Service." Our Brooklyn preacher is all right.

Our Christian Endeavor union, consisting of the Christian Endeavor societies of our four churches here, has just finished paying for the lot for our fifth church. It is to be a Christian Endeavor church. The location is in the southeast section of the city, and immediate steps will be taken to erect a house of worship. We expect within a year to have another center of religious activity at the Capital. The Ninth Street Church gave their good pastor a large reception on the evening of June 26, in honor of his tenth wedding anniversary. The youthful couple moved down the aisle of the church in the old way to the strains of the wedding march, escorted by ten little girls, "one for each year." There were decorations and music and a joyous multitude and a set of Haviland china and a very handsome bride and groom, and "many happy returns!" What times these preachers have!

F. D. POWER.

A Hero and a Heroine.

At the Presbyterian parsonage I recently attended a reception tendered to Mr. and Mrs. Dryer, who will soon return to China. There is nothing remarkable in such a statement because the missionaries come and go all the time, but these two have interested me very much. They passed through the awful experiences at Shansi during the Boxer rebellion, and now after a furlough, just as soon as it is practicable for them to return, they turn their faces seaward en route to China.

They were dressed as they appear at work, in Chinese costume, and presented a picturesque appearance before a congregation, young and old, that crowded the spacious building. The people listened with deep interest to a modest recital of some of their experiences in the heart of the land of Confucius. The real hero never boasts of what he has done; modesty is a part of the heroic spirit.

For forty-five days on their journey to the sea coast the dangers were many, and when the sea coast was reached the party had to be carried, they were broken down completely in body and spirit. What they passed through cannot be told by human tongue, and yet, like the hero Paul, "none of these things move" them—they count not even life dear so that they might publish the name of Christ to the perishing heathen, of whom one thousand an hour pass out into the hereafter without the knowledge of him whose blood cleanses from sin.

The wife of this devoted missionary said that in going back they would feel repaid if they led one soul into light out of the unutterable heathen darkness—repaid for all that they had suffered in the days when men, women, and even little children were slaughtered, nearly two hundred of them, slaughtered ruthlessly without a reason under heaven, save the very heathenism which stands as a great blot on our maps, and as a rebuke to "Christian" nations.

One cannot but admire such spirits, because in their lives one gets a glimpse of the heroism which marked the apostles as they took their lives in their hands and confronted men more savage than the wild beasts of the forest. They were stoned and left for dead, they were tortured, they were sawn asunder, but God's wonderful gospel lived, and will live, for it is vital, quick and powerful, and it shall now in China accomplish God's will. China shall yet bloom and blossom as the rose—it shall be rescued. Dr. Joseph Edkins, the nestor of missionaries, said to me in that interesting land:

"There may be other troubles, but China will emerge from the trial purified and advanced; the only thing that can do it is the gospel."

This hero and heroine, interesting from their experiences, and devoted even unto the point of daring, teach a higher lesson.

It makes one wish that all might catch a great vision of the real meaning of life. There are many churches among us which need this vision. There are men and women, nominal numbers, posing as leaders who are strangers to such a line of thought. The heavenly vision full of glorious light has never touched either their minds or hearts, and judging from the meager returns for world-wide missions many are wrapped in the mantle of pharisaic selfishness, while the great world moves on toward death.

There are rich people who are ignorant of the needs of the world. To tell them that there are 500,000,000 Christless women in the world may wake a little shudder, but the spasm soon disappears.

There are many who are not fully persuaded that life is worth living because they feel not the thrill of divinity stirring within.

Ask those who suffer most from the contradiction of sinners; ask those who see in man the image of God, marred but capable of being restored. These are they who lift the world toward God and light divine. Thank God for our toilers, unselfish and true, at home and abroad. They are like-minded with Christ, who said: "My Father worketh hitherto and I work."

ARTHUR M. GROWDEN.

The Modern Gideon, or the Evolution of the Traveling Man.

It has been said that thirty years ago the average traveling man was regarded as a "bummer," twenty years ago he was known as a "drummer," ten years ago he was looked upon as a plain traveling man, but to-day thousands of them are known as active Christian men.

Four years ago two travelers chanced to meet in a humble tavern in Boscobel, Wisconsin. By reason of limited accommodations, they were obliged to occupy the same room for the night. Upon retiring to their room each learned that the other was a follower of the lowly Nazarene. That night they prayed together, and agreed that Christian traveling men ought to have some means of ready recognition. On the following day each went his way, but in a few weeks they met again on the streets of Beaver Dam. They talked of their previous meeting and planned for a meeting of larger significance later at Waukesha. They met as per agreement and talked and prayed together. The necessity for an organization such as they desired was now so evident that they issued a call to all who were in sympathy with the movement to meet at Janesville as per date of announcement.

There were seven (God's significant number for starting great things) present at the Janesville meeting. They here completed the organization begun at Waukesha, chose a name from the story recorded in the 6th chapter of Judges, and thus the "Gideons" were born. S. E. Hill, of Beloit, and J. H. Nicholson, of Janesville, were the promoters and recognized leaders in the new movement. The first annual meeting was called for Waukegon. Christian traveling men on every hand rallied to the new cause, and more than 600 members were reported at the first national meeting.

Enthusiasm and hearty Christian service have pushed the work of the "Gideons" into all parts of the land. At the second annual meeting held at Madison, more than 1,600 members were reported. Long ere this they had begun publishing "The Gideon," a magazine issued quarterly for the dissemination of Gideon news, and this has been an important factor in the movement. The third national meeting was held at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, and about 2,300 members were reported. No movement ever received a more willing support from any class of men. Its chief objects are "fraternity and recognition," and this to the end that the kingdom of God may be extended.

The fourth national convention was held at Indianapolis on July 3, 4 and 5, 1903. A membership of 3,220 was reported—a gain of about 1,000 for the last year. About 250 delegates were present to transact business for the future of the great work that seems to have only begun. On Lord's day, July 5, the morning services at fifty-five of the churches of Indianapolis were conducted by "Gideons." More than a score of conversions was reported. The entire city received a spiritual quickening because of these meetings. The weather was depressingly warm, but the ardor of these Christian workers was not to be quenched. During their meetings of Friday and Saturday they planned and prayed together. This is a glorious means of furthering the cause of unity among God's people. They sang spiritual songs, and the exhortations and testimonies sprang from hearts that were on fire for God. The all-day business session of Saturday was punctuated with bursts of praiseful song, prayers, "hallelujahs," "praise the Lord," "amens," and with an immense amount of business was transacted—a revision of the constitution and by-laws was completed. At this meeting many of the state chairmen reported the organization of one or several "state camps"—local organizations, but under the jurisdiction of the head camp at Chicago.

The Gideons found time to hold numerous "street meetings," and seemed to be "diligent in season and out of season." The venerable John V. Farwell, of Chicago, was in constant attendance, and his wise words, expressed in brief talks, were gladly received and appreciated. A score or more of states were represented. Delegates were present from New Jersey and California. The great praise service in Tomlinson hall on Sunday afternoon will long be remembered. One brother said, "I have been at Ocean Grove, but this is better."

The Ladies' Auxiliary (wives of the Gideons) was present to enjoy the meetings. It is evident to even a casual observer that a new and mighty religious force has sprung up. It was born of God through the prayers of men who are anxious to see his righteousness fill the whole earth.

GEORGE W. HOOTMAN, No. 1044,

Did I Do Right?

In the early part of our civil war I was called on to attend the funeral of one of the first of the boys who was not to return to his home again. It was some twenty miles from my home. It was a thickly settled rural district, quite destitute of religious privileges. There were four families which were in sympathy with the Christians, who wanted me to come and preach to them as often as I could. The result was a Christian church of some fifty members, with a comfortable chapel. My health failing after three years, I dropped my appointments; only occasionally, as to attend a funeral. Since then, Methodists, Disciples and occasionally a Christian preacher has preached for them.

Three months ago I was with them. I found a few of three or four kinds; a good school, with occasional preaching. I told them that all those who loved the Savior and wanted to see his life promoted in the community constituted the body of Christ—the church in that place.

I advised them to organize as such; to be governed by the word of God as they understood it, in the fellowship of the spirit to do Christian work as thou needest, and grow in grace and the knowledge of the truth.

Did I do right? S. M. FOWLER.

[Our personal opinion is that a church organized on that vague basis, made up of "all who loved the Savior and wanted to see his life promoted in the community," without clear and definite instruction as to the faith of the gospel, and without a certain knowledge of what that faith required of them in the way of obedience and life, would not be much of a force for good in the community. It would lack that unity, vigor and aggressiveness, which come from conscious conformity to God's revealed will.—EDITOR.]

New Church at Franklin, Ind.

Charles R. Hudson, Pastor.

Dedication at Franklin, Ind.

The beautiful, commodious, new Christian Church of this city was yesterday dedicated to the work of the Lord amid the most appropriate and interesting services. The new house of worship is a thing of marvelous beauty, being erected entirely of stone, the foundation is one blue limestone with the walls of buff Bedford stone trimmed in Kentucky white limestone. The estimated cost of the building when completed is $25,000 and of this amount nearly two-thirds has already been paid off, while the remainder was yesterday arranged for by pledges to the amount of more than $10,000. Under the leadership of Rev. Zack. T. Sweeney, of Columbus, Ind., the people seemed anxious to assist in the unloading of the church debt.

Bro. Sweeney preached the dedicatory sermon to a multitude of people which more than filled the entire church, which has a seating capacity of nearly 1,500. Special music was presented by the church choir of 25 voices under the leadership of Prof. Oscar Sears Storey of this city. In a short sermon Bro. Sweeney demonstrated that this church had, like the apostle Paul, passed through the stages of the "promise" in which the church existed only in the minds of the few who were backing the movement for a new church; the stage of "preparation" in which the ground was broken and the evacuation begun; third, the stage of "Prophecy," in which the architect decided that the building should be of stone rather than brick and that it should be beautifully frescoed and decorated in tasty manner; and fourth, the stage of "proclamation," in which he proclaimed that the church was completed and that it was a marvel to the human eye. Brother Sweeney then stated to the congregation the amount needed to free the church of debt and proceeded at once to the taking of pledges, which were most heartily given, the remarkable feature being that the members in only comfortable conditions were anxious to help. When the pledges were lowered to the class of $25 or less, 20 minutes were taken up entirely by the people present making pledges as fast as the two clerks could make note of them. The pledges were given with a freer hand and more happiness than ever before known in this city.

At four o'clock a union communion service was given, Rev. Charles R. Hudson, the regular pastor, being assisted by Rev. L. P. Marshal, of the local Presbyterian Church, and Rev. J. H. Garrison, of St. Louis, Mo., the individual communion sets being used for the first time in the history of this city.

At 8 o'clock the evening service of the day was attended by more people than could find seats in the house many being compelled to leave while many others stood during the entire program to hear Rev. J. H. Garrison, who held the closest attention of the large audience for one hour, while he delivered one of the finest sermons that has been heard in this city in many a day. At the close of his address Brother Garrison stated that as the amount pledged in the morning was yet a few dollars short, the opportunity would be extended to any of those present to make any pledge they felt like stating and with a rush the pledges came in until about $1,000 was raised, when the meeting was dismissed by the pastor, C. R. Hudson. The day was a most profitable one. ARTHUR R. OWENS.

To the Kansas Brotherhood in Behalf of the Churches in the Flooded District.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS.—You are all aware that an awful calamity has befallen our churches, as well as those of the denominations, in the flooded district along the Kansas river. Those of our churches most severely afflicted are the ones at North Topeka, Perry, North Lawrence, Argentine and Armourdale in Kansas City, Kansas.

The superintendent of missions has visited three of these places, and made diligent inquiry of the preachers of the other two. The situation in many respects is appalling and simply beggars description. In North Topeka the water was five feet deep in the church building. The furniture, including the organ, seats, etc., was ruined and many windows broken. In addition to this the entire membership was more or less affected, the majority losing everything.

At Perry their new building was about half completed. Some of the material was washed away, and many families rendered homeless.

The church building at North Lawrence was not in the flood, but fully fifteen families, composing the larger part of the membership, was in the flooded district. All lost their crops, many lost their homes and everything in them.

At Argentine we have no building of our own, yet some of the best paying families were rendered penniless.

At Armourdale the sight makes one heart-sick. In company with T. A. Abbott, the secretary of Missouri, the superintendent visited the scene on July 6. The building, a large frame in a good location, is a wreck. The water had been fourteen feet deep in the building. The entire floor with the pews and all other furniture had fallen into the basement, and was covered with tons and tons of mud. The west side of the house bulged out and the foundation at this place was ruined. It will require at least $1,200 to put this building and furniture in as good shape as it was before the flood.

The churches in Kansas City, Mo., are helping nobly in this work at Armourdale. A committee from the First Church in Kansas City, Mo., has been appointed and is doing a telling work, but we should not expect these brethren to do it all. Our brethren in Kansas City, Mo., have already raised more than $15,000 for flood sufferers.

In all these churches, notwithstanding their pitiful condition, the brethren are brave and hopeful. In every case where a regular minister was employed, he is staying with his flock and sharing the losses and burdens. But so many of these brethren are helpless. At the very best they can barely house their families and get ready for winter, not to speak of their repairing their houses of worship and maintaining preaching.

The other churches are aiding their own in this dire extremity, and our brethren are looking to us. Shall they look in vain? Strong men with tears which they struggled to conceal said, "We want our brethren to help us repair our church buildings, and maintain preaching until we partly recover our loss. We will care for our families."

Brethren and sisters, let us heed this heart-rending appeal from our brethren in this time of distress more terrible than the Galveston horror. Money is needed. It is needed now. The present need of clothing is supplied. Send all money to our treasurer, A. Rosalea Pendleton, Topeka, Kan. Mark it for the "Flood Fund." We should receive $2,000 in the next thirty days. For humanity's sake and for Christ's sake, let our response be quick and generous.

It should be stated that money raised for the above purpose will not be counted on the regular apportionment for Kansas. That would not be helping our brethren bear their burdens, it would be simply shifting our own and placing a burden on our state work which it is not able to bear.

Fraternally yours,

MILTON BROWN, Pres. K. C. M. S.
W. S. LOWE, Supt. K. C. M. S.

A Heart-Thought.

DEAR BROTHER GARRISON: Have just read your announcement for the fortieth anniversary of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. I have not been able to preach since December, having at that time resigned the pastorate of the East Side Church in this city. I expect to commence preaching again in September.

The first work I did when I left school was for the Evangelist, as it was then called, and edited by Daniel Bates, at Fort Madison, Ia. I was most intimately acquainted also with Bro. A. Chatterton, who followed Brother Bates as editor, also with Prof. G. T. Carpenter, who became editor after Brother Chatterton. I have been a subscriber from its first issue until the present time. I do not think you have or ever had a subscriber or friend who has followed your whole editorial life with more interest and Christian affection than he who pens these lines. Your announcement that the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST was soon to come home in its old familiar dress touched my heart tenderly, and I could not refrain from penning a heart thought toward helping you celebrate the fortieth volume of a religious paper of the most remarkably growth and history, in many respects, of any paper within the knowledge of your correspondent. I send you two subscribers and wish it were two hundred. Your public life and mine commenced about the same time and place. We have passed through grand and stirring times. Your life since then has been in many respects stormy and difficult, but you have safely touched the zenith of life with an honor that few men attain, and still seem young, brave and hopeful as in days of yore. I often sit with pleasure under the notes that fall from the Easy Chair, and feel charmed and cheered under the unfoldings of the mystic future that often seem dark, but never so dark as to obscure the sweet and cheerful light and music of the gospel of Christ. My Christian faith has never been stronger, nor the star of Christian hope brighter than during the long night from which I now seem to be emerging. I sincerely pray that your declining years may be even more useful and happy than ever before, and that your sun may set amid the glories that will come with the rising of the cloudless morning of eternal life.

The Life of W. K. Pendleton. By F. D. Power.

The work is well done both by the author and the publishers. The life of W. K. Pendleton has influenced many thousands to noble purpose, pure thoughts and holy living. He has left no influence on the other side. In scholarship, in dignity of knightly manhood, in pure faith in Christ, in God and in the Bible, he had no superior. He was quiet during our struggle here, and yet he was loyal, loving his home and his country. As a teacher, he was courteous, amiable, firm. He spoke faultless English. Young men found in him always a true friend. He smiled a little (just under the skin) at the blunders of callow youth, and yet his love was so abounding and his heart so warm, he could see their good qualities and apologize for the rest. He could have cut them into any number of equal parts, and analyzed them in their presence, and removed their splendid conceit, which was the main ingredient of manhood with them; but he spared them, and apologized for them and encouraged them. In public speech, he did not reach the lofty heights of the old man eloquent, and yet he had a wonderfully happy way of saying the right thing at the right time and in the right way. He was naturally endowed with a high temper, but his Christian faith and discipline so gentled it that one would have supposed that he never had any emotions with which to contend for a moment. At our great conventions, he was as obedient as a student. As a chairman of a committee he did not rest till the work allotted had been done and well done. Many of the best editorials in the Harbinger flowed from his facile pen. Many wrote more than he, but none wrote better. A number of his speeches have been preserved to us by this book. It seems to me that no preacher's library is what it ought to be without this volume. Multitudes of our young men are greatly in need of the healing grace and benediction of the life of W. K. Pendleton as written up by F. D. Power; 494 pages, price $1.50. Published by the Christian Publishing Co., St. Louis, Mo.

"The Spiritual Side of Our Plea."

I began some time ago to give the book a careful review; but find so much in it that I should require more space than I could reasonably ask of any of our papers.

I desire to say in the outset that while there are some things in the book with which I should differ, yet I am in sympathy with the author and his general position. And I believe there is a place in our literature for such work as this.

The reader must finish the book for himself. There is a spiritual side to our plea. We all need to know it and enjoy it. I am persuaded that this book will help us to a better understanding of it. At least it will help us to think more seriously along these lines. Get it and read it for yourself. It will do you good.

Alexander Campbell's Theology.

The purpose of the book is "to present a study of Alexander Campbell's theology by the historical method;" and the author has held very closely to his text from beginning to end. He has not assumed "to deal with the official and authoritative theology of the Disciples of Christ," but only with Alexander Campbell's theology. The author has taken pains to clearly define what he means by the "historical method," and in the foreview of each chapter he has presented an analysis which, with fine discrimination and patience of research, he has worked out the various chapters after the introduction, which defines the "historical method" and outlines the character of the investigation, present in logical order, "The Development of the Problem of Unity," "Philosophical Basis," "Theological Heritage," "The Kingdom of God," "Authority and Inspiration," "Faith and Repentance," "Baptism," "The Holy Spirit in Conversion," "Regeneration," "The Ideal God."

The literary character of the volume is a credit alike to its author and his distinguished subject. It is an honest effort, enthusiastically carried to a conclusion to represent Mr. Campbell's theology in its active historic setting. While Mr. Campbell was influenced by the study of those who had preceded him, and moved in many ways by his personal surroundings, yet the book reveals the fact that in his work, Mr. Campbell often rose above all his surroundings and in his individual majesty declared his faith and purpose.

TEVITCHELL.

David T. Tevitchell was born June 9, 1835, in Andover, Ohio. Got his early education mainly in the hard materialist school of hard, honest labor, thus developing a hardy, rugged manhood. During the civil war he took a military training in such schools as Antetam and the trenches around Petersburg. Was always a warm humanitarian and a lover of human kind. In him the distressed had a sympathetic friend, the needy found an open hand, the right found a strong champion, the wrong an uncompromising enemy, a kind, indulgent husband and father, a peerless neighbor, a friend without variableness on shadow of turning, was honestly personified. Espoused Christianity in 1870, united with the Christian Church and lived true to his profession. His life was a demonstration of applied Christianity. Three children were born to him. One, a daughter, survives, who, with his loving wife, is left to mourn his death, after a long and trying illness borne with heroic fortitude. He entered into rest, May 9, 1903, at Archie, Mo., aged 67 years, 11 months. Requiescat in pace.

How a Woman Paid Her Debts.

I am out of debt, thanks to the Dish-washer business. In the past three months I have made $600.00 selling Dish-washers. I never saw anything sell so easily. Every family needs a Dish-washer and will buy one when shown how beautifully it will wash and dry the family dishes in two minutes. I sell from my own house. Each Dish-washer sold brings me many orders. The dishes are washed without wetting the hands! That is why ladies want the Dish-washer. I give my experience for the benefit of anyone who may wish to make money easily. I buy my Dish-washers from the Mound City Dish-Washer Co., St. Louis, Mo. Write them for particulars. They will start you in business in your own home.

Harrison, O., July 9, 1903.

ARKANSAS.—Hot Springs, July 4.—We closed our meeting with 64 additions, 30 by baptism, with about 30 to take membership here, the others scattering out among our churches elsewhere. We raised $450 for expenses of meeting, and about $800 in pledges for new building, with the general public uncanvassed. A reform movement came up, and so hot was the fight, that it would not have been best to go outside of the church members at this time. We can raise about $2,000 here in a general canvass. We did not close our option, the brethren who had been asked to serve on a building committee thought we had best purchase a site with a rentable building on it so as to secure the rents to pay interest on back payment, and as it was with the naked lot we had $480 interest to pay yearly, and no income. We will organize the brethren asked to serve on the building committee, and proceed with the work of raising funds. We have a number of good locations in view, and one will be selected as soon as we think advisable. Brother Updike thinks that a Christian home is the great need here, and he will aid the movement every way he can.—T. N. KINCAID.

Newport, July 13.—Two short meetings recently held at Eagle Mills have resulted in a congregation of about 60. Two confessions. Since the organization in April they have not failed to meet on Lord's day. Prospects good for other additions.—JAMES H. BROOKS.

ILLINOIS.—Washburn, July 3.—Harold E. Monser, of Speed, Mo., has just closed a meeting at McLean for the fourth district, with the following results: By letter and statement, 20; reclaimed, 11; from Congregationalist, 19; from Methodists, 12; from Baptists, 13; from United Brethren, one; by primary obedience, 21. An organization was effected, an executive committee selected, a good house rented for a year, preacher employed for full time, and the prospects seem the very best. Truly a great victory has been won and the cause planted where we were heretofore unknown. The field was ripe and we entered at just the right moment.—J. W. KILBORN, Secretary.

INDIANA.—Jeffersonville, July 7.—At my last appointment at Bethel in Clark county, one more confession was taken.—F. E. ANDREWS.

Little Flatrock, July 6.—There were two additions yesterday; one by confession and baptism. The other by statement. I am now in the third year of my second term of service with this church, or well into my sixth year of continued service, having previously served the church three and one half years.—A. B. HOUZE.

Martinsville, July 6.—We had three confessions here yesterday at regular service. The church is making some progress. Our new pipe organ, after being thoroughly adjusted, is now giving excellent satisfaction. We are to have union services for the next six weeks on Sunday evenings.—THEO. J. FREED.

Brazil, July 5.—Two confessions recently, not reported. We shall greatly miss Elder C. M. Shattuck, who has been superintendent of our Sunday-school for so long and who soon goes to Memphis, Tenn., to reside on account of ill health.—E. L. DAY.

INDIAN TERRITORY.—Wagoner, July 7.—All departments of the church are doing nicely. My call here has been filled. During the six months the membership was doubled with ten over. One meeting at Okmulgee with 12 added. Four additions here last Sunday. We have also improved our building and placed pews in at a cost of $225.—J. B. ASKEW.

IOWA.—Centerville, July 8.—Our great union meeting is closed; 896 in all have confessed the Christ. The four churches in the meeting are about equally divided on the increase. The meeting was a great tidal wave to Centerville, the effects of which are still apparent, as many men and women are coming into the kingdom. The revival of the churches is something wonderful. The evangelist, "Billy" Sunday, is certainly a great power, and the evidence is manifest among our people. It was the good fortune of your correspondent to entertain the preacher and his most excellent singer, Mr. Fisher, during the meeting. The secret of Brother Sunday's power is in his earnestness. He is an orator in the truest sense. His preaching the old gospel in its simplicity, his apt and well-fitting illustrations moved the great audience to tears and action. Free will offering the last Lord's day to the evangelist was $1,500; for other purposes, near $700.—C. F. B.

Ames, July 1.—Last Sunday night a young man confessed Christ and to-day obeyed him in baptism. Prof. Adrian M. Newens will fill the Ames pulpit, July 12, during my absence at Denver.—F. D. FERRALL.

KANSAS.—Greensburg, July 7.—Clarence A. Hill and wife closed a very successful 22 days' meeting here, June 25. We had a grand meeting and much good was done for all who attended the services. Thirty-seven were added to the church, 27 of them by primary obedience and 10 by letter or statement. Others will come in later. We are going right to work and see what can be done about building a church. Brother Hill was assisted by Mrs. Hill, and together they can accomplish so much good. Our organization was very small, but after hearing Brother Hill we feel as if we could do so much more than we thought we could. If we could keep such people as Brother and Sister Hill with us we could soon take the town.—E. S. C.

Wichita, July 17.—One accession to church Sunday. Four since last report.—W. T. MC-LAIN.

Hiawatha.—Two baptisms, five by letter, and one withdrawn from in the last two weeks. Church in good condition and prospering.—BAXTER WATERS, pastor.

MICHIGAN.—Saginaw, July 6.—Two confessions yesterday; baptized four; more to follow. Fine day, spiritual services, good audiences.—E. E. C., pastor.

Traverse City, July 9.—Where we used to have 300 people at regular services we now have from five to eight hundred, and now we have rented the opera house on Sunday for all summer. The basket collections pay all expenses of the church and we are trying to spread the gospel in this beautiful city.—T. B. ULLOM, pastor; MR. AND MRS. GUY B. WILLIAMSON, assistants.

MINNESOTA.—Antelope Hills, July 6.—The church here began a meeting May 27 with J. W. Babcock, of Clarion, Ia., as evangelist. Meeting continued 21 days and resulted in 21 additions to the church. All of these were adults: 4 from the Baptists, 4 from the Methodists, 1 from the Lutherans, 1 from the Mormons, 2 by statement and 9 from the world. This was one of the best meetings in the church's history. Brother Babcock is a fluent speaker and preaches the gospel in such a loving, earnest and simple manner that people's sympathies are won without arousing their opposition. He represents a type of evangelism that I can heartily commend to the brotherhood.—GEORGE F. ZIMMERMAN, pastor.

OHIO.—Bellaire, July 6.—Our Children's day offering was about $250. This, with the March offering, made over $600 for foreign missions. We have selected Miss Mary Kelly, of Nankin, China, now at home at Ashland, Ohio, as our living link missionary. Last night we were made glad by seeing 2 promising young men turn to the Lord. We are planning to fresco and recarpet the church this summer. Other improvements are under way now.—SUMNER T. MARTIN.

OKLAHOMA.—Lawton, July 7.—Five additions to the First Church here. More coming. This makes 42 during my ministry at this place.—O. D. MAPLE.

MISSOURI.—Tarkio, July 6.—Three by letter yesterday; 16 have been added since I began work with this church six months ago. A parsonage costing $2,000 has been purchased in the meantime, and about one-half of the amount is paid and the balance provided for in yearly payments.—M. G. E. BENNETT.

Kansas City, July 7.—One confession at Sheffield, July 5. On the 3rd, our second wedding anniversary, the preacher's home was stormed by the church members and friends, who left behind a supply of provisions and a generous cash gift. The work starts off nicely.—G. E. JONES, pastor.

Kirkville, July 9.—Three additions last

Lord's day. Baptismal services last night.—NORTHCUTT AND WAGNER.

Rolla, July 9.—Meeting at Rolla five days old, 9 accessions. Interest growing. We expect a great meeting.—JOSEPH GAYLOR.

Elvins, July 10.—Had one confession and baptism last Lord's day. During the one week Brother Head assisted me, we had 21 additions, 13 prior to that, making in all, 35 additions within the last three months. Brother McDaniel, our new superintendent, and chorister and others of our faithful workers and the pastor have decided to spend our vacation in raising funds to dedicate the church the first Lord's day in September. Remember us in your prayers.—JNO. G. M. LUTTENBERGER.

New Haven, July 8.—Closed a short meeting at Union some time ago, with two added by confession and baptism. Took home mission offering at Villa Ridge fourth Lord's day in June; amount, $10.75. Also took it for same here last Lord's day night and got $7.75. We have our belfry almost completed and a good bell hung. Christian Endeavor has almost doubled in numbers recently.—A. B. JETT, pastor.

Butler, July 6.—Four added since last report, one by baptism. W. H. Waggoner, Eureka, Ill., is to hold a missionary institute, July 27 to August 3. I preach at Passaic, five miles from here, every fourth Sunday afternoon. Some excellent people out there.—E. H. WILLIAMSON.

Warrensburg, July 6.—There were two additions at Lees Summit last night. Also three at Osceola since last report.—KING STARK.

Windsor, July 10.—Closed an eight days' meeting at Moundville, July 6, resulting in 12 additions, 6 by primary obedience. The church wants a preacher for one-fourth time. I begin a meeting at Halltown, July 16.—R. B. HAVENER.

Wellsville, July 11.—One confession at prayer meeting on Wednesday last.—G. F. ASSITER.

St. Louis, July 12.—Two added to-day. Came by letters from the Methodists.—FRANK J. NICHOLS, pastor West End.

Wellsville, July 13.—Six added by letter at Sunday's services. A series of Bible readings on Genesis at prayer meetings is greatly enlarging congregations and creating much interest.—G. F. ASSITER.

TEXAS.—El Paso, July 9.—I began my work last Sunday here under very favorable circumstances. Three additions at morning service. Volney Johnson, my predecessor, has left work in fine condition.—E. M. WAITS.

Suffering and Glory.

Text: "The spirit of Christ . . . testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ and the glories that should follow them."—1 Peter 1:11.

We all shrink from pain and seek for glory, yet the path of glory can only be trodden by bleeding feet. Note how the scriptures always associate these: Luke 24:26; Rom. 8:17, 18; 2 Tim 2:12; Heb. 2:10.

The relation of suffering to glory we may not fully know: some things were hidden from prophets and angels. "We know in part."

We know that pain can be so endured as to purify the heart and strengthen the character. It also gives us sympathetic power with others.

Faith is the potion that strengthens the soul for the endurance of trials, and brings the glory of victory. "If we suffer with him, we shall also be glorified together with him." "The sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed to us-ward."

Carthage, O.

CHAS. M. FILLMORE.

Fellow-Workers With God.

For we are laborers together with God: ye are God's husbandry, ye are God's building.—1 Cor. 3:9.

Thus are we honored beyond all estimate. If the heart of Christian service is too feebly beating, this thought of Paul's is the most effective of stimulants, and will cause it to pulsate with mighty throbbings. In all the scriptures you cannot by most diligent searching discover a greater incentive and inspiration for our labor in the Master's vineyard. The words of the text furnish a lever by means of which we may raise the world of Christian thought and work to any desired height. Such conception of our toiling bounds it on every side by omnipotence, and gives us the advantage of limitless resources of inconceivable wealth.

We are identified with a firm that never fails. Get this conviction of the apostle's, and your task will have a permanency and stability well calculated to entice us to supremest efforts. Repeat the text to yourself day by day and see what music it will mingle with your labors and what mighty hope shall come to your soul. The storms and tempests of our experiences may not be bidden nor commanded into peace or stillness, yet we can assure ourselves and others that no life of faith will be lost. Much of what clung to may be swept away and wrecked, but the thought of the text shall preserve the soul, and we will come safely to the heavenly shore.

Bedford, Ind. E. RICHARD EDWARDS.

Ephesians, chapters 2, 3 and 4.

Paul's program for Christian unity does not demand uniformity. It did not demand uniformity between the circumcision and the uncircumcision in matters of polity and in forms of worship, but declares for one structure made up of distinctly recognized buildings fitly framed together and builded upon the foundation of apostles and prophets, Christ himself being the chief corner stone; and prays for the inward spiritual strengthening of every family in the common faith, and that all these may recognize the need for one body, one spirit, one Lord, one faith, one baptism and one God and Father of all . . . till all come to the unity of the faith, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ.

This was delivered at a union service and created unusual interest on the part of the other pastors present—Baptist, Congregationalist and Methodist.

While admitting the possibility of families in a scriptural unity, a clear-cut plea was made for a practical unity for the sake of the end named in Christ's prayer (John 17), viz., the evangelization of the world.

The following skeleton will suggest the line of thought:

- I. A plea for co-operation.
 1. Because it promises economy in the use of funds.
 2. Because it promises economy in the distribution of our forces.
 3. Because it promises a multiplication of power as we stand against the foe.
 4. Because it is opportune.
 5. Because it will further the end named in Christ's prayer.
- II. A plea for Paul's program.
 1. One body of many members and one Spirit.
 2. One Lord.
 3. One faith.
 4. One baptism.

5. One God and Father of all.

The Congregationalist and Methodist even endorsed the "one baptism" for the sake of the grand consummation of it all—the evangelization of the world.

The Strength of Hope.

Awake, awake; put on thy strength, O Zion; put on thy beautiful garments, O Jerusalem, the holy city; for henceforth there shall no more come into thee the uncircumcised and the unclean.—Isaiah 52:1.

"Strength assumed must be righteously directed. It is not sufficient that the church should fall in with and thus augment public opinion. Its strength of hope should be directed, as a pioneer, to blazing out a path for all that accrues to the physical, mental and moral of the state and individual. It should be the awakener of civic consciousness as well as that of the individual, in connection with all evil law, and law for revenue only, which vitiates the environment of the citizen and stultifies him to the viciousness of the many so-called "public necessities."

WING ORGANS

We make the Wing Organs and sell them ourselves. They go direct from Factory to Home.

We do not employ agents or salesmen. When you buy a Wing Organ, you pay the actual cost of making it and our small wholesale profit. This profit that we charge is very small because of the large number of organs we sell. A single agent or dealer sells very few organs in a year and has to charge a large profit.

You save from $50. to $150.

by buying an organ direct from the factory.

Sent on Trial. We Pay Freight. No Money in Advance.

We will send a Wing Organ to any part of the United States on trial. We pay all freight charges in advance. We deliver the organ to your railroad depot free of expense to you. We do not ask for any advance payment or deposit. You can try the organ right in your home for 20 days, and if not satisfactory to you we will take it back entirely at our expense. You pay us nothing unless you keep the organ. There is absolutely no risk or expense to you.

EASY MONTHLY PAYMENTS. Thirty-four years' experience enables us to guarantee every Wing Organ for twelve years against any defect in tone, action, workmanship, or material. Wing Organs need absolutely no tuning. They have a sweet tone, easy action, very handsome case.

CATALOGUE.—A beautiful catalogue of Wing Organs containing handsome half-tone pictures will be sent free if you write.

America Revisited.

By William Durban.

I recollect that when after my last visit to America I had one evening in London been lecturing on this great country, an American preacher's wife who happened to be present came up to me to express her great pleasure. This lady somewhat surprised me by remarking that what struck her most forcibly was the fresh aspect in which I presented many things American. She had been familiar with them all her life, but had never regarded them from the particular point of view in which an Englishman had noticed them. Perhaps in these letters, which will for a few weeks be written on American soil, I may show certain subjects in a style which would not be adopted by a native.

Our Only New Jersey Church.

When I landed here I found awaiting me some brotherly invitations from several quarters. Such as I could see my way to accept I willingly responded to. Bro. R. P. Shepherd, of East Orange, N. J., kindly asked me to be his guest on commencement day at Columbia University, New York. This is an institution which I have long wished to see, and the opportunity was a very welcome one. I did not know how extra pleasant the occasion was to be. The day which I enjoyed at Columbia I shall not soon forget. I will say something of it in the latter part of this article. First I must speak of Brother Shepherd and his church. We will take the church first and then refer to the pastor.

The Orange district is one of the beauty spots of America. I was charmed with even a cursory view of this corner of New Jersey, and am going back in a week's time to extend my observations. As I preached in the Church of Christ at East Orange, and afterwards talked with a number of the people individually, I gained an idea of the extraordinary brightness and intelligence of the community which Brother Shepherd has gathered about him. Being invited to go again, I expect to have the impression deepened.

A Fine Infant Church.

This Church of Christ is only just over two years old. But what a splendid American baby it is! The East Orange church was organized in Feb. 1901, and moved into its newly built chapel the first Lord's day of the following May. It had at that time a roll of 24 members. Its history is a real ecclesiastical romance. In Nov. 1899, pursuant to a general invitation published in the local papers and in those of the brotherhood, a few Disciples met at the home of Brother E. L. Keland in the city of Newark. This beginning of meetings was obscure enough, but it was destined to lead to a fine development. The front part of a plumber's shop was rented in a location chosen by a committee. On the first Sunday of 1900 a little company of eight men, four women and one child gathered about the Lord's table. From that time the meetings proceeded without any break. Such was the genesis of the cause. The history that followed emphatically proves the advantages of organized missionary cooperation. The brethren early took steps for securing outside assistance. Countless private appeals yielded disappointingly small results; but the American Christian Missionary Society and its Church Extension Society deserve abundant credit, and already have the profound gratitude of the church for their invaluable help and constancy of encouragement and fraternal counsel.

The Value of Home Missions.

I found Brother Shepherd enthusiastic in his praises of the societies which thus help infant churches in their struggles. He seemed to take as much pleasure in reciting to me this remarkable history as I felt in listening. The Church Extension Board purchased a desirable building site for the church, with the proviso that the congregation build thereupon a chapel at a minimum cost of $1,500. This requirement the unorganized church proceeded at once to meet, and it was with happy and expectant hearts that the 24 members who composed the new church welcomed a goodly number of their New York City brethren at the dedication of their modest meeting-place. The offering of $465 taken on the occasion was sent to the A. C. M. S. as a thank offering. Almost at once the mission church seemed to take on new life and to win for itself an abiding place in the social and religious life of the community. The Sunday-school has given us opportunity to reach very many homes, its enrollment of more than 200 representing more than 100 families.

Brother Shepherd tells me that one of the most gratifying features of this church is that from its inception until the present it has been missionary in all its aims and aspirations. During 1902 with a roll of 48 members it gave $450 for missions outside its local interests.

Dr. R. P. Shepherd.

I now return to Columbia University. When I was present at commencement there I saw degrees conferred on 860 students. I have always understood that the best American degree is the Ph. D. of John Hopkins, Chicago, or Columbia Universities. Out of the crowd of successful aspirants for various degrees at Columbia only a few were made Doctors of Philosophy. One of these was our brother of East Orange, Robert Perry Shepherd. I was proud to be present to see him thus honored in company with others of the little group, as also with Jules Jusserand, the French ambassador to the U. S. A., and a few European notabilities of similar fame. Columbia is very sparing of her highest degrees. Brother Shepherd has deeply interested by an account of his career. He is the son of Dr. Shepherd, a physician in large practice at Toledo, O., who has for years been also a devoted preacher amongst us in the central states, where he is well-known by the Disciples. Brother Shepherd is in the early prime of life, being just 35 years of age. He is of splendid build, and boasts happily of his perfect health. I find that his people at East Orange are passionately attached to their accomplished minister. He treated me to a look at the new volume containing his thesis for his doctorate. This is on "Turgot and the Six Edicts," and gives an exhaustive account of the peculiar condition of France just before the Red Revolution. Brother Shepherd began to preach for the mission at East Orange in October, 1900. He was trained at Hiram before prosecuting his studies in the graduate section of Columbia University. He has just had the rare honor of declining an urgent invitation to become president of Hiram. He recalls with pride that some of his best sermons were preached in the plumber-shop chapel to audiences of seven, most of the little group being young people. The membership of the little church has risen to 74. It has a truly enviable prospect for future usefulness and strength. What I wish more particularly to impress on our great brotherhood is that here in New Jersey we have this single solitary church. All around are flourishing cities by scores through which I pass, wondering why we do not in any one of them possess a church or a mission, for Brother Shepherd assures me that in all New Jersey there is no other representation of our principles. I have therefore sadly come to the conclusion that the eastern states resemble England in relation to our cause. In some respects I am comforted, for it certainly is encouraging in a negative point of view to find others situated in a sympathetic attitude with ourselves. The world is one. The vast field is a unit with respect to missionary operations. Old England and New England are in the same category. The states along the American Atlantic seaboard were occupied by the forces of sectism before the work attempted by the new reformers had been thought of. Some day there will be very many Churches of Christ in the beautiful state of New Jersey. The more I see of that section of this magnificent country, the more I delight in its loveliness. But I am astonished to find how little is known of it by the average New Yorker. And I begin to understand why in past years our Churches of Christ in New York left this region just across the Hudson almost ignored. I understand that they now feel more deeply concerned about the splendid field to be exploited.

Amongst New York Baptists.

As I knew that that old friend, F. W. Troy was settled once again in New York, though now as a Baptist minister, I duly called on him for the sake of "auld lang syne." I preached in his beautiful church on Summer Avenue and heard very much of interest from him of religion in America. He is very busy in his great parish, and is certainly broadening the outlook of his people in a marvelous manner. Brother Troy tells me that many of his best people have been for years praying for a minister who would teach the whole church how to look beyond the narrow old scope of American Baptist theology. These people were determined after hearing Troy to have him as pastor, and it is manifest that they intensely admire and deeply love him. I learn from him that the prospect of an alliance and an ultimate union between the Baptists and the Disciples of Christ is every day growing brighter. I have been astonished by reading this week a report in the Brooklyn papers of a sermon by Dr. Henson, the leading Baptist minister of the city, which as severely condemns sectarian divisions as if the preacher were a preacher amongst the Disciples of Christ.

I can see on all hands signs that the work of the Disciples is beginning to tell on the age. We have only to abide by the word of God and we shall triumph with the victories of that word.

Jesus and His Apostles in the Inquiry Room.

some church, and as soon as possible enter upon some active service in that church. There is nothing helps to settle new converts so well as an active life in church work. This does not secure salvation, but it helps to develop Christian character, while at the same time it brings peace; for we are always happy when we are doing the will of the Lord."

Baptist: "I am not quite satisfied with the instructions given to these inquirers. I quite agree with all that has been said with respect to the forgiveness of sins, but, after all, I think we must not ignore the command of Jesus to be baptized. Baptism is certainly in the commission which Christ gave to his apostles. It was also a prominent feature in the practice of the apostles. Now if we are willing to hear what Jesus and his apostles say, then we must insist upon all these converts being baptized, and this I think would help them to realize their saved condition."

Methodist: "I certainly have no objection to their baptism, though I might object to their immersion, and especially if my friend Baptist insists that immersion is the only baptism."

Baptist: "I do not care to discuss the question of the action of baptism at present. I want us to deal faithfully with these inquirers, and I cannot see how we may do this without quoting to them the whole language of Jesus and also the whole practice of the apostles."

Presbyterian: "I am somewhat disheartened. In spite of everything it really seems that we bring all of our discussions at last to some phase of the baptismal question. Why should we trouble these new converts with a matter which is so much in controversy as baptism? Why not let that question alone? It seems to me the text of our evangelist furnishes us a solution of our present apparent difficulty. If we ask we shall receive, if we seek we shall find, if we knock the door will be opened unto us. Now it is evident to me that these converts must receive the assurance of pardon in answer to prayer. And if they will seek this assurance they will find it."

Baptist: "All this looks very well until it is subjected to a true critical test. The language gathered from Jesus was evidently addressed to his own disciples, and it is a stretch of the gospel conditions to make this language applicable to those who are seeking to be his disciples. However, I will not press this point any further. Doubtless it is perfectly proper for these inquirers to pray, but it is equally proper that they should seek and knock. Now it is not stated by what means this seeking and knocking may be done. One thing, however, is very clear, viz.: We are always safe when we are following the commandments of Jesus, and undoubtedly baptism is a command, and therefore these converts ought to obey it. Whether their sins are pardoned before or after baptism is not the important matter. What is important is the act of obedience, for a profession of faith without obedience is not something upon which we can rest our assurance of salvation. I am beginning to see with my friend Christian at least that far."

Episcopalian: "I am glad to hear our friend Presbyterian mention the church. There has been too little said about this in these meetings. Presbyterian says that these converts ought to join some church. I would like to modify his language somewhat. They ought to join the church; and I mean by that the Episcopal Church. There is really only one church, and that is the one which can claim apostolic succession through all the ages of the apostacy."

Congregationalist: "I must protest against discussing the question of church government in a place like this. We are here to deal with their enquiring souls, and they are supposed to have the privilege of joining whatsoever church may suit them after we have dealt with them here. Let us stick to the gospel and the question of salvation and leave all other matters to be adjusted after we have shown these earnest souls the way into the kingdom of God."

At this point the evangelist arose and stated that he hoped no controversial matters would be introduced into the meetings. He felt confident that no good could result from discussing vital differences. He thought the main thing to be accomplished was first the conviction and then the peace of their enquirers. As to the baptismal question he had purposely avoided saying anything about that. A meeting where so many different faiths are represented cannot be successful, if points of controversy were admitted. He begged therefore that all these controversial questions should be dropped, and that the workers should confine themselves wholly to the essential things of the gospel. In his judgment, baptism was not essential to salvation. He was sure that millions of people would be saved who were never baptized at all; and while it had its proper place, and should be attended to by those who felt it to be a duty, he would not insist upon anyone being baptized in order to be saved. At this point Baptist arose and moved that in line of the sermon, usually preached by the evangelist, Christian should be invited to occupy the whole time of the next evening in explaining what he understands to be the teaching of Christ and his apostles with respect to such cases as have been under consideration. This motion elicited some discussion, but as Baptist insisted it should be put to the whole meeting, it was finally carried by a large majority, and the meeting adjourned.

Kola Plant CURES HAY-FEVER AND ASTHMA.

Free. The African Kola Plant is Nature's Positive Cure for Hay-fever and

The Kola Plant. Asthma. Since its recent discovery this remarkable botanical product has come into universal use in the Hospitals of Europe and America as an unfailing specific cure for Hay-Fever and Asthma in every form. Its cures are really marvelous.

Dr. J. K. Bueren, the oldest physician of Crawfordsville, Ind., writes Jan. 29th, I feel it my duty to tell all I can of the great virtue of Himalya. Dr. W. H. Vail, a prominent physician of St. Louis, Mo., writes March 8th, that he used Himalya on six different Hay-fever patients last fall with satisfactory results in every case. Mr. Frederick F. Wyatt, the noted Evangelist of Abilene, Texas, writes Jan. 31st, that Himalya permanently cured him of Hay-Fever and Asthma and strongly recommends it to sufferers. Mrs. M. A. Scott, Crosby, Mich., writes March 6th, that Himalya completely cured her after fifteen years persistent suffering of Hay-fever and Asthma. Mr. Alfred C. Lewis, editor of the Farmers' Magazine, Washington, D. C., was also cured, although he could not be down for fear of choking, being always worse in Hay-fever season. Rev. J. L. Coombs, of Martinsburg, W. Va., wrote to the New York World, July 23d, that Himalya cured him of Asthma of thirty years' standing.

Hundreds of others send similar testimony proving Himalya a truly wonderful remedy. As the Kola Plant is a specific constitutional cure for the disease, Hay-fever sufferers should use it before the season of the attacks when practical, to give it time to act on the system. To prove the power of this new botanical discovery, if you suffer from Hay-fever or Asthma, we will send you one trial case by mail entirely free. It costs you absolutely nothing. Write to-day to The Kola Importing Co., No. 1166 Broadway, New York.

The Mother.

Her life is narrow in its loved routine:
Hers is an old and unamended creed;
No liberal thoughts her stern beliefs between
May find a way to lead to vagrant deed.
Nor any gayer, loosening thread may find
A place in her life's fabric, firm and gray—
And we undisciplined of eager mind,
Shrink from the shadow of her narrow way.

But like a fixed star through the troubled night I see,
Her face serene, and life seems good and real to me.

As Cross as a Bear.

"You're as cross as a bear," said Bess to Billy.

Uncle Jim whistled. "Bears aren't cross to members of their own family," he said. "Now, I knew a bear once—"

Bess and Billy both ran to him and climbed up on his lap.

"Did you really ever know a bear?" cried Billy, with wide-open eyes.

"Well, not intimately," said Uncle Jim, "but I used to go hunting them when I was up in Canada, and one day I was out with a hunting party, and we saw right straight in front of us—what do you suppose?"

"A real bear," gasped the children in concert.

"Yes, a real mother bear and her little son. The dogs started after them, and the mother bear began to run, but the little baby son couldn't run as fast as she did, and the dogs were gaining on him, so what do you suppose the mother bear did? Leave her little son behind? No, sir-ee-ee. She picked the baby bear up on her stout nose and tossed him ahead; then she ran fast and caught up to him and gave him another boost that sent him flying through the air. She kept this up for a mile and a half. Then she was too tired to go any farther, and the dogs surrounded her. Then she sat up on her haunches, took her baby in her hind paws and fought the dogs off with her fore paws. And how she did roar!"

Bess shuddered.

"You could hear her miles away. She never forgot her baby; kept guarding him all the time. When the mother was shot the baby cub jumped on her dead body and tried to fight off the dogs with his little baby paws. That's the way the bears stand by each other. Sometimes I think they love each other better than brothers and sisters. Hey, Bess, what are you crying about? I guess I won't tell you any more bear stories if that is the way it makes you feel."

"Billy," sobbed Bess, "you're as good—as good as a bear!"

Then they all laughed together and forgot what they had been cross about.

RESTORES EYESIGHT.

"Actina," a Marvelous Discovery that Cures All Afflictions of the Eye Without Cutting or Drugging.

There is no need for cutting, drugging or probing the eye for any form of disease. There is no risk or experimenting, as thousands of people have been cured of blindness, failing eyesight, cataracts, granulated lids and other afflictions of the eye through this grand discovery, when eminent oculists termed the cases incurable.

Mrs. A. L. Howe, Tully, N. Y., writes: "Actina removed cataracts from both my eyes. I can read well without glasses. Am 65 years old." Robert Baker, 80 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill., writes: "I should have been blind had I not used 'Actina.' Actina is sent on trial postpaid. If you will send your name and address to the New York & London Electric Association, Dept. 929 Walnut Street, Kansas City, Mo., you will receive free, a valuable book, Prof. Wilson's Treatise on the Eye and on Disease in General, and you can rest assured that your eyesight and hearing will be restored, no matter how many doctors have failed."

Five Lesson Quarterlies.

1. The Beginner's Quarterly, containing a series of lessons for the very little people who have not yet learned to read, arranged along Kindergarten lines. Price 10 cents per copy; per quarter, or in clubs of ten or more, 5 cents each.

2. The Primary Quarterly, containing a preparation of the International Lessons for the Primary Department in the grades above the Beginners. Price, single copy, 5 cents per quarter; five copies or more to one address, 2 cents per copy.

3. The Youth's Quarterly, designed for the Intermediate and younger Junior Classes. In this quarterly there is a new arrangement of the material, which it is believed will make it more acceptable and helpful to pupils and teachers even than it has been in the past. Price 5 cents per copy per quarter; in clubs of ten or more to one address, 2½ cents per copy.

4. The Scholar's Quarterly, prepared for the older Juniors and younger Seniors and members of the Home Department. There is a concise yet very full presentation of the lesson in the way of Analytical, Expository, Illustrative and Applicatory Notes which make teaching easy and study a delight. Price 5 cents per copy per quarter; ten copies, per quarter, in clubs to one address, 40 cents; 25, 90 cents; 50, $1.60; 100, $3.00.

6. The Bible Student, designed for Advanced Students, Teachers, Superintendents and Ministers. Its Exegetical Notes are exhaustive; its Illustrative material full; its Applicatory and Practical sections exceedingly useful and its Suggestions for Teaching of the most helpful kind. Price, single copy per quarter, 10 cents; ten copies, per quarter, in clubs to one address, 70 cents; 25, $1.60; 50, $3.00; 100, $5.50.

Four Weeklies.

1. The Little Ones, for the Little Folks, with Beautiful Colored Pictures in every number. In clubs of not less than five copies, 25 cents a copy per year—6¼ cents per quarter.

2. The Young Evangelist, for the pupils of the Intermediate Department, with bright Pictures, Lessons and Entertaining Stories. In clubs of not less than ten copies to one address, 32 cents per year—8 cents per quarter.

3. The Round Table, for the Boys and Girls who are a little too old for The Young Evangelist, and who have a taste for bright, entertaining stories and practical information. Price, single copy, one year, 50 cents; in clubs of ten or more, 36 cents—9 cents per quarter.

4. Our Young Folks, a large 16-page Illustrated Weekly, nearly four times as large as the ordinary Sunday-school paper, for Sunday-school Teachers, Advanced Pupils, Christian Endeavorers, and in fact for all Working Members of the Christian Church, with a well-sustained department also for the Home Circle, adapted to the wants of the whole family. Single copy, 75 cents per year; in clubs of 10 or more, 50 cents—12½ cents per quarter.

The Little Scholar's Choice.

"Though I were sleepy as a cat,"
The little scholar said,
I would not care to take a nap
In any river's bed.

"And though I were so starved I scarce
Had strength enough to stand,
I'd beg through all the valley ere
I sought a table land.

"But, oh! what jolly times I'd have!
I'd play and never stop,
If I could only take a string
And spin a mountain top."

—Exchange.

The Secret of Success.

One day, in huckleberry time, when little John Flails
And half a dozen other boys were starting with their pails
To gather berries, Johnny's pa, in talking with him, said,
That he could tell him how to pick so he'd come out ahead,
"First find your bush," said Johnny's pa, "and then stick to it till You've picked it clean. Let those go chasing all about who will
In search of better bushes, but it's picking tells, my son—
To look at fifty bushes doesn't count like pick-one."

And Johnny did as he was told; and sure enough, he found.
By sticking to his bush while all the others chased around
In search of better picking, 'twas as his father said;
For, while all the others looked, he worked,
and so came out ahead.
And Johnny recollected this when he became a man;
And first of all he laid him out a well-determined plan;
So, while the brilliant triflers failed with all their brains and push,
Wise steady-going Johnny won by "sticking to his bush."

A Tyranny of Tenderness.

Said a matron of observant habit, "I do not wish to live to be old."

As she was known for a singularly happy woman, loved and cherished by her husband and children, her earnestness surprised me.

"No," she added, "I do not fear to 'outlive my welcome,' as so many aged people appear to have done. I have no fear of the poorhouse. I do not even dread very much the so-called infirmities of age. To my mind nothing is lovelier than length of days gracefully worn, and I mean to wear mine that way. What I do dread is to be regarded as a bit of china and eternally guarded against over-exerting myself."

This woman was right. One of the hardest things the aged have to bear is the idleness which is forced upon them, not by decrepitude, but by the mistaken solicitude of their children.

It is a cruelty they rarely rebel against openly, but it is not less galling because patiently endured.

Because of the sweet motive in which the gentle tyranny is rooted, old people feel powerless to contest against the arbitrary curtailment of their activities.
Yet it is a species of watchful tenderness which amounts in many cases to actual tyranny. "Now, mother, put that right down, you are too old for such work," is the constant cry in some homes, even though "mother" be active and well preserved, and used all her life to activity. Father is expected to subside into a rocking-chair, with his newspaper, just because he has attained to certain years, regardless of his preferences of "stirring about" and managing his own affairs.

Besides the sense of being no longer essential to the family, which such a life brings, the actual physical restraint is irksome. The aged are happiest when employed in congenial and not excessive labor of some sort. It is a positive cruelty to be forever nagging at them to desist from this or that, just because one wishes to guard them from fatigue. After rearing a family and being accustomed to authority and deference, no man or woman relishes constant surveillance, however kindly meant. The thing to do is to make their ways easy by tact and watchfulness—not by admonition.
It is a boon to old people to feel that they are factors in their homes, not alone because of a welcome presence, but for their usefulness. Their independence is dear to them.

Thoughtfulness in others is their right and their delight, but they very humanly resent being trotted after and repressed like children. Infirmary, not measure of years, should limit the activity and freedom of the aged.— Orange Judd Farmer.

With the Children

By J. Breckenridge Ellis

May Speece, Bucklin, Mo., sends these from Spratt and Mencius: "Correct in yourself what you dislike in others." "The great man is he who does not lose his child's heart."

Carl Per Lee, Grand Rapids, Mich.: "I inclose my report for the 2nd quarter, not the 7th. Last quarter you put me down for the 7th instead of the 1st." (I am glad you called my attention to this. I made a mistake between the figures 1 and 7. You know one is the other without a tail.)

Ethel L. Harpole, Nebo, Ill.: "We are enjoying some very warm weather at present and the wind is blowing the dust over everything. I hope Bertha Beesley passed her examination. I send in my cousin's report with mine. I have so many favorite quotations I cannot send them. I have kept the Av. S. rules almost 15 weeks, but have neglected sending my report until now."

J. P. Reed, Hamilton, Ont., Canada: "Please give particulars as to the work of the Av. S. What is its constitution? I am very much interested in children's work." (The Av. S. has no constitution, officers or fees. Anyone becomes a member upon resolving to read 30 lines of poetry and 5 pages of history each week, a Bible-verse each day, and to memorize a quotation from a standard author each week, and to keep an account of work done in a notebook.)

Clarence Per Lee, Grand Rapids: "Inclosed please find my Av. S. report for the 2nd quarter. Before very long I expect to send you a story of the Evening Press newsboys of this city. My brother and I are two of them, so we ought to know a little bit about them." (This story will be awaited with much pleasant anticipation. These are the kind of stories that are worth reading—stories about something that the writer knows from experience.)

I select 3 quotations from those sent by M. J. O'Dell, Lebanon, Mo., which others may wish to learn. They are from Mary G. Cheney, J. G. Holland and Lowell: "Life is kind to us not as it brings us joy, but as it moulds our human nature into the likeness of that which is divine." "The heart given to our Father, the hand given to our brother, the life given to both—this makes life admirable." "Be noble; and the nobleness that lies in other men, sleeping but never dead, will rise in majesty to meet thine own."

Elsie Venner, Trenton, O.: "('Elsie Venner' is my nom de plume.) Do you think of soon taking your great millionaire sleigh-ride? May I sit beside the author of 'The Runaways,' 'Pete' and the 'Red Box Clew?'" (If you sit beside the author of "The Runaways" you will be pretty close to the author of those other things.) "I will be quiet or noisy, just as you say, as I understand you will be in chief command." (I want each one to be himself, unless she's a herself. If its your nature to be quiet, let the others make the noise.) "Why don't you write us another story? I think the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST ought to have another of your good stories for With the Children. Our people say your department is worth the price of the paper. I have read your 'Red Box Clew,' 'Adnah' and 'Holland Wolves.' I like them all. I am an Advancer, and they say I am becoming the Socrates of my set. Well, I'd rather be like Socrates than his wife—what was her name? She was a horrid scold, wasn't she?"

Ruth Sampsel, Warrensburg, Mo.: "I have finished my 4th quarter and will send in my report, also mamma's. I have a pet field-mouse. I caught it in a log." (I know Felix would like to visit it.) "The last day of school two girls who had finished school came over to turn the school down." (They must have thought themselves mighty strong, just because they had graduated.) "I ciphered one down and my classmate ciphered the other one down. I have finished Dickens' 'History of England,' and will read the history of the books of the Bible. Our Evangelist is out." (Better bring it in, it is liable to rain at any time.)

Melvin Ledden, Ospur, Ill.: "Two classes from our Sunday-school went for a picnic to the woods a few days ago. We went on a hay-wagon; there were 30 of us. We fished, played ball, and a few other games." (Flinch?) "I caught a fish about 2 inches long; of course we were not loaded down with fish. We ate dinner directly after we got there." (Yes, indeed; who wants to see fat lunch-baskets sitting around, while a fellow pretends to be interested in a game of ball?) "For supper we had ice cream and cake. One girl ate almost a quart can of beans. We started home at half-past six and got there about ten. We drove into town just as the band was playing. We drove through Main street and gave the town-yell and sang a few songs. There were 30 of us on the wagon." (Which shows that the girl who ate the beans did not succumb.) "Some one threw a lot of rice after us." (Saw the preacher and the beans-girl, who by this time must have grown quiet and thoughtful, and imagined a wedding, perhaps.) "Well, I am sorry I didn't get 'Adnah.' But I hope to get one of the other prizes. I hope there will be a great many Av. S. members at the World's Fair with their badges and pins."

Harriet E. Dunn, Malta Bend, Mo.: "I have been keeping the Av. S. rules. but the lightning struck our house and we have been so busy ever since, I have not found time." (I do not see how an accident like that could be very well avoided.) "May Speece, I have read both 'Ishmael' and 'Self-Raised;' I like them ever so much. Pitpaw had a kitten in April, just the color of herself, black and white. It is just as fat as it can be. Pitpaw brings it lots of mice, and once she gave it a young ground-squirrel. The kitten's name is Fuzz. She is fuzzy and playful. I wonder how the other Pitpaw is getting along." (I don't understand; what other Pitpaw was there? Isn't there just Mrs. Pitpaw and Fuzz in the family?) "I hate to practice my music, too; Grace Collins, Nellie Speece and I will have to devise a scheme to get our lessons for us. One night we went to bed I asked mamma how the Lapps of the North are governed. Brother thought I meant the laps in the wall paper, and he said, 'I know how to manage them, you cut one edge off.' Mamma and I laughed till we were tired, at the idea of governing the Lapps by cutting off one edge! Jessie Underwood, please tell us about those shakes for fear Tom G. comes all the way to your house to find out."

Opinions of the Christian-Evangelist B. & O. S=W

"The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is a delight to the eye, a refreshment to the mind, and a solace to the heart. Its hospitable attitude toward current religious questions is to be commended as in keeping with the spirit of our times." ALLAN B. PHILPUTT.

Indianapolis, Ind.

"It is a great paper and has a noble past. It is both conservative and progressive. It champions our cause without betraying it, and is sound without being small. There is no better, sweeter, healthier religious journal published to-day than the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST." J. W. ALLEN.

Spokane, Wash.

"Its editorial writing is constructive and positive. I think the paper is conservatively progressive. It holds to the fundamentals with a commendable tenacity. It is encouragingly progressive in plans and methods. I like its temper. It is not easily provoked and does not behave itself unseemly. Mechanically it is a thing of beauty."

Collinwood, O. C. A. FREER.

"I am so pleased and profited by the sweetness and light of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Loyalty to essential truths, liberty in methods and opinions, love to all men who love our Lord—this is the platform of Peter and Paul, and of the Church portrayed on the pages of the New Testament, and it must be the spirit and platform of any person or paper who is to please God or serve widely this day and generation." SUMNER T. MARTIN.

Bellaire, O.

"Ever safe in its plea for a return to New Testament Christianity; loyal to the Christ in urging the church to carry out his marching orders to evangelize the whole world; placing special emphasis upon those things which pertain to culture in all holy things, it is a paper that the reader would never be ashamed to hand to another, thus sending it forth as a sweet evangel to bless, comfort and strengthen other hearts." W. J. RUSSELL.

Pittsburg, Pa.

"It is modern and up-to-date in its make-up and I am not ashamed to show it to any of my friends. It is not given to bickering and strife. It is alive and spirited, and deals with affairs about which people are talking to-day rather than things about which people were talking fifty years ago. It is newsy enough without being gossipy; it is literary enough without being stilted; and it is learned enough without being pedantic."

BURRIS A. JENKINS,
Pres. Kentucky University.
Lexington, Ky.

"For several years the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has stood at the forefront of our movement, nobly leading and inspiring our people in their plea for the restoration of New Testament Christianity. Ever loyal to the Living Head of the Church, yet recognizing the liberty of every Disciple of the one Master, it has been largely instrumental in saving our people from degenerating into a sect as have so many others who began by pleading for a purer form of Christian faith and life."

W. F. RICHARDSON.

Kansas City, Mo.

"It gives me great pleasure heartily and thoroughly to indorse the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Its worthy purpose, its pure and gentle spirit, its elevated ideals, its supreme devotion to spiritual interests, its progressive and helpful thoughts, and its intelligent and dignified, yet loving and tender method of treating opponents command my most ardent admiration. I pledge you that whatever influence I may have, shall be used to promote its circulation."

J. W. LANHAM.

What We Stand For.

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

The Expert Cleaner.

There are a score of things about the house that you will not undertake to clean. You fear that they would be ruined by soap and you intend to send them to an expert cleaner, an idea that comes down from a time before pure soap was made. The manufacturers of Ivory Soap are constantly asked if they know how beautifully this or that material can be cleaned with Ivory Soap. The uses of Ivory Soap are too numerous to be told; with it anything may be cleaned that will stand the application of water. You can be your own expert cleaner.

Current Events

The fiscal year for the United States Treasury closed June 30, at which time the books were balanced and a statement of the government's financial condition was published. In spite of the efforts that were made to reduce the surplus by removing the war taxes and in spite of the increase in appropriations, it appears that the government's business for the past year has been conducted at a net profit of a little more than a million dollars a week; or to be exact, $52,710,935.52. The government's total receipts during the past year have averaged about $2,000,000 a day. The work of collecting and dispersing such enormous sums is one of the biggest business propositions that the world has ever seen. A glance at the figures is enough to confirm the conviction that a business of such stupendous proportions ought to be managed by the ablest and best men and that all employees should be chosen with strict regard to fitness. The bigger a business is, the more necessary it becomes to conduct it on strictly business principles, and when the billion dollar stage is reached there is need of the most vigorous application of these principles. To allow political considerations to outweigh considerations of good business policy is, in the long run, and very often in the short run, equivalent to plundering the public treasury. One of the prime needs of the present time is for a more general recognition, both in and out of official circles, of the fact that the government's financial operations are strictly business, and that the stockholders in this vast company, that is the tax-payers, have a right to expect the same sort of careful and economical management that would be required in a corporation organized for pecuniary profit alone.

The existence of this large surplus raises some interesting questions. The first is whether a large surplus is really desirable? Of course it is more desirable than a deficit because it may more easily be gotten rid of. The existence of this surplus keeps the government's credit at a high point and enables it to borrow money at a lower rate than any other government or corporation in the world. Even when the government does not need to borrow money this is an advantage, for it gives it a certain prestige among the powers. On the other hand a large surplus indicates too high a rate of taxation. The government is a business corporation, but the citizens are its patrons as well as its stockholders. When this corporation lays up great sums in the form of undivided profits, it means that the money of the patrons is being taken in unnecessarily large amounts and laid up to the credit of the stockholders. In the ordinary corporation this is precisely what the stockholders want, but when the stockholders and the patrons are the same person it is clear that there is no real gain in the process when carried beyond certain necessary limits. All the surplus that the government needs is enough to keep its credit good and to give it a working balance for its ordinary business. Beyond that the government has no more occasion to accumulate profit than a missionary society.

It is reported from St. Petersburg that the Russian government has positively and emphatically declined to receive the petition which was to be sent through our state department touching the recent massacres at Kishineff. Formal inquiry was made at the Russian foreign office and the reply was equally formal and official. This will probably put an end to President Roosevelt's plan of forwarding the protest of the American Hebrews. His main purpose, however, has been accomplished. The whole world has been advised of the attitude of our government in the matter, and nothing would be added to the moral effect of President Roosevelt's action by carrying the matter still farther and insisting upon delivering a message which Russia has already declined to receive. This would only be going out of our way to invite humiliation and to administer to Russia a wholly unprofitable rebuke. Since the massacres, Russia's attitude has, on the whole, been admirable. Feeling, doubtless, the stimulus of public sentiment in the United States, Great Britain and elsewhere, she has taken prompt steps to punish those responsible for the massacre. Already there have been 800 arrests, 350 persons have been held for trial, 400 have been referred to the court of appeals and 53 have been indicted for man-slaughter. This is a decidedly good showing as compared with the measures usually adopted for the punishment of outbreaks of mob-violence in this country. One can easily imagine that the Russian papers might find material for interesting comment in the recent Evansville riot. And it is not in evidence that the zeal of the authorities to punish the instigators of that disgraceful outbreak has been at all in excess of that shown by the Russian government in punishing the anti-Jewish rioters at Kishineff. In recognition of this it will seem to be only fair for our government to let the matter drop since it has already registered its disapproval of the act and has shown its willingness to do anything in its power toward securing a redress of the grievances of the Kishineff Jews.

The open door policy in the far east has scored another triumph in the agreement of China and Russia to open a number of Manchurian ports to the world's trade in the near future. This decision which is as yet only unofficially announced, comes as the result of a series of very dextrous diplomatic maneuvers by Secretary Hay who has shown a splendid combination of firmness and subtlety in combating Russia's efforts to monopolize the trade of that region. These negotiations have extended over a period of several months. Until very recently Russia would concede nothing further than a vague assurance that she would not oppose the opening of Manchuria's ports after the evacuation of Manchuria by the Russian troops. But, as there was good ground for fearing that this event would be indefinitely postponed until Russia could find some excuse for a permanent occupation, the assurance was of little value. The concession that has now been made is more definite and valuable. It is said that exclusive rights for American trade could easily have been obtained, but Secretary Hay wisely preferred to stand by the principles which he has consistently urged from the beginning, viz: equal privilege for the commerce of all nations.

The special session of the Colombian congress which convened June 20, has busied itself chiefly with the consideration of the Panama Canal treaty between Colombia and the United States, and with such minor matters as are incidental and accessory to that main topic. Before the season opened it was generally considered that the preponderance of sentiment was against the ratification of the treaty, though the president was hearty and outspoken in his advocacy of it. Such reports as have come since the congress met indicate an increasing appreciation of the arguments for ratification. There are two principal objections to the treaty from the Colombian standpoint. The one which is most vociferously and repeatedly stated is the objection to surrendering their sovereignty over any portion of Colombian territory. This is a good point of departure for a stirring appeal to the populace, but it is scarcely ingenuous, for the treaty involves no transfer of sovereignty of the territory in question, but only the exercise of police power by the United States for the protection of the canal. The second objection, which is probably more potent with the politicians, though it lends itself less readily to eloquent appeal, lies in the hope that, if the treaty can be staved off until the concession to the Panama company expires, the government can get not only the $10,000,000 which has already been promised by the United States, but also the $40,000,000 which is to be paid to the Panama company. The Colombians generally claim that the old Panama concession expires next year and that the entire property of the company will revert to the government at that time. The company claims an extension of about eight years, and if the matter is not put beyond controversy by the ratification of this treaty with the United States there will be some spirited litigation on this point. The chief hope for ratification lies in the option on the Nicaragua route which is open. The Panama provinces of Colombia are in a chronic state of insipient or overt rebellion and the ratification of the treaty by which the United States agrees to recognize and support Colombia's sovereignty would be a distinct blow to the revolutionists. Some of the most thoughtful men of Colombia believe that it would be well worth while to adopt the treaty for this reason alone.

Is a Surplus Desirable?

Just fifty years ago, on July 14, 1853, Commodore Matthew Perry presented to the Emperor of Japan a letter from President Fillmore making overtures for a commercial treaty between Japan and the United States. At that time Japan was as much a hermit nation as Thibet is today. She had no foreign commerce, no diplomatic or consular representatives abroad, no ports open to foreigners for either trade or residence, and at every point turned her back inhospitably upon foreign ideas and modern improvements. President Fillmore's letter was the entering wedge. It led to a commercial treaty in the following year, and in 1860 Japan began to have diplomatic relations with the European powers. Since that time the awakening of this wonderful little nation has afforded a constant series of surprises. Such has been their willingness to learn and such their adaptability to all sorts of conditions that, within this short period of half a century, the nation has sprung from medieval barbarism into a prominent place among the civilized nations of the world. Never before has such a transformation been effected in so short a time. Even the old religion, which is always the most potent of the conservative forces at such a time, is giving way, and it is for the Christian world to see that Japan is brought from superstition to true religion, instead of falling into infidelity in this critical transition period. If this point can be guarded, the future of Japan as one of the world's great nations and as the dominant influence in the Orient is assured.

During the past year the government experts at Washington have been making some interesting investigations in regard to the effects of adulterated foods. Especial interest was aroused by the borax tests in which two groups of men in identical physical conditions, so far as could be determined, were fed for several months on exactly the same food except that the food of one squad contained a certain amount of borax. The results of this diet were carefully noted and will form the basis for some definite knowledge of the effects of borax as a food adulterant. Other substances which are used in adulteration of food are being studied in a similar way. The outcome is expected to be a body of demonstrated scientific conclusions upon which rational pure-food legislation can be based. The diverted theories about alum and the diverse legislation on the subject in the various states furnish a good illustration of the need of such investigation. Both the lovers and the haters of tobacco will be interested to know that Prof. Wiley, who has had charge of these pure-food tests, is preparing to conduct a similar series of tests regarding the effects of the use of tobacco in different forms. The eighteen men upon whom the tests are to be made will be divided into three squads—smokers, chewers and snuffers. The amount and quality of tobacco given to each man will be carefully regulated and the facts in regard to each man's digestion, heart action, lung power, etc., will be carefully recorded from day to day. The allowance will be increased or the quality changed from time to time so that the effects of different sorts of tobacco in all qualities may be recorded. The result of this investigation will be watched with interest. So far as we know it is the first time the effects of tobacco have ever been scientifically studied under rigid laboratory conditions.

The annual convention of the National Educational Association was held in Boston, July 6-10. President Eliot of Harvard, was chairman of the convention and the program was very largely prepared by him. One of the most interesting addresses was that of Dr. W. T. Harris, United States Commissioner of Education, who spoke of the essential difference between religious and secular education and defended the public schools for confining themselves to the latter. He did not discuss the question of the Bible in the public schools.

The Kentucky Republican convention, after a threatened stampede in favor of former Governor Bradley, nominated Morris B. Belknap for governor.

Russia is having her share of troubles. The interference of the United States in the Kishineff matter and the pestiferous interest shown by Japan in her actions in Manchuria are not inclined to soothe "the bear."

From the World's Fair statuary shops at Weehawken, N. J., three of the statues representative of the states have been received. They are: "Missouri," by Sterling Calder; "Kansas," by A. A. Weinmann; and "Colorado," by A. Zellar. Great progress is now being made at the grounds.

Several concerns engaged in the manufacture of bank, bar, and office fixtures in St. Louis have united in a suit to enjoin the Carpenters' and Joiners' Union from interfering with the conduct of their business and also asking damages resulting from broken contracts made with the union. The outcome will be watched with interest.

On the tenth day after the death of Pope Leo XIII, the conclave of cardinals will elect his successor. The cardinals are of three orders—bishops, priests and deacons—and there are, as a rule, six bishops, fifty priests and fourteen deacons. The custom of locking up the cardinals cum clave, from which the conclave gets its name, dates from the long-contested election of Gregory X, and became law by a bull of that pope after his election to the papacy in 1270.

The latest railroad statistics, compiled by the Interstate Commerce Commission, show the total mileage in this country to be 202,471. The railroads give employment to over a million persons who, with their families, constitute eight per cent of the total population. The amount paid in salaries and wages in one year is $676,028,592, to which should be added a considerable part of the amount spent for materials and supplies which goes for wages in the manufacturing establishments.

Further Needs in the Way of Organization.

We should say at once that our chief need now is not in the direction of expansion of organization, but in the way of strengthening and making more efficient the organization we already have. We have already seen that the number and kind of organizations to be employed in Christian work are to be determined by the real needs of that work. That is only saying that the life which is seeking to express itself and to communicate itself to the world, should have adequate means and methods of doing so. This principle should govern us in determining the kind of men also to be selected to hold official positions and bear official responsibility in the church, both in local and general organizations.

Let us begin with the local congregation. Our present theory of local government through officers known as elders and deacons, is as nearly conformed to New Testament precedent as is possible with our present knowledge. But there remains much to be done in bringing the standard of these officers up to the New Testament ideal. We have too often been content to have men called elders and deacons without being such in reality. We are aware that it is not always practicable to secure ideal men for positions in the Church any more than in the State, but there should be a constant effort to secure men for such positions who possess in a good degree the requisite qualifications. We say a good deal about an educated ministry, and not any too much, but we do not generally include in such statements the education of men for the eldership and for the diaconate. But why not? Does not our whole history teach us the need of well-informed, well-developed and spiritually-trained men in these official positions? We predict that in the future men who serve as elders and deacons in our churches will be very largely composed of graduates from our colleges who have taken, not only the academic course, but a course in Bible study as well. This is an ideal toward which we should strive. How often have our churches suffered disgrace in the eyes of the community by being under the control of narrow-minded, ignorant men who have never enjoyed the liberalizing influence of education and whose minds and hearts have never been disciplined by a proper knowledge of the word of God. It is a noticeable fact that most of our church troubles arise in congregations having uneducated and incompetent men in their official boards. The offices of elder and deacon need to be greatly dignified among us, and this can only be done by keeping out of such positions men who are wholly incompetent to fill them worthily.

It ought to be an honorable ambition on the part of any man in the church, no matter what his station in life, to aspire to be worthy of a place in the eldership or diaconate of the church. "If a man seeketh the office of a bishop (or elder) he desireth a good work." The same is true of the office of a deacon. They are both to be thought of as "a good work." That is what the word office means. It is a work. Only men of blameless lives, of religious zeal, and a good degree of intelligence, are competent for either of these positions. This is especially true of elders, who are expected to be "apt to teach," capable of instructing the church in the things of the kingdom of God. But the deacons also are expected to be men "full of the Holy Spirit" and capable of developing into preachers of the Word.

We have said nothing hitherto about deaconesses, but we believe they are needed in a complete organization of the local church. There are some duties to be performed, some work to be done, that consecrated women can do better than men, and as our churches are usually made up more largely of women than men, they should be represented in the officiating of the church. They should be selected, too, because of their experience, Christian character, intelligence and general fitness for the work they are expected to do. Many of our churches have deaconesses, and in our city churches particularly, they often have important functions to perform in connection with the administration of the poor fund, as well as in contributing their good taste and tact to the general welfare of the congregation.

We are coming to attach greater importance continually to the Sunday or Bible-school feature of the church work. It is no longer thought that anybody can superintend a Sunday-school or teach a class. Special care should be taken in selecting a man of devout character, well-instructed in the Bible, and of good administrative ability, to superintend the Sunday-school. Special effort should be made to train teachers for their work. How can one teach unless he be first taught? A well-conducted Sunday-school is the best possible evangelistic agency among the children, and it is about the only opportunity for systematic Bible instruction among the adult members of the church which the church offers.

In the actual training of the young people for Christian service another organization has been found very helpful, and every well organized church to-day has its Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, or something that answers the same purpose. This organization is an excellent field for the development of the spiritual life and talents of the younger members, and especially to train them in various forms of actual Christian service. It is entitled to the sympathy, co-operation and wise supervision of the officers and older members of the church.

Of course every working, efficient church has its various committees to look after various interests, but only such committees should be appointed as have an actual work to do, and they should be expected to do it. Nominal committees, or merely nominal officers of any kind, are to be avoided. Everything should be real and vital in church life.

Every well managed church has its regular monthly meetings of its officers, with reports from all departments of the church work, and thus keeps up its finances and looks after the spiritual welfare of its members. These monthly meetings afford opportunity among the leaders of the church to take counsel together about everything that relates to the material and spiritual welfare of the church.

We have some things to say about the preacher of the congregation, usually known as pastor, which we defer for a future article.

Feeling Their Way Toward Union.

We have been watching with interest for some time the outcome of a conference of representatives of Congregationalists, Methodist Protestants and United Brethren, looking to union. The first meeting was at Pittsburg, and in that conference representatives of the Christian Connection met with the representatives of the churches mentioned, but withdrew. The others appointed a committee to formulate the details of a plan they had agreed upon, and to report to the full committee. This sub-committee met in Washington in the latter part of May and agreed upon a report to the full committee, which was called to meet July 1, 1903. This full committee adopted a report which they now recommend to the general bodies which they respectively represent.

The plan of union, briefly stated, is the endorsement of the formulated statements of doctrine, as held by each of these bodies, by all the others; that each of the bodies is to retain its present name and autonomy in all local affairs, but they are to add to their official title the words "in affiliation with the General Council of United Churches." It is recommended that these bodies authorize the creation of a General Council, composed of representatives elected from their respective bodies on the basis of one representative for every 5,000 members. The powers of the General Council shall be advisory, and any recommendation it may make shall be referred to the constituent bodies for approval. A committee of three from each of the general bodies represented shall be appointed to arrange for the time and place of the first meeting of the General Council. This General Council is to determine its own officers and the manner of permanent organization. The purposes of the General Council are said to be the following:

(1) To present, so far as we possibly can, a realization of that unity which seems so greatly desired by Christian churches.

(2) To promote a better knowledge and a closer fellowship among the Christian bodies thus uniting.

(3) To secure the co-ordination and unification of the three bodies in evangelistic, educational and missionary work.

(4) To adopt a plan by which the three bodies may be brought into co-ordinate activity and organic unity, a unity representing some form of connectionalism.

(5) To prevent the unnecessary multiplication of churches; to unite weak churches of the same neighborhood wherever it is practicable, and to invite and encourage the affiliation with this council of other Christian bodies cherishing a kindred faith and purpose.

It is seen, from the foregoing, that the coalition thus formed is not regarded as a perfect union, but as an important step in that direction. In the Letter to the Churches, which the joint committee has prepared, the committee says that "doctrinal differences did not appear;" that "with respect to forms of church organization and methods of work there are diversities, and for the removal or adjustment of these, time and patience will be needed." The committee expresses its belief that "it is possible for the three denominations to form, at an early day, not merely a goodly fellowship, but a compact union, by means of which unnecessary divisions and frictions may be avoided and force economized in the common work of the kingdom." The letter further recommends that the missionary and educational boards of the three denominations should as soon as possible, form a working agreement by which they may be co-ordinated in service and ultimately united. It earnestly urges that at their next regular meeting these three denominations carefully consider and act upon the suggestions of this report, and that meanwhile it be carefully and prayerfully studied by all interested.

This is a very significant step as indicative of the spirit of unity that is abroad among the churches. We hail it with rejoicing, not as a final consummation, but as the promise and prophecy of better things to come. Let us who have been set especially for the plea of Christian union, see to it that we are ready to meet overtures to union in the spirit of our Lord's prayer for the oneness of his disciples, while we seek, at the same time, to still foster the spirit of unity that is manifesting itself in so many ways throughout the church universal. We especially commend that feature of this report which indicates a willingness on the part of the representatives of each of the bodies concerned to accept even a partial union, where a perfect one cannot be obtained, and where the partial one looks directly to a completer unity. It is only in this spirit that we are ultimately to reach the fulfillment of the New Testament ideal of unity.

Union of Baptists and Disciples of Christ.

The recent correspondence between Brother Harlan and Dr. P. S. Henson, of Brooklyn, N. Y., and the conversation between Dr. Gessler and Brother Durban at Lake Hopatcong, as reported by the latter in last week's CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, serve to bring up again the subject of the union of the two great branches of the family of immersionists—Baptists and Disciples of Christ. The subject has often been discussed in the past, but the work of unification has been going on through all these years. The asperities of the past are becoming outgrown and forgotten, and the irenic spirit in the two bodies has been growing, so that there is no doubt greater unity of sentiment and of feeling between them to-day than at any previous time. It may be too early yet to expect a consummation which the best men in both bodies have desired for many years, but it can certainly do no harm and may help to hasten the desired end, to consider once more the reasons which make such union both desirable and feasible.

We take it that the time is past when it is necessary to argue the desirability of Christian unity. Christian people generally have come to see the evils of sectarianism and of schisms in the body of Christ. The prayer of our Lord that His disciples might be one in Him as He and the Father are one, remains to be fulfilled in its highest and best meaning. We all rejoice in the growing unity among the followers of our common Lord and Master, but we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that there yet remains much to be desired before we can rejoice in a united church. It is a reasonable expectation, too, that this closer union should first manifest itself between those religious bodies which are nearest together in faith and practice. There seems to be no good reason why the different branches of the Methodist and Presbyterian churches, for instance, should not recognize their essential unity, and fraternize and co-operate as brethren. The same thing is true in reference to the great Baptist family, or those who practice immersion and hold to a regenerated church membership. If it be true, as Dr. Gessler states, that "the Baptists are steadily gravitating toward the position held by the Disciples on certain points, while there is a similar tendency on the part of the latter to smooth certain harsh angularities, not so much of opinion as of the uncompromising expression of them," it is plainly but a question of time when they will "gravitate" toward the common center, Christ Jesus our Lord, and recognize their union in Him.

We think it truer to the facts to say that both Baptists and Disciples have been steadily approaching the New Testament ideal of the Church, and are increasingly manifesting the spirit of catholicity which characterized the church in its beginnings, and which was characteristic of Christ Himself. Holding, as they do, that Christ is the Head of the Church, which is His body, and that the New Testament is the only rule of faith and practice for Christians, it is inevitable that they should grow more like each other as they each grow more like their common ideal. There is absolutely no path of progress for the two religious peoples but that which leads to inevitable union and co-operation. The only thing that can prevent such a consummation is the crystallization of one or both into a sect, whose opinions shall harden into an adamant creed, preventing all future growth. This is hardly possible in this age of the world.

When we compare the things held in common by Baptists, and those who call themselves Christians or Disciples of Christ, it is a matter of surprise that they have remained so long separate. The great fundamentals of Christian faith they hold in common with the rest of the evangelical religious world. In addition, they agree in standing for the sufficiency of the Word of God without any other authoritative rule of faith and practice; for faith in Christ as the all-sufficient creed of the New Testament; for a regenerated church membership; for the New Testament baptism which is a symbolic representation of Christ's burial and resurrection, and of the believer's death to sin and his resurrection to newness of life; for the necessity of living a godly and pious life, for congregational autonomy, or the independence of the local church; for co-operation of local churches in missionary, educational and benevolent enterprises; for liberty of conscience and freedom of thought within the limits of Christian liberty; for the everlasting difference in destiny between the ultimately righteous and the ultimately wicked; for the resurrection of the dead and the life everlasting. Surely here is a broad basis on which to unite, and to work and worship together in the bonds of Christian fellowship. Suppose there are minor points upon which we disagree; is not that true within the limits of each of the two bodies? Do we not find it necessary to allow liberty for differences of opinion among ourselves, even as we are? Are not the differences just as great between members of each of the two bodies, as between the two bodies themselves? Why, then, should we make differences of opinion insuperable barriers to our mutual fellowship in Christ?

Of course the old debaters on both sides may wish to run out the propositions they have discussed, and seek to make out of them a basis of union or barriers of separation. But no such union ever existed, nor did Christ ever pray for any such. The early Church was united by a personal faith in, and allegiance to a common Lord. Its passionate love for Him broke down all racial, social or intellectual differences, and made them one. Both Baptists and Disciples, in the past, have unduly magnified their differences and have not laid sufficient stress upon the great matters they hold in common. It is time for a reversal of this policy.

We rejoice at the signs of union in the east. The first practical steps toward the merging of the two bodies into one are likely to be taken there, where there is less prejudice between the two bodies than exists in the south and west. It must begin somewhere and win its way gradually among the churches. It is not likely to be consummated by a single stroke, among religious peoples who recognize the independence of the local churches. It will be certain to meet with opposition in some quarters, but if it be God's will, it will overcome all opposition and ultimately prevail. May the spirit of God, who dwells evermore in His Church, guide the followers of Christ into that unity for which He prayed under the deepening shadows of the cross!

Macatawa Musings.

The religious life of Macatawa Park has now been fully resumed for the season. The established services here, as the old resorters know, are as follows: Sunday-school at 3 P. M., preaching at 4, and the beach meeting at "early candle lighting." The forenoon is given to rest, reading and meditation, by the religiously disposed who do not care to go to Holland to attend religious services. There are some who are prompt in church attendance at home who feel at liberty to remain away from religious services at a summer resort. But as a rule those faithful at home are faithful away from home. God is no respecter of places any more than of persons. It was a good audience that assembled in the auditorium on the hill at preaching service last Lord's day afternoon. Bro. H. S. Earl preached a good sermon, the main thought of which was so simple and fundamental, that we are in danger of overlooking it, namely, that the Christian life consists in following Christ; in being Christlike. It is not the length of our creeds nor the breadth of our phylacteries, that makes us acceptable to God, but the degree in which we embody in our lives and character the disposition, temper and spirit of Christ.

The meeting down at the beach, amid the music of the murmuring waves, was much more largely attended, as is usually the case, than the preaching at the auditorium. President R. E. Hieronymus of Eureka College, conducted this meeting, although it was his first attendance, we believe, at this unique service. He made a very admirable talk. He said the scene before us would naturally call to mind those scenes in the life of our Lord in which He gathered His disciples about the shores of the sea of Galilee and taught them His wonderful lessons. But when He had called His disciples to Him and had taught them, filling them with His great message of truth and life, He bade them go and tell others what they had learned from Him. This, He declared to be the duty of all of us—to communicate to others whatever measure of light and life we have received through Christ. We always love to hear President Hieronymus speak. There is a note of sincerity, of reality and of power in what he says, that indicates an anointing from above. Several others spoke, and many of the old songs were sung, the music being led by Evangelist Bennett, who brought his little organ down upon the sand to mingle its notes with those of the multitudinous waves and with the voices of the people in praising God. It was one of those beach meetings, the memory and the impressions of which will long linger in the minds of those who were present.

Among the visitors at Macatawa Park during the past week was Bro. T. D. Butler, of Healdsburg, Calif., who is visiting his son at Grand Rapids, and who ran down to visit friends here at the Park for a day. Though in his sixty-fifth year he seems to be in the prime of a vigorous manhood. We had much talk with him concerning the progress of the cause on the Pacific Coast and concerning the current agitation over the Berkeley Bible Seminary brought about by injudicious newspaper criticism. He speaks in enthusiastic terms of the work Prof. VanKirk is doing at Berkeley, the hold he is getting on the University of California, and the wholesome influence he is exerting in the state, and regrets exceedingly the prejudice that has been excited against him and the Bible Seminary, by adverse newspaper criticism, and against the protests of those who are officially charged with the management of the institution, as well as against the moral sentiment of the leading brethren of the state. But we doubt if any permanent injury will come to the Seminary, or to the cause in that state, from any unjust criticism. Our experience and observation have both taught us that unjust criticism recoils upon itself, sooner or later, and that "truth crushed to earth will rise again." The Psalmist of Israel noticed the same fact, and one of them sang:

"Commit thy way unto Jehovah;
Trust also in him, and he will bring it to pass,
And he will make thy righteousness to go forth as the light.
And thy justice as the noonday."

This is the early morning of the Lord's day. The other members of the household are yet in the bonds of peaceful slumber. The sound of hammers, saws, etc., which have resounded during the past week, while "Edgewood-on-the-lake" has been undergoing through repairs at the hands of carpenters, painters, stone-masons and plumbers, are silent this holy morning. Only the lake itself is lifting up its voice in audible tones in praise of its great Creator. It is good to be here, alone with God, in what the carpenters call "the little chapel." This designation they have given to our study and office building, setting back in rear of the cottage, is not inappropriate. It is certainly "a subordinate place of worship," as Webster defines a chapel to be. But it is a place of private, not of public worship. Every home should have its chapel—its quiet chamber where one may resort to commune with God. This morning is propitious of a glorious day. May all the places of public worship be crowded to-day with those who are hungering and thirsting after righteousness! May those who preach, "preach the word" in the power of the Holy Spirit—the only power that can convict of sin, comfort and edify! And may the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, abide with all who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, this day, everywhere!

Edgewood-on-the lake, July 19.

Notes and Comments.

Rev. Cyrus Townsend Brady has been studying the theater at close range during the past winter. He had heard it stated that the theater had taken the place, or might well take the place, of the church as the teaching force of the community, and he concluded to sample it. Mr. Brady appears to have made an unbiased study of the modern theater at its best, and his verdict is not favorable to the theater. He witnessed eleven plays. He says: "In every one of the eleven plays there were liars, scoundrels, adventuresses who did not all come to grief. On the contrary!—and divorces were as numerous as they are in high society. . . . Taking all the above into account after a careful consideration of the eleven, and striving not to be prudish, I affirm that the effect of them generally speaking was bad. They left a nasty taste in the mouth, such as I never experienced in any church even after the weakest and most indifferent sermon." If this is the best that can be said for the best theaters, what could be said of the lower class of theaters, of which Mr. Brady's analysis takes no account. It is evident that the theater must undergo a very radical conversion before it can be regarded even as a moral influence in the community.

The Denver International C. E. Convention

By F. D. Power

Christian Endeavor is way up. Its twenty-first convention was held a mile above the sea level. From 9-13 of July a host of over 10,000 registered Christian Endeavorers gathered at Denver, and as many as 10,000 more friends and adherents of the great movement, joined in the enthusiasm and shared in the lofty privileges of the mighty assembly. White caps greeted the throngs and a white city awaited the coming of the delegations from all over the land. It was a great meeting and it was good to be there. The opening service was one of unusual power. B. B. Tyler conducted the devotional exercises and words of welcome were spoken by the governor of the state, and representatives of the city and of the churches, and responses were heard from north, south, east and west, from Canada and from abroad. There was one notable thing about this meeting, when sectarianism was pronounced a curse and the declaration made more than once, "Sectarianism is on the retreat," there was abounding applause, while every expression as to the virtue of denominational loyalty was received in silence. These young people are not far from the kingdom—the united kingdom.

"What of the past? What of the future?" was the theme of the second great meeting in the tent, Thursday evening, when reports came in, and Dr. Clark's address, and the installation of the new secretary Mr. Vogt. "Holy, holy, holy," ten thousand voices sang. A waving sea of white greeted the president. Twenty thousand hands were joined above the ten thousand heads and shaken after the Chinese manner with the new secretary. President Clark urged a definite increase campaign to double the number and efficiency of Christian Endeavor societies in a decade. Two thousand new societies have been formed within six months. The junior societies within a year may be doubled, and the correspondence school for Christian workers will train superintendents for this important service. He proposed that every state strive to gain at least 10 per cent annually for the next ten years, thus entering into a ten years' extension campaign. As each state secures its 10 per cent increase, a beautiful foreign banner, representing the fellowship of the movement, will be presented to the state.

Mr. Shaw presented the secretary's report, showing the growth from one society in 1881 to 64,620 in 1903, representing eighty denominations, in every land and language, with a membership of 3,822,300. Indiana received the Chinese banner for largest proportionate increase in intermediate societies, and C. A. Medburg bore it off in triumph. The increase in foreign lands has been marked especially in Germany, Finland, France, Spain, Sweden, Japan, Corea, Persia, India, China and South America. The great roll of local societies that have increased their membership from ten to several hundred per cent the past seven months shows the advance Christian Endeavor is making. The past year 175,000 have come from the ranks of the society into the churches. Three societies gave over $1,000 to missions the past year; the Oxford, Presbyterian, Philadelphia, $1,814, the Chinese Christian Endeavor society of the Congregational mission, San Francisco, $1,516; and the Presbyterian society, Clinton, Ill., $1,125. The banner intermediate gave $311, and the banner junior $548. Other features of the report were most encouraging. Denominational figures were not given. The Disciples rank third with over 3,300 societies having gained 350 the past year.

The quiet hour services the morning of July 10 were in memory of the late field secretary, C. E. Eberman. Two of these were led by J. N. Jessup and F. M. Tinder. Bible studies were from 8:30 to 9:30 in several churches. Those of Dr. James M. Gray, of Boston, at the Central Christian Church, were specially helpful. Friday morning at the tent was given to "Forward ward Endeavor—Why and How?" The discussions were very vigorous and practical. In the afternoon came the denominational rallies which are always interesting. At the Central Christian, C. B. Newman presided, and B. B. Tyler, J. N. Jessup, W. P. Bentley, H. O. Breeden, R. H. Waggoner, and C. S. Medburg, were the regular speakers, and among the many taking part in the meeting were B. Q. Denham, J. M. Taylor, Miss Effie D. Kellar, J. S. Myers, W. J. Lockhart, W. F. Richardson, Miss Rebel Withers, Miss Lulu Philips, B. A. Abbott, H. C. Patterson and others. It was an enthusiastic and delightful fellowship in the beautiful new General Church which was splendidly decorated and which welcomed W. B. Craig to its pulpit as pastor the following Lord's day.

Friday evening was called a "Fellowship Meeting" on the program. Fully 12,000 people greeted the speakers in the mammoth tent. The ablest and most effective address of the session was by Dr. Clarence A. Barbour, of Rochester, N. Y., who spoke on the old theme, the union of Christians. The speaker who attracted most attention, however, was Rev. Reginald J. Campbell, Dr. Joseph Parker's successor at the City Temple, London, whose theme was: "The Fellowship of the Nations and the Coming Kingdom." It may be that too much was expected of one filling the cathedral of non-conformity, but the English preacher by no means met the expectation of the audience. He could not be heard and did not show any special power as a pulpit orator. He has a striking face, framed in grey hair and a graceful and kindly manner, and his language and thought are those of a scholarly, cultivated man, but many of the men on the program were far more pleasing and stirring talkers.

Saturday morning there was a great meeting at the tent which dealt with "Our Resources and how to Develop Them," and Saturday afternoon was given to the juniors, and Saturday night to the state rallies. There were also schools of methods, patriotic meetings, evangelistic meetings, outdoor meetings, and rallies, and consecration services to fill in the spare moments of the young people. Sunday was a great day. The churches were crowded, those at the Central and Broadway Christian being unusually large. The afternoon was given to men's meetings, women's meetings, boys' meetings, and girls' meetings, and the evening to great missionary, temperance, evangelistic, Lord's day observance and consecration services.

Monday, the last day of the feast, will always be remembered by the thousands who went up to the queen city of the great American desert to celebrate the coming to age of the Christian Endeavor movement. The two themes for the day were, "The Field is the World," and "My Country 'Tis of Thee." Home and foreign problems, immigration, Mormonism, and the money problem, the Indian, the liquor question, the Bible in the public schools, municipal politics, what other nations may teach us and what America may teach the nations were some of the subjects under consideration. An appeal by Dr. Clark at one of these meetings for funds to carry on Mr. Eberman's work realized $4,000. The enthusiasm grew steadily, the speakers were earnest and strong in the delivery of their messages, the young people thronged the services, and every one was happy.

It is by a special providence I am permitted to write this story. Monday afternoon I witnessed the most startling and thrilling scene of my life. I was presiding over the great meeting in tent endeavor. There were fully 8,000 people under the great canvas who were listening intently to the splendid program. Ira Landrith had made a great speech on municipal politics, and John Royal Harris, two men who as president and secretary of the anti-saloon league, had done such effective service in securing the four mile limit law for Tennessee. Several speakers had told what the nations may teach America. Rev. Mr. Horse-

The Antiquity of Man on the Earth

[In a recent address by Prof. Frederic K. Wright, professor of geology in Oberlin College, at the dedication of Pearson Hall, at Drury College, on "Geology in a Liberal Course of Study," he referred at the close to the antiquity of man on the earth. From this part of his able address we are permitted to make a liberal extract which shows the latest scientific thought on that subject. It will be a surprise to many of our readers to find what a revolution has taken place in the scientific world on this controverted question.—ED.]

Finally, coming still closer to our own time, we find in the geology of this great region of which Drury College is the center, one of the most interesting class of facts setting limits to the speculations of anthropologists and historians concerning the antiquity and early condition of the human race, and preparing them to accept with greater docility the statements of early historians, if not of revelation itself, that man's career on the earth has been of a very limited duration, and that the progress of the human race has not been altogether in an upward direction.

By pretty general consent, astronomers, physicists and a large number of geologists accept twenty-five million years as the age of the earliest sedimentary strata, or at least of the introduction of the lowest forms of life upon the earth. Of this period, they would assign about eighteen millions to the long drawn-out Palæozoic era, which includes the Cambrian, Silurian and Carboniferous strata, which are most prominent over the Ozarkian Plateau; while four million five hundred thousand would be apportioned to the Mesozoic strata, represented by the Cretaceous rocks everywhere bordering the Ozarkian Plateau upon the west. This would leave but one million five hundred thousand years since the beginning of the Tertiary period, when the classes of animals to which our domestic varieties belong were first introduced. But it was only toward the close of the Tertiary period that this last Ozarkian uplift began which is so open to our study in this vicinity. Everything points to this period of elevation as comparatively brief, culminating in the glacial epoch, which cannot have closed in this country earlier than from six thousand to ten thousand years ago. The recency of these last great earth movements is shown, as we have already said, to admirable effect in the small amount of erosion which has been accomplished by the streams of southern Missouri since the uplift began, allowing them to cut deeper channels over the bottom of the broader valleys that have been worn in preceding ages. The recency of the unstable conditions characteristic of the glacial age, appears also in the limited amount of erosion which has been accomplished by the streams all over the glaciated region. The post-glacial gorge of Niagara would have been worn by the present stream at the present rate in 7,500 years. The gorge below the Falls of St. Anthony at Minneapolis, which is also post-glacial, would have been worn by the present stream in less than 8,000 years.

By Prof. F. K. Wright

The small size of the troughs occupied by the streams which meander over the loose deposits of the glacial period, point irresistibly to a similar limitation of post-glacial time. In repeated calculations, it is found that the present streams would erode these troughs in less than 10,000 years. The brevity of post-glacial time is further shown from the small extent to which the Great Lakes in the glaciated region and the thousands of smaller bodies of water have been filled up with sediment. If the period is extended beyond 10,000 years, it is clear to anyone familiar with the forces at work that the most of these lakes would have been filled with sediment so that their beds would have become dry land. The same conclusion is written upon the rocks in the freshness of the glacial striæ and in the small amount of disintegration that has taken place even upon the limestone rocks which have been exposed ever since the melting off of the great ice-sheet from North America and Europe.

It is therefore a no very startling announcement to make that the remains of man have been found in glacial deposits in various parts of the world, and last, but not least, in those which border the majestic river which has given the name to your state. For the date which our glacial studies will assign to these deposits is not much, if any, greater than that which has already been ascertained for the birth of the high civilization which characterized the irrigated valleys of the Tigris, the Euphrates and the Nile. A careful study of the recent geology of your own state must lead anyone to new and rather startling views of the instability of the earth's crust, which manifested itself in the earlier periods of the history of the human race.

But not only does geology teach us that man is, comparatively speaking, a new-comer in the world, but it points also to a limit of his stay upon the earth, and so helps to furnish a basis for that sober philosophy of life which prepares the way for the consolation of a religion which magnifies the worth of our spiritual nature. The world is not man's permanent abiding place. Not only is there a succession of individual life limited to threescore years and ten, but there is a succession of civilizations and of nations which rapidly supplant each other. Science, moreover, points to the still more sobering fact that the human race is but a passenger upon a way train. It is only within a comparatively few thousand years that the globe was fitted to receive him; while it is equally evident that at some time in the distant future it will be no longer fit to retain him, and the earth will pass into the condition in which our satellites and some of the planets have already passed, where it is scarcely possible that life should exist at all.

It certainly is a striking coincidence that the recent speculations of our astronomical chief at Washington concerning the end of the world should coincide so closely with the glowing words of the apostle Peter. Foreseeing the gradual loss of heat from our solar system and the consequent reign of death that must ensue, Professor Newcomb imagines a possible way for the restoration of the heat and the beginning of a new period of life upon the globe. The only way in which he can imagine it to occur is by the collision of a dark body with the sun, when the arrested motion would be transformed into heat sufficient to restore the original condition. In describing the results of this collision, which would destroy every remnant of life that remained, he could do no better than to use the words of second Peter: "The heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, and the earth also, and the works that are therein shall be burnt up."

True loving is in itself attainment and reward. Even if one longs vainly for that which is noble and worthy, he has his full recompense, though he gains nothing more than the gain of high endeavor. A wife who early loses the husband she loved profoundly, the mother who loves the only child she ever bore, whoever has nothing just now but the bare fact of loving to rejoice over, has a treasure beyond all compare.—S. Love Much and Sing.

By Charles Blanchard.

Love much! Love much! Who sings
Must give to song the wings
Of a supreme, strong love,
Which bears his soul above
His burdens. Be thou strong,
First in Love, then in Song!

Love much! Love and endure,
And keep thy soul-life pure.
Glad in this sweet content,
Sing thou thy song, intent
On this divinest thing—
To love much and to sing!

Who sings and keeps alive
The memory of those who strive
And conquer, for Love's sake,
Shall come at last and take
His place and praise among
The heroes which he sung!

A Study of the New Birth

By W. J. Burner

Christ's discourse to Nicodemus in the third chapter of John is unique. As far as we know, Nicodemus is the only man to whom Jesus said, "Ye must be born again." He told the rich young ruler to sell what he had and give to the poor, and then to come and follow him; he said to the man who was lowered through the roof at Capernaum, and the woman who washed his feet with her tears of penitence, that their sins were forgiven; he laid down the law that if any man would come after him, he must deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow him; he commanded men to be perfect, as their Father in Heaven is perfect; but to Nicodemus he said that a new birth was a condition of entering into the kingdom. Why this peculiar form to his teaching?

Nicodemus was a ruler of the Jews. He was expecting the advent of the kingdom of God. His conception of the kingdom was, of course, the conception of his class and time. It was most emphatically a kingdom of this world, though brought into being by supernatural powers and connected with supernatural manifestations. In the language of the Psalms of Solomon, the coming son of David was to purge Jerusalem of the heathen that trample her down, and thrust out the sinners from the inheritance; he would then smite the ungodly nations with the word of his mouth, and gather together a holy people whom he shall lead in righteousness; after which he would possess the nations of the heathen to serve him beneath his yoke, and glorify the Lord in a place to be seen of the whole earth. The kingdom was external, sensuous, and of course a sensuous birth was all that was required to see it and enter into it.

The high places, the chief honor and glory and blessing of this expected kingdom, belonged to the descendants of Abraham according to the flesh, if to this descent was added an observance of the law. But the correct genealogy was the first condition. So when Nicodemus is told that the first birth is not sufficient, his thoughts cannot move beyond the sphere of the flesh, and he asks how a second fleshly birth is possible. Jesus strikes at the root of the matter. The new birth is different in kind because the kingdom is different in kind. It was not an organization of men bringing them into political and religious relations based on fleshly descent, not something born of the flesh, but an organization in which men are related as spirits, possessed of common moral qualities, combined by a spiritual purpose. The birth of flesh brought no eye that was able to see this kingdom. Spiritual descent was the thing required. This alone could bring the capacity to appreciate spiritual relations, influences, power and hopes.

Dr. Clarke, in his Outline of Christian Theology says, "All good that appears in man grows up under the fostering care of the Holy Spirit." Also that the new birth is "not a creation of something additional in a man, but an awakening of new dispositions which prepare him for fellowship with God." Now, it is evident that good grows up, and a new disposition which prepares man for fellowship with God is awakened by hearing and accepting the teaching of Jesus. Nor is there any other way by which this disposition can be produced. "He that heareth my words and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me." A man is born of the Spirit when he gets the spiritual valuation of himself and the world, the spiritual status of Jesus, and the only way to get it is to get it from Jesus; to become a disciple of Jesus. A correct spiritual descent is proven by possession of the spiritual quality, by being like Jesus.

This birth is "of water." I think the reference is to John's baptism, but to an aspect of John's baptism which is seen in Christian baptism. Nicodemus and his kind had not gone out to be baptized by the wild wilderness prophet. They were not sinners! And John's baptism meant repentance, sharp and thorough and life long. It belonged to that very spiritual sphere which they had no eyes to see. Should they descend to the level of the unclean, and endure the humiliation of publicly confessing their sins? Not they, Nicodemus has sometimes said to me (for I have met several of him) that baptism as a humiliation is the very thing to which he objects.

Christian baptism is John's baptism with additions, but not with subtractions. It is still a complete immersion which symbolizes a complete repentance and pledges one to complete obedience. In addition, as a great Presbyterian scholar says, "Faith, in the sense of personal trust in a personal Savior, so connects the water with the presence and power of the Spirit that the one is the means the other uses to impart his spiritual grace. In this way baptism is looked upon as one of the means of grace."

The article on baptism in the Encyclopedia Britannica says this is the doctrine of Protestant theologians as a whole. If this is the case, Protestant theologians as a whole are tolerably sound on baptism, and "we as a people" are pretty close to the ancient Protestant doctrine.

Jesus told Nicodemus that water was a means the Spirit must use to lift him out of the sphere of the sensuous into the sphere of the spiritual. If Peter or John had baptized him, he would thereby have been most effectually separated from the past and born into the personal sovereignty of Jesus.

It would have brought him into that relation called "believing on the son," whose opposite is described as "obeying not," and whose blessedness is comprehended in the saying "eternal life."

This birth brought a new moral standard. He would leave off ceremonial washings and add deeds of mercy; he would seek the happiness that is found with the meek, the pure in heart, the poor in spirit, the peacemakers. Above all, he would be in a new relation to all who sinned and all who suffered. The kingdom is salvation. It is love reaching after sinners. It is eternal intolerance of sin that can be removed and suffering that can be abated. The Christ-nature is the sphere of the kingdom, and the Christ-nature is service unto death.

The church, as in the days of Nicodemus, deals with sin in the abstract. The kingdom, as in the days of Nicodemus, deals with sin in the concrete, and seeks to bring disposition and purpose into harmony with the will of God, and except the church be born of water and the Spirit every generation or two it cannot enter into the kingdom of God.

"SUMMER FOOD"

Has Other Advantages.

Many people have tried the food Grape-Nuts simply with the idea of avoiding the trouble of cooking food in the hot months.

All of these have found something beside the ready cooked food idea, for Grape-Nuts is a scientific food that tones up and restores a sick stomach as well as repairs the waste tissue in brain and nerve centers.

"For two years I had been a sufferer from catarrh of the stomach, due to improper food, and to relieve this condition I had tried nearly every prepared food on the market without any success until 6 months ago my wife purchased a box of Grape-Nuts, thinking it would be a desirable cereal for the summer months.

"We soon made a discovery, we were enchanted with the delightful flavor of the food, and to my surprise I began to get well. My breakfast now consists of a little fruit; 4 teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts; a cup of Postum, which I prefer to coffee; graham bread or toast and two boiled eggs. I never suffer the least distress after eating this, and my stomach is perfect and general health fine. Grape-Nuts is a wonderful preparation. It was only a little time after starting on it that wife and I both felt younger, more vigorous, and in all ways stronger. This has been our experience.

"P. S. The addition of a little salt in place of sugar seems to me to improve the food." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Pope Leo XIII.

By Cephas Shelburne.

Born in the year of our Lord 1810, ordained a priest at 27, made a cardinal in 1853, elected pope by the conclave of cardinals in 1870, now at the ripe old age of 93, Leo the XIII says: "I am now near my end. It is the will of the Almighty. Nothing can change it. Now I am ready to depart, having settled all my affairs. I feel I have done all in my power for the good of the church and humanity. I do not know if all I have done has been good, but I certainly obeyed my conscience and our faith." Cardinal Gibbons has said that "The world will admire Leo for his loftiness of intellect, and for his great and abiding sympathy with humanity."

Leo evidently possessed other qualities: He was broad of scholarship, possessed a truly statesmen-like mind. He was wise, firm, prudent. But the conspicuous and admirable quality of the Roman pontiff was his goodness. And although, I suppose, it be the business of Protestantism to protest against the Church of Rome, we of all faiths should be broad and generous enough to recognize the quality of goodness or saintliness "wherever found, on heathen or on Christian ground." Pope Leo XIII has come to be recognized, both among Catholics and non-Catholics, as a good man. Certain it is that he was respected, esteemed and admired by Protestants to a greater degree than any Catholic prelate since John Henry Newman. Says a recent editorial comment, "We do not know of any being of modern times in whom character came to a more exalted and a more undisputed coronation than in this pope, unless it be George Washington." It is this quality, no less than the fact of his being the supreme pontiff and head of the Catholic Church, that makes his present state of health a universal regret and sorrow. It is seldom that mortals, which pope and all of us be, vested with so great temporal power, can preserve inviolate the Christian graces and the beautiful traits of sincerity and humility. When Saul was chosen king to rule over Israel his modesty "hid him among the stuff;" "and when they sought him he could not be found." But Saul, like a great many others, could not stand prosperity, and a little later we have the lesson of Saul rejected as king. For a quarter of a century, head over the great Catholic Church, ruling 190,000,000 of people who bow to his dictation, assuming the title of "Most High and Reverend Lord" and "Vicar of Christ," and successor of St. Peter, holding in his fingers the Fisherman's Ring with which to sign all important edicts, and in his power the pontifical seal by which he issues his papal bulls and dispensations, Pope Leo XIII has yet held his kingship of character and goodness, and calmly faces death, having obeyed his conscience and kept the Catholic faith, and saying with the great apostle, "I am now ready to depart."

We do not pay our tribute to Roman Catholicism, or its sovereign pontiff, or the vatican at Rome. But to character and the quality of goodness, which shines as brilliantly in pope as in bishop, and in bishop as in the humblest Disciple of our common Lord. 'Tis noble to be good; and, die when he may, this may be affirmed of Leo XIII. Goodness itself is a universally admired characteristic. Here we touch God and become like him. And here Catholic and Protestant must meet on common ground and in mutual admiration. Pope Leo XIII has come to be universally recognized among Protestants as a good man. May the conclave now being held in the beautiful Sistine chapel within the walls of the vatican elect a worthy successor—one possessed with the quality of goodness, a loftiness of soul rather than of office, and with a "great and abiding sympathy with humanity."

Miracles.

By T. T. Holton.

It has never come to my knowledge that there is any demonstrated theory that makes a miracle impossible or improbable. There is no fact-evidence against miracles. There is no proof against miracles. That the miracles recorded in the Bible never occurred is simply an opinion. There is not a man on the earth to-day who knows that Lazarus was not raised from the dead. All the evidence there is, is in favor of the miracle. Take the case of the burning bush. Moses was on familiar ground. He was in his prime. He knew bushes, and he knew fire. When the bush was not consumed he would have been the veriest simpleton not to have perceived that it was a "sign" from God. All that subsequently occurred confirmed him in this.

The miracles of the Bible were not given in elusive guise or a suspicious manner. There was plenty of daylight, plenty of time, and entire absence of collusion.

If the dead body of Lazarus had been disinterred—and the fact was certified by honest witnesses, who could have doubted the fact affirmed? The friends who could so credibly certify to the raising up of a dead Lazarus—would surely be equally competent to certify to the raising up of a live Lazarus.

That it was possible for God to work these miracles there can be no doubt. That they would be "signs" of his presence, there can be no question. That they served a legitimate purpose in that they furnished proof of his presence and infallible credentials to those who were to make known the divine will, surely cannot be denied. Miracles are addressed to the reason. They compel conclusions. In writing of these "signs" John says, "these are written that you might believe."

A miracle is proved, just as any occurrence is proved. Seeing, hearing, handling, and continued companionship with the resurrected Lazarus, are as potent in evidence as they would have been in regard to the man Lazarus in the ordinary occurrences of his life. The witnesses would naturally have been more careful in their scrutiny, and more deliberate in their testimony, just because the occurrence was extraordinary.

That Jesus was not shown openly "to all the people" (Acts 10:41), was a wise arrangement in the divine plan. As it stands, the proof is of the highest and most convincing order. The testimony of a mob is never satisfactory. In the mixed multitude there is every chance for a confusion and difference. In a multitude many would not be qualified to be competent witnesses, for lack of opportunity and the proper knowledge and tests. Many would be careless and unobservant, even if they had opportunity.

Some honest men do not make good witnesses. In a multitude taken without selection there would be dishonest persons whose testimony could be controlled by corrupt means. Peter says that Jesus, after his resurrection, was shown openly "unto witnesses chosen before of God, even to us who did eat and drink with him after he rose from the dead." The apostles were well qualified by their former life and occupations to be eye and ear witnesses. In a moral and religious point of view, they were qualified by three and a half years of training in righteousness by the holiest and wisest teacher the world has ever known or can ever know. They had the fullest opportunity to know the fact to which they testify. They were the best and only proper witnesses that God could have chosen. And the fruit of their testimony puts the seal of Jehovah upon it.

The man that accepts the fruit of a tree as good, and calls the tree corrupt, sins against the Holy Spirit and his own spirit, and puts it out of the power of God to convince him of anything. The man that says he cannot believe this testimony ought not to stand in any Christian pulpit or teach in any Christian college. It is no indication of scholarship or advanced thought that a man does not believe that the Bible miracles were wrought. He may be unreasonable, narrow, and not up-to-date. The rejection of a well-attested fact is no sign of superior scholarship or up-to-dateness.

Conditions do not favor the hermitage of any nation or people.

As we become better acquainted with one another, the world over, and the interests of each becomes more common to all, the brotherhood of all the race will receive an abiding recognition in the consciousness of men.—Religious Telescope.

A Gleam on the Horizon

By Logan Lenore

More than thirty years ago a little band of Disciples organized a congregation on the one foundation. Under the shade of the trees in a beautiful grove they signed their names, with beating hearts, to the great charter of spiritual rights, and there they held their first meeting as a congregation of Christ. Summer was among the trees, in the wind and in the sky, and it was also summer in the hearts of the Disciples. Sweet harmony prevailed, between the music of the caroling birds and the melody of their tuneful hearts. The cloudless sky answered to the shadowless horizon of their hope. As they planted their tender vine of life, they offered a prayer of trust for its fortunate growth and the fruit it would bear, and with steady hands and silent tongues they wove the myrtle of hope about its destiny. The first dews of heaven which watered its young life, fell from the eyes of the Disciples. Rich dew? The virtue of the sky was in it.

In God's first temple, the pious preacher read the word of life aloud, within the hearing of the people, and gave the sense thereof, and attentive nature nodded a quiet assent. The woodland took up the melody of the hymn and wafted it upward and onward. God and nature and Christ and grace seemed to blend in one sweet communion that day, as the Disciples gave to one another the hand of fellowship, and stipulated to keep the ordinances of grace and to preach the gospel of salvation and to make their weekly offerings for the support of the needy. With one breath they sang and prayed, as they pledged to one another their sacred honor to contend for the faith once for all delivered to the saints, and waves of song caught their tears. Joy went from heart to heart, and hope mounted to its highest pitch. Purposes were framed before that rustic pulpit, destined to be transmitted from generation to generation for their full achievement. Prayers were offered with stammering tongues, which could not then be answered, but which would be answered in "seasons which the Father hath set within his own authority." The times for the answering of their swelling prayers were concealed from their eyes. Blessed obscurity!

A foreign missionary society, or a Christian woman's board of missions, or a ministerial relief fund, or a board of church extension was not so much as dreamed of that high day. No word of instruction or exhortation was spoken of the responsibility of Christians to the nations which sit in the shadow of death; much less was a collection taken to send the gospel to the heathen world. The duty of the hour seemed to them to lie closer at hand. They had no church to shelter their meetings against the summer's sun and the wintry storm, and to pay for the preaching from the rustic pulpit would drain their slender purse; beside, the sects were in the land. The sects were giants before whom the Disciples were as grasshoppers.

The infant congregation was aflame with zeal for the union of Christians, although it hardly recognized the sects, inhabiting the country around the grove, as Christians at all. And why should it not have burned with such a zeal? The battle waged from week to week against the sects in the shade of those calm and peaceful trees. Arguments drawn from biblical injunctions against divisions, from facts of history, and from points of analogy were employed with telling effect. The saints were happy and the sects were mad. A sound argument for the overthrow of sectism was heard in every prayer, and a synopsis of a fine sermon on union was sung in every hymn.

Whether the covenanters had the spirit of union themselves, was an untaught question, irrelevant and out of order. They could drive the sects from the field of battle with their logical weapons, and that was enough. On that day it was enough. It was a time to fight and not to hew marble; a time to drive the Canaanite from the land, and not to build temples. Those Disciples saw one thing clearly to be done, and they were acquainted with the use of the instruments they had to employ. They did not close their eyes against the light they had, nor did they let their weapons grow rusty and dull. They made no compromise with the enemy. Pilate and Herod did not unite in that grove to put Jesus to death. True noblemen of the Lord were those men, and those were glorious days.

Things are different now. Long ago the ark of the covenant was removed from the hospitable shade of the trees, and was placed in a comfortable house of the Lord. The music of singing reverberates no more down the long aisles and through the lofty vaults of the forest. The incense of prayer—and sweeter incense never mingled with that of the angels around the throne—rises no more from that altar among the trees. Faces, luminous with a triumphant hope, which were then upturned toward those favoring skies, have faded away under the blight of death. The grove is silent now, save when the birds raise their chorus of praise. The temple of grass and tree and sky is still, with the quietness of the grave, until the night wind wails its requiem of the dead. No memorial feast of flesh and blood is spread under the limbs of those ancient trees. Only a sweet memory remains to haunt the sacred place. The grove will never be the same place it was before the first feast of love was spread in the shade of those friendly trees, though the trees and their successors should stand for ages; for the footfall of a saint, the melody of a hymn, the emphasis of a sermon, the pleading cry of a prayer echo up and down the shady aisles and make the place enchanted ground.

The Disciples also have changed. How those Disciples hated the sects! They called them the children of Babylon. And how the sects, in turn, hated the altar under the trees! The Disciples had the spirit of the Master, which must abide with them and with their spiritual posterity forever. They had also a spirit which was subject to the law of change, and which was destined to pass away. A broader faith, a sweeter charity, a larger hope, a better knowledge of the Redeemer would bring the Disciple and the sect into a closer fellowship.

After many a year of wandering to and fro, a charter member was permitted to worship with the congregation organized in the temple of nature, when lo! he beheld the Disciple and the sect worshipping at the same altar, uniting in the singing of the same hymns, placing their contributions in the same basket. For three months had they been bound together in their Sunday evening service by this blessed tie. The prayers were for mutual blessings. They were no longer enemies; they were allies. Their hatred of many a year ago, if not changed to perfect love, was softened down to tolerance, where they could appreciate each other's faith and sacrifice and devotion. They were one in their spirit and were one in their purpose, and were dwelling together as brethren. The Disciple and the sect were finding the "more excellent way." A mysterious vision gleamed tenderly among the lamps of the church as if to increase the light of the building; it was the image of the Master's face turned upon the recipients of his grace as they were answering, as best they could, his high-priestly prayer, poured out of a broken heart on the night of his betrayal, that they might be "perfected into one." Faith and love and hope worked on the problem of union in their own way. There was no goading faith or forcing love or driving hope. The Disciple spent no valuable time compelling his love; nor did the sect. These potent forces do not bring their results in a day.

While the weapons of logic were good and were necessary, the "tie that binds" is better. The perfect union is more likely to be consummated under the visible image of the Master's face than when the sect hated the Disciple and the Disciple hated the sect.

God's Instruments.

By H. T. Morrison.

One of the most striking peculiarities in God's efforts to save man is that the instruments employed were, from a human standpoint, usually the most unpromising that could have been employed. God's choice of means from the very beginning has been such as to shock the worldly-wise. The history of the Jewish people is ample proof of this statement. What connection, for instance, could man have foreseen between the shepherd boy Joseph, sent in the providence of God into Egypt, and the mighty results which followed? Or when Israel was to be delivered, why hedge them in, as was done at the Red Sea, where they would be exposed to the fury of their enemies instead of leading them directly out of Egypt by the natural route? And when the walled city of Jericho was to be taken it surely must have been a strange spectacle to the worldly-wise inside the walls when they beheld the Israelites, day after day, marching around their city blowing ram's horns. And not much wonder the proud Naaman rebelled at the thought of bathing in Jordan for the cure of leprosy. And the only reason why the brave Gideon ever consented to meet an army of more than 100,000 men with 300, when he had an army of 32,000 in the beginning, was because he saw not as man seeth, but with the eye of faith.

For thousands of years the world had been expecting a deliverer. The Jews had had their Davids and Solomons, who had dazzled the world with their wisdom and splendor. The other nations had had their philosophers and kings and generals. But when the time has come for God to fulfill his promise, a peasant, born in a stable, reared by the humblest of parents, in the most despised town in all the land, without learning, and so poor that he had not a place to lay his head, makes his appearance among men. Jesus of Nazareth had not one element of greatness, such as the world then counted greatness, to commend him to either Jew or Greek. But he was God's chosen instrument, designed to smite down human wisdom and folly, and turn a foolish world back from its pride and self-worship, to loyalty, to its rightful sovereign. It is not much wonder that the learned Greek pronounced the preaching of Christ's gospel foolishness, and that to the self-righteous Jew, Christ became indeed a stumbling-block.

When we contemplated the class of men chosen and sent to be the first heralds of the cross, human wisdom again receives a shock. Twelve penniless and unlettered men pitted against the pagan world, as it existed in the days of the proud Cæsar, was certainly a singular spectacle.

This has been largely true of God's most effective instruments down to the present day. Those that have been the most signally used by him for good have usually been chosen from such lowly and humble sinners as to shock, at first the pride of a large class of church people. Again and again has God chosen the base things of the world, and things that are despised, yes, and things that are not, that he might bring to naught the wisdom of the wise. People, in the beginning, made light of such humble instruments as the monk Luther, John Wesley, Cary, Judson and the unlettered young man Moody; but these are the forces God has used, and is using, to turn the world right side up, in order that men may see and think as God sees and thinks. When our Lord laid such stress upon a two mite offering, made by a poor widow, he intended to teach a much profounder lesson than many people have ever understood. The lesson goes much further and deeper than the pocket-book.

God has demonstrated again and again, and in a thousand ways, that our ways are not his ways, and yet how slow we are to learn the lesson! In this, the beginning of the twentieth century, I have little doubt but that the greatest folly the church is guilty of, and that is doing more to hinder the conversion of the world than any one thing, is that of substituting man's wisdom for the wisdom of God.

Alexander Campbell's Study.

Alexander Campbell's study is a brick structure, hexagonal in shape and stands a short distance west of the Bethany home. Formerly a wing, now removed, extended thirty-four feet from the rear of the study. The original circular skylight was destroyed by a storm a few months before Mr. Campbell's death. It is said that he preferred a skylight because it prevented his having sunlight shadows on his paper while writing. Not infrequently he would facetiously quote the adage "Lux descendit e cado"—light descends from above. Ventilation was obtained by means of the little side windows of the door and on the sides of the fire-place. The large trees which have stood like sentinels for more than sixty years, were brought across the mountain by stage and planted by Mr. Campbell himself.

Through the courtesy of Mrs. D. C. Barclay, of Bethany, we are able to present this excellent interior view of Mr. Campbell's study. Here in the early hours of the morning when the rest of his family were sleeping, Mr. Campbell busied himself preparing the manuscript for the printer's hands. Here on the shelves were stored away about three thousand books, many of them old and rare, and some of them with the stains of salt-water still visible, the effect of the seabath off the Scottish coast, when he and the other members of the family narrowly escaped a watery grave in their first attempt to cross the sea in 1808. To the right, in the picture, may be seen the chair with its extending bookrest or writing desk, in which the great man sat and wrote his famous debates, the Christian System, and other books, during the most active literary period of his life. The other chair is that occupied by the venerable Father Campbell in his declining years, and through the period of his blindness, whose "ever-during darkness he bore with the utmost resignation." Here also may be seen the busts of both father and son. The study is in a good state of preservation, and while no longer the sanctum of its erstwhile genius, it is an object of deepest interest to every lover of our plea, as the favorite workshop where the great reformer burnished the weapons so mighty in the defense of apostolic Christianity. COFFEE SENT HER Back to the Country.

A young woman of Bradford, Vt., made her way to a good position in a big Boston store, and gave it up because of sickness at home, but it all came out right at last and she tells the story this way: "Two years ago I had to leave a position as bookkeeper in a Boston department store to go back home to take charge of the old place as mother's health seemed shattered, and what do you suppose proved to be the cause that forced me to return?"

"I found her very weak, unable to sit up all day and with a dizzy feeling if she tried to move about. She had been advised to stop coffee drinking, but as she had used it from childhood it seemed as though nothing could take its place. I had settled down to stay at the farm, when one day I got to thinking over the situation and concluded to try an experiment. I got a package of Postum Coffee. It was not cooked right the next morning and we were all disappointed. That was because we had tried to make it like coffee. Next morning I had Postum made according to directions and we were all delighted. In a few days you should have seen the change in mother. Since that time we have never drank coffee and now we all drink Postum twice a day and sometimes three times and think it superior to coffee.

"The change in mother's health since she quit coffee and took up Postum has been wonderful. She is once more able to take the work again, quite well in fact, with no more weakness and nervousness, no more sour stomach, no more trouble of any kind. To cut a long story short she is now entirely well and I am going back to Boston in a few weeks, thanks to Postum." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Ice cold Postum with a dash of lemon is a delightful "cooler" for warm days.

News From Many Fields

Southern California.

We have just learned with much pleasure that we are to have Bro. W. E. Garrison with us in the Long Beach convention. We hope to see him a little ahead of the time so we can show him Southern California with her summer clothes on.

Here comes the dear old CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST with another new dress on. It always looks prim and clean no matter when or how it appears. The writer of this has been a reader of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST ever since he was a boy, and he can say without any flattery that he does not call to mind a single time when the editor of that paper has ever taken a position on any question that he could not heartily endorse. Further, he does not call to mind a single issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST in all of these years that he would not have willingly put into the hands of anyone, inside or outside of the church to read.

Summer in California! Well, to one who was never here it is hard to describe it. Remember this letter is written in Orange county. Early in the morning we have a fog, which veils the sun till about 9 o'clock. By that time the coast breeze begins to blow, so that one in the shade is comfortable with light coat and vest on at almost any time in the day. By six o'clock it is quite cool, and one out in the evening will enjoy a light wrap. We sleep under two to three covers every night so far and this is July 10.

The apricots are ripe and the canneries and driers are busy. An eastern man who has tasted apricots only from the cans knows nothing whatever of the natural taste of the fruit. We were surprised to find it fresh from the tree, to be sweeter and more delicious than our eastern peaches. The crop is not so large this year as last, but the fruit is of a much better quality so that the grower will probably market his fruit at a very much better price.

There are many oranges yet on the trees. They are not so good this year as usual, and many of the growers have not tried to market them. I wished for the street boys and girls from some of our large cities recently. I was crossing a river bed where were dumped the the unmarketed oranges. I counted about forty wagon loads at one crossing. Much of this fruit is as good as is sold for from fifteen to thirty cents a dozen in the eastern market. To a tenderfoot it looks queer to see ripe oranges, orange blossoms, and growing oranges all on the same limb. The blossoms are gone now, but we have oranges of all stages of growth, from the size of a marble to the full ripe fruit on the same tree.

English walnuts look well and the promise is good for a fair crop. This is the prettiest tree we have seen in the state. It is so symmetrical, and so clean. We think the walnut grove much prettier than the orange grove. Figs are getting ripe, too. They will continue right on from now till in the fall. The trees in our yard have some ripe fruit on them every day.

And berries—blackberries, strawberries, Logan berries (this is a new one to the tenderfoot); great big juicy, luscious berries. In the retail market 5 cts, a box, by the crate about three cents a box.

We enjoyed the editor's description of a little fishing picnic with Brother Cree. They made one beautiful catch. How I wished they could come out here and swing a few that would require both of them to do the landing. At least so our fishermen here report.

We never fish, and cannot testify from experience. But we can testify concerning game. We have quail by the thousands, doves are plentiful, and rabbits galore. How we wish the editor could come over and spend a few days with us about the fifteenth of September. We will promise him the merriest outing that he has had in many a year.

It was our pleasure to have a visit recently from Mrs. John W. Garrett, and her daughter Miriam, of Colorado Spring. We all spent several days together at Arch Beach, and enjoyed much the fellowship while we listened to the thunder of the waves.

We have but little church news to report this time. The work generally seems to be in a healthy conditions. People in this country generally have a good time from the first of July till the first of September. None of the services are largely attended. Here in Santa Ana, the First Baptist, First Christian and M. E. church, south, are holding union Sunday evening services during the months of July and August. We had the first union service last Sunday evening at the Baptist church. The pastor of the Christian church preached to a crowded house. The next meeting will be in the Christian church and the Methodist pastor will preach. Then we go the Methodist house and the Baptist minister will be heard. The plan works beautifully. F. N. Santa Ana, Cal.

Ohio Letter.

Lathrop Cooley preached his 59th anniversary sermon at North Eaton, Ohio, July 12. These fifty-nine years of ministry have been spent at North Eaton, N. Royalton, Painesville, Akron and Cleveland. Brother Cooley will be 82 years old next October. He is a vigorous man for one of his years and has promise of many days yet. It will be remembered that he has been a generous donor to several of our missionary enterprises. Robert B. Chapman now ministers at North Eaton, and reports a new C. W. B. M. auxiliary and prospects for good meeting in September when he will be assisted by C. A. Pierce, of Galion.

W. A. Brundige has been at Lima, Wayne Street, for nearly four years. In that time 402 people have been added to the church. The school gave $50 for Children's Day and already have over $2,000 in a building fund. A new building is greatly needed.

F. F. Cook is doing an heroic work at Marietta. The remodeled building cost $3,500; $1,600 of this Brother Cook got from the churches of the state; $400 is yet to be provided for. There have been four additions the past month.

J. T. H. Stewart has taken up his abode in southern Ohio and will minister in word to the brethren at Lowell, Mile Run and Fairfield. He will live at Lowell.

The Glenville church has a brand new pipe organ. It is the gift of Andrew Carnegie. It was inaugurated Tuesday night July 14, by a recital by Prof. Andrews, of Oberlin. On Sunday July 19, S. H. Bartlett dedicated the organ by preaching a sermon. To say that the people of that parish, with their pastor, M. B. Ryan, are feeling hilarious is to tell only a part of the story. Hurrah for Glenville!

It is pretty hard to run anything good without calling on Ohio. The management of the Bethany College Assembly has understood this and on the program for the Assembly which convenes July 21, to August 5, we find the name of H. H. Moninger, F. M. Rains, M. L. Buckley, S. M. Cooper, S. T. Martin, P. Y. Pendleton. But Ohio furnished Bethany with her honored and markedly successful president. Why should Ohio not be on her Assembly program? John Mullen has resigned at Mungen. D. P. Shafer has done likewise at Chesterland. E. J. Meacham has been called at Wilmington for three years in the future. M. L. Bates and J. H. Goldner will spend six weeks in Chicago University. Newton Falls is building a new house of worship and will be "in it" by October. East Side church, Toledo, has enlarged its house. L. L. Carpenter was there last Sunday. Two or three good men at $500 and $600 salaries can be given work in Ohio. Write this scribe.

The Canton Sunday-school averaged 355 for the past quarter, and the offering was five cents plus per scholar per Sunday. Pretty good, that. A. Martin preached at Ashland July 13, and lectured on July 14, on Spiritualism. The churches of Ashland hold union services during July and August. The Lake Shore preachers held a conclave at Painesville, July 20. Each man told of the latest book he had read. The day was delightfully spent.

The Eastern Ohio Ministerial Association will hold its annual meeting at Hiram, Sept. 1-3. The program is now hatching and will be one of strength and helpfulness. Let every preacher plan to attend.

It is nearing the time for the fall conventions. The programs have been sent to the various districts. These conventions ought to be made much of. They can be a power for good. The places and dates this year will be as follows:

Dist. 3, Tues. & Wed., Aug. 25-26, Bellefontaine.
" 25, Thurs. & Fri., "	27-28, Piqua.
" 10, Tues. & Wed., Sept. 1-2, Harrison.
" 23, Thurs. & Fri. "	3-4, Russellville.
" 7, Sat. & Sun., "	5-6, Buford.
" 5, Tues. & Wed., "	8-9, Martinsville.
" 24, Thurs. & Fri., "	10-11, Ironton.
" 18, Sat. & Sun., "	12-13, Bradbury.
" 14, Tues. & Wed. "	15-16, McConnelsville.
" 1, Thurs. & Fri., "	17-18, Zanesville.
" 16, Sat. & Sun., "	19-20, Martin's Ferry.
" 2, Thurs. & Fri., "	24-25, Wauseon.
" 3, Tues. & Wed., "	29-30, Ada.
" 19, Thurs. & Fri., Oct. 1-2, Bowling Green.
" 6, Tues. & Wed., "	6-7, Ashland.
" 4, Thurs. & Fri. "	8-9, Loudonville.
" 9, Tues. & Wed. "	13-14, Stubenville.
National Convention, Detroit, Oct. 16-22.
" 22, Tues. & Wed., Oct. 27-28, Newton Falls.
" 20, Thurs. & Fri., "	29-30, Lorain.
" 15, Tues. & Wed., Nov. 3-4, Stowe.

Collinwood, O.

Missouri Letter.

This is the day of the county convention. The list has been published, but some changes have been made and need noting: Cass County, Bethany church, July 20-22. Holt County, 23, 24. Hickman Mills, 23, 24. Boone County, Ashland, 29-31. Callaway County, Friendship church, Aug. 3-5. Lincoln County, New Hope, 10-12. Gentry County, Farber, 17, 18. Pike County, 19, 20. Ralls County, New London, 24-26. Miller County, Tuscumbia, 29-31. Two dedications also come next month, Northview, Aug. 16; Freeman, Aug. 23. Both new congregations and churches.

Two splendid victories have recently come in our mission work. Joseph Gaylor had one at Seneca, where, in the face of the greatest odds, he had a meeting with 62 additions. Church, Bible school and Endeavor organized and part of the money raised for the erection of a house of worship. The other was by Bro. A. J. Williams in the Springfield District at Everton, with 47 added. In both cases the opposition was something amazing, and the victories complete.

Brother Gaylor is now in a meeting at Rolla, a particularly hard field; he reports 15 additions to date. This is one of the most important towns in central Missouri. Brother Warren is now in a meeting at Sarcosie with good prospects. Bro. T. W. Cottingham is just beginning a meeting at Fairhaven, in Vernon County, a place where we have no church.

Bro. G. E. Jones has just entered upon his work at Sheffield, Kansas City, and is meeting with delightful success. R. H. Fife is working like a Trojan in building the house of worship at Westport. Every male member of the Fife family old enough to work at all, are on the ground helping. Surely they are going to have one of the best and the cheapest house in the city.

The city mission work under Bro. F. L. Bowen is moving splendidly. Two houses, Ivanhoe and Seventh and Jackson, will be finished this year, in fact, our cause in Kansas City was never in better heart than at present. The county-Jackson-convention meets next week, and we are in hopes that great good will come therefrom.

The Hammett Place Church, St. Louis, has opened up another Sunday-school. This makes three mission schools now under the auspices of that congregation, besides the one at the church. All of them meet in the morning at 9:30 o'clock and close in time to reach the church for services at 11 o'clock. This is an example that could be wisely followed.

Brother Ireland's work at Carondelet is moving slowly, but surely, in the right direction, and when the house is remodeled, they will do still better.

The flood situation has been relieved of its immediate acute distress, but conditions are yet distressful. Every member of the church in Armourdale was loser by the flood, and three-fourths of them lost all they had. It will cost $1,200 or $1,500 to put their house of worship in shape again, and they have no means to employ a preacher at all. They must have help. Kansas City, Mo., churches have undertaken to put the house back on its foundation and refloor it, but the refurnishing and the preaching service will still have to be provided for. Armourdale is only one; others have suffered as well.

It seems one of the times when there should come a generous, hearty response; some of the churches have responded, for which, God bless them; but many others could make immediate and large offerings, and the Lord expects it at their hands. "Inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these, ye did it unto me."

We are now in the last quarter of the convention year, and many, very many, churches have not yet sent their offering for state missions. The unlooked for and unexpected burdens have placed your board in an embarrassing situation. If the churches will make immediate and generous response, the situation will be wonderfully relieved. We are praying for that, and believing it will come.

Michigan Notes.

D. Munro, corresponding secretary of Michigan, has located permanently with the church at St. Johns.

F. P. Arthur is spending his vacation near Luther.

G. G. Horn, of Boswell, Ind., has taken up the work at Fremont.

Wm. Chapple, of Columbus, Ind., has been spending his vacation at Cascade, Mich.

One of Michigan's pressing needs is good men who are willing to preach the gospel for a small salary. The field is white to the harvest, but laborers are few.

Michigan is to have a preachers' assembly at Cascade, Aug. 17-22. This is a new movement among Michigan preachers, and much needed. The place selected for this assembly is one of the most beautiful summer resorts to be found anywhere. The expense will be light, and it is hoped that Michigan preachers will be well represented. A program has been provided, covering a discussion of all the books in the New Testament. This feature of the program will be given each forenoon at the grove. The afternoons will be given to recreation and rest. Each evening service will be held in the church. The following subjects will be presented:

Monday evening, "The Preacher a Teacher," by F. P. Arthur, of Grand Rapids.

Tuesday evening, "Church Problems," by E. E. Cowperthwait, of Saginaw.

Wednesday evening, "The Preacher for the Day," by W. B. Taylor, of Ionia.

Thursday evening, "The Boys and Girls," by T. P. Ullom, of Traverse City.

Friday evening, farewell service. Messages from older preachers. Let us make this a pleasant and profitable week.

It gives us joy that our Foreign Christian Missionary Society has made such a splendid gain during the first eight months of this year. The increase in offering for this period was $15,000 over that of last year, and a gain of only $7,000 more is needed to reach the Surely there are enough followers of Jesus in our great brotherhood who have not yet extended a helping hand to this divinely commissioned work, whose hearts will be touched by the world's great need of the gospel and will rally to the work by sending in an offering at once. It would be a shame to our entire brotherhood to come short of the $200,000 mark. It would send a thrill of gladness around the world and into the highest heavens for us to cross the line.

Nebraska.

Additions to the churches have been as follows as reported: Five at York, four by letter and statement at Tecumseh, one at Chester, one at Table Rock, four by letter, one confession at Lincoln, 1st.

A Bible-school has been organized at Overton. G. W. Darnier, superintendent. They will be supplied during the summer by Bro. F. F. Grim, of Chicago. The church at Table Rock is repairing their house, and have asked Bro. C. C. Atwood to remain with them another year. Oscar Sweeney has accepted a call to Alma, and will be at work when this is read. We are glad to get him back to the state. W. W. Divine, of Minnesota, was at North Bend and Kearney recently. Hope to locate him at one of these places.

We need to get new men into the state. The foreign society has appointed Dr. and Mrs. C. L. Pickett, of Tecumseh, to a post in the Philippines, and they will go in September. Brother and Sister Wilkinson will shortly be in Porto Rico under the C. W. B. M. Churches in other states are figuring on other good men, and thus we need to be constantly filling our ranks to make up losses, as well as to supply the increase needed for our growing work.

The new Brownville Church will be dedicated July 19.

South Omaha brethren have sold their church property and bought a fine site and will build a new and suitable house of worship. Brother Leander Lane is leading this church very successfully. He is a good organizer.

The church at Magnet will dedicate its new house July 26.

Bro. H. G. Hall is giving his time to raising funds in Omaha for the new church needed for the First Church. No evening services will be held during the hot weather.

Earl E. Boyd, of Eastside, Lincoln, was sent by his endeavor society to the convention at Denver.

We are now within a short time of the state convention. We want to enroll a thousand delegates and visitors. If the preachers will take up the matter with the congregations it can be easily brought about. The railroad fare will be one and one-third fare for round trip from all points within a radius of 50 miles of Lincoln, or where the fare is $1.50 and less. Outside of this, up to 200 miles, the fare will be one fare plus 50 cents. No certificates required. Tickets on sale Aug. 4 to 12 inclusive, and good to return till Aug. 14. This will cover the full time of the convention which is Aug. 4-9. From Lincoln, transportation will be on street cars to University Place. From there by carriage to the grounds. The fare from Lincoln will be 15 cents each way. Baggage will be transported via the street cars to University Place, and thence by wagon to the grounds. Two deliveries each day. Bring plenty of bedding. It does not pay to be short on this, as the nights are often cool. Bring your rubbers, some toilet articles, some clothing that will be warm if needed. You can live well and reasonably cheap on the grounds. Meals will be furnished for those who do not want to board themselves, at a moderate price. Hay and feed for horses, ice and milk will be for sale. Barber shop handy. Tents will cost $1.50 and $3.25 each for the season. No charge for space. If you have a tent bring it along. Floors in tents extra. If ordered in advance gasoline stoves can be furnished in limited numbers. Should have orders for these promptly.

No church can afford to miss being represented in this great gathering. We have a fine program for instruction and helpfulness. It is not an entertainment, but a great religious gathering to plan for the evangelization of Nebraska. Yet the speakers are among the best. They will be masters in their fields.

The Ministerial Institute begins at Cotner, July 20, and lasts till the convention begins. W. J. Lhamon and W. P. Aylsworth are the principal lecturers. This is a growing institution in the state. Preachers and Bible students should patronize it generously. Tuition $2 per week.

SAMUEL ANOINTS DAVID.—
1 Sam. 16:4-13.

Read Chapter 16.

Memory Verses: 11-13.

Golden Text: Man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart.—1 Sam. 16:7.

The Prophet and the King.

Saul's willfulness and disobedience in the matter of the Amalekites and Samuel's rebuke brought about a permanent rupture of the relations between the king and the prophet. Samuel went back to Ramah and Saul returned to Gibeah, and it is said that "Samuel came no more to see Saul until the day of his death." This break does not mean merely a break in the friendly relations of two men. It means an interruption of communications between God and Israel, a choking of the channel through which divine guidance had flowed to the government and life of the chosen people. Even in our day, when we do not believe in the union of church and state, we regard it as an unfortunate and serious condition when the sentiment of the religious leaders unanimously condemns a policy of the government. It was much more serious in the case of Israel.

How Long Will Thou Mourn?

Samuel's break with Saul was no personal pique. It was as the prophet of God that he withdrew. As a man and a friend of Saul, he mourned for him as for one dead. In fact Saul was politically and religiously dead. He had lost his opportunity, had wasted and misused his great powers. It is always a sight worthy of tears to see a man of great native ability or of exceptional opportunities throw them away. The wreck of Saul's character was great in proportion as his personality had been strong and his powers remarkable, and it was not unfitting that such a ruin should be an occasion of mourning. But mourning was not the duty of the hour. It was a time for action. The hour of failure is a first-rate time to make a fresh start. And Samuel was now called from his mourning over Saul to take the first steps toward selecting Saul's successor.

Jehovah's Repentance.

The most discouraging of all failures is the failure of some plan or enterprise which we were sure had God's approval. Such failures shake the very foundations of our faith in divine providence. Saul, who had been chosen by Jehovah and whom David afterward referred to repeatedly as "the Lord's anointed," had failed. It must have taken some special re-assurance and encouragement to convince Samuel that God had not made a fatal mistake. The assertion that "the Lord repented that he had made Saul king over Israel" (1 Sam. 15:35) is clearly a statement of God's attitude toward Saul as seen and interpreted from the human point of view. God's character and nature are unchangeable; and therefore his attitude toward men must change as the character of men changes. But when a man alters his attitude toward another—for example, to withdraw confidence from one who has shown himself unworthy—it is described as a repentance, i. e., a regret that he had ever so misplaced his confidence. So to one who thought of God under the form of man, it was natural to describe God's change of attitude toward Saul by saying that he "repented."

Fill Thy Horn With Oil.

When one is halted by one of those discouraging failures which seem at first sight to be God's failures as much as man's, it is hopeless to sit still and try to think the problem through to a satisfactory conclusion. Samuel might have spent all his declining years in unprofitable speculation as to why Jehovah should ever have chosen Saul for king, and his faith would have grown feebler all the while. But he was roused from his mourning, as we all need to be at times, by the command: "Fill thy horn with oil"—which is to say, prepare for some new enterprise, get ready for service, find in action the solution of your speculative difficulties—"and go."

The Pilgrimage to Bethlehem.

There is a striking parallel between this journey of the aged prophet to Bethlehem to anoint to the kingship a young shepherd, and the pilgrimage which was made to the same spot a thousand years later by the wise men of the East to hail a new-born king lying in a manger. Samuel was told to go to the house of Jesse, but was not told which son he was to anoint. God usually gives his instructions as he gave the manna—as needed. The journey was made with caution. The real motive must of course be concealed from Saul, who could not be expected to permit an act which meant the overthrow of his dynasty. So Samuel went as if to offer sacrifice, and doubtless did offer it, though it is not explicitly stated. The sacrifice furnished an explanation of the mission not only to the king if he happened to inquire, but also to the elders of Bethlehem who doubted at first whether the prophet's visit was motivated by good or evil intent. It might easily be that he came to rebuke or punish them for some sin. Perhaps the query, "comest thou peaceably?" was the cry of a burdened conscience which finds accusers on every hand and lives in constant expectation of rebuke.

The Sons of Jesse.

After his experience with Saul, who lacked nothing in appearance and physical prowess, it might have been expected that Samuel would know better than to choose Eliab or Abinadab or Shammah for the kingship solely or because of their commanding appearance. But it is a delusion that dies hard—the delusion that face and figure are the true index of man's or woman's worth. One gains nothing by rushing into the opposite delusion, the notion of asceticism, that there is a virtue in sheer ugliness. David himself, when he appeared after Samuel insisted upon seeing him, was "of a beautiful countenance and goodly to look upon." The truth is, physical beauty and excellence is a very good thing so far as it goes. There is no profit, and usually very little sincerity, in decrying it. David's elder brothers were not passed by because they were of splendid physique. But these physical qualities become really serviceable only when the right sort of heart lies back of them. A terrible responsibility rests upon one who by his charm of personality can lead men after him, just as a responsibility rests upon one who has the power to sway men by eloquent speech. The fundamental question in each case is, Will he lead them the right way? Will he sway them toward the truth? David.

There is nothing to indicate that David at the time of his anointing was a mere child as he is often pictured. In the next episode (1 Sam. 16:14-23), with no stated lapse of time intervening, finds him "a mighty man of valour, a man of war, prudent in affairs," as well as a skillful musician. It is in the latter capacity that he is brought into Saul's court to soothe the king by music when the melancholy and morbidness of his embittered life came upon him like a demon.

So the spirit of God was with David and was not with Saul. The old king had brought failure and disgrace upon himself and his family. Jehovah departed from him because he had departed from Jehovah. And the spirit of God was with David because David was willing to be used as God wanted to use him.

A Superintendence of Attendance.

The teacher is responsible for maintaining regularity of attendance upon the part of the scholars. An excellent method for holding the teacher accountable and at the same time "stopping the leak" in the school, is by the use of printed slips similar to this:

Date.....Teacher.....

Please report names and addresses of scholars absent to-day. It is desirable that you call on these this week if possible. Mark X the names of any you cannot visit this week.

Leave sufficient space for names and any needed comment.

If the superintendent of the school has not the time or qualifications for working details, appoint a "superintendent of attendance" who can give close attention to this work. Place a slip in the hands of each teacher at the beginning of the lesson period to be returned when reports are made up. These slips will afford the "superintendent of attendance" all needed information and enable him to look after the absentees in person or by note at once. At the same time this method constantly reminds the teacher of his own duty and has an educative value on the entire school. Some person qualified for the position of "superintendent of attendance" is needed in every school to look after the enlistment of new scholars and the attendance of old ones. The superintendent of the school can then give all his time to the executive management of the school and the direction of the teaching corps.

Midweek Prayer-MeetingBy Frank G. Tyrrell.
July 29.THE DUTY OF APPRECIATION.—1 Thes.
5:11-13; Matt. 26:6-13.

Is the art of appreciation one of the "lost arts?" It is something which all enjoy, a few exact, and still fewer receive. It is well called a duty, and if we will but discharge it, and so become familiar with it, we shall find it one of the most delightful.

Merited.

There are many who have earned our appreciation. They have loved us, toiled for us, and suffered, too; they have given themselves to us. Chief among this company are our parents. It is lamentable that the world does not appreciate its fathers and mothers until they have passed away, or at least, until the children are scattered from the home nest, and have children of their own. Teachers also come in for a large share of appreciation. They have guided, instructed, quickened, inspired us, until what we are is largely of their making. The great army of the world's workers have put us into their debt; the builders, clothiers, farmers, sailors, engineers, etc., have all earned our appreciation, as well as our money. And so, too, have the poets, artists, musicians, historians and teachers. In some way, however slight, the majority of those we meet, and multitudes whom we never meet, deserve our appreciation.

Unselfish.

Appreciation is profitable to him who gives it, for it flows forth from unselfishness and increases it. Even if one does not possess a generous nature, he has occasional generous moods; and it is such moods that brood appreciation. If we withhold appreciation, it argues either a thoughtless or a selfish nature,—inability to see good in others, or else indifference to the expression of it.

The alabaster cruse would never have been broken by a person whose heart was vitiated by selfishness. Beware how you court appreciation until you forget to give it; how you seek to live in the atmosphere of esteem until you are incapable of exercising it. For your own sake, as well as for the sake of others, practice the high and noble art of appreciation. It will make the miserable happy.

Gratifying.

"She hath wrought a good work upon me," said the Master. He was gratified with the costly gift. And so the aroma of appreciation always gratifies. It is the assurance that labor is not in vain; that toil and anguish have their reward. It is sweet to know that there are natures noble enough to respond with the meed of thanks or praise, for the work done in their behalf.

There is enough to vex and discourage the most earnest and valiant souls; let us deal largely in that which affords a goodly measure of gratification.

Inspiring.

The assurance that one is appreciated stimulates him. It is the best possible investment, for it improves the quality and increases the quantity of service. Appreciation inspires. It costs nothing at all, even in its most valuable forms, compared to the good it produces.

Hearts hunger for it. Praise is appreciation set to music. A flower in the sick room is better than a wreath on the coffin.

Prayer.

Teach us, O God, the divine art of appreciation. Enable us to think often of our blessings and our benefactors. May we give love to all, and may our lips, never withered by criticism, be ever fragrant with praise, until at last we ourselves shall hear the sweet, "Well done." Amen.

LESSONS FROM THE LIFE OF PAUL. I.
2 COR. 12:7-10.

The characteristic of Paul to which attention is called in this text is his patience in suffering. So great is Paul's name and so splendid is his reputation that we are apt to think of him as one who had but to speak and all who heard would believe and follow him. His missionary successes were so brilliant and the narrative of them is so simple that it seems that it must all have been very easy for Paul. But Paul's successes were not won by his brilliance, but by his patience and his willingness to suffer and be humiliated when such experience lay in the path of duty.

Paul had a "thorn in the flesh." We do not know what it was. Many have that that it was some trouble with his eyes, since we know that most of his epistles were written by an amanuensis and once, when he adds a few words with his own hand, he calls attention to the large letters which he made. But whatever it was, it was a grievous burden. Paul would have been more than human if he had not at first wished to be freed from it. He says "I besought the Lord thrice that it might depart from me." But it did not depart, and then Paul learned the lesson: "My grace is sufficient for thee," and he did not again ask that his affliction might be taken away. It was a small price to pay for the blessing which it brought.

Does it seem incredible that one should be even thankful for an affliction? It ought not to be so. Many Christians have in all sincerity recorded such thankfulness. Fanny Crosby, the hymn-writer, now eighty-three years old, whose sight was destroyed in infancy by a physician's blunder, says that if she should meet the physician now she would thank him; "and if perfect earthly sight were offered me to-morrow I would not accept it. Although it may have been a blunder on the physician's part, it was no mistake of God's."

So Paul learned to "glory in my weakness, that the power of Christ may rest upon me." A consciousness of one's own weakness is the first step toward seeking and finding the true strength that comes from above. Sometimes God has to deal very harshly with a man (apparently) to free him from the conceit of his own wisdom and power. He has to let us make ignominious failures and foolish mistakes till we are ready to seek divine guidance.

Two things show the real nature of a man—the way he takes his pleasures, and the way he takes his misfortunes. A man can be judged by his amusements, for they show what sort of things he enjoys. He can be judged by his misfortunes, for they show how he endures things which he does not enjoy.

But misfortunes are not simply to be endured. They are to be used. They must be turned to account and made to minister to one's usefulness or growth. It is not the attitude of Stoic or Spartan indifference that is called for, but the truly Christian attitude which looks beyond the present suffering to the final outcome of life, and gladly accepts pain and sorrow if these are the instruments by which God's plans are to be most effectively worked out.

HAY-FEVERAND ASTHMACURED BY THE Kola Plant.

A New and Positive Cure for HAY-FEVER and ASTHMA has been found in the Kola Plant, a rare botanic product of West African origin. So great are the powers of this New Remedy that in the short time since its discovery it has come into almost universal use in the hospitals of Europe and America for the cure of every form of Hay-Fever and Asthma. Its cures are really marvelous. Men, women and children who have been given up as incurable are being restored daily to perfect health by the use of Himalaya. Thousands of letters attesting its wonderful cures have been written the importers, but limited space prevents a detailed list. Read what a few have to say, proving that Hay-Fever and Asthma can be cured:

Mr. Frederick E. Wyatt, the noted Evangelist of Abilene, Texas, writes Jan. 31st, Himalaya permanently cured him of Hay-Fever and Asthma. He strongly recommends it to sufferers. Dr. W. H. Vail, a prominent physician of St. Louis, Mo., writes March 8th, that he used Himalaya on six different Hay-Fever patients last Fall with satisfactory results in every case. Mr. A. L. Clark, Springfield, Mo., writes Jan. 23d, was a sufferer of Hay-Fever and Asthma for thirty years and thought I would die every Fall. But Himalaya completely cured me. Mr. Geo. C. Dye, Marietta, Ohio, writes Jan. 26th, I was cured after several years suffering with Hay-Fever and Asthma. Mr. J. B. Ayle, Estherville, Iowa, writes Feb. 28th, that he was cured of Hay-Fever and Asthma after severe suffering for 23 years. Miss Eva Preston, Petersburg, Ind., writes March 8th, that she suffered untold misery for 18 years with Hay-Fever and Asthma. Is completely cured, although her physician said that a cure was impossible. Mr. E. B. Hume, 1345 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa., a widely-known traveler, writes Feb. 6d, Himalaya cured me of Asthma when everything else failed. Dr. J. R. Duncan, the oldest physician of Crawfordsville, Ind., writes Jan. 27th, it is my duty to tell all I can of the great virtue of Himalaya. Rev. J. L. Coombs, Martinsburg, W. Va., writes to the New York World, July 23rd, that it cured him of Asthma of 39 years' standing.

If you suffer from Hay-Fever and Asthma in any form, do not despair, but write at once to the Kola Importing Co., No. 1163 Broadway, New York City, N.Y., who in order to prove the power of this wonderful new botanic discovery will send you one Trial Case by mail, entirely free. Remember it costs you absolutely nothing.

Our Budget

—Our thanks are due for the many cheering and approving words now coming to us.

—We are glad the people welcomed us gladly in our present form, but gladder still they approve the attitude of the paper toward the great questions of our time.

—We know our readers will pardon us for reminding them that our special offer to the end of the year, with a premium attached for the sender, furnishes a splendid opportunity for them to manifest their friendship for the paper in a very practical way.

—We are gradually getting our departments adjusted to the new form, and in a few weeks our readers will feel quite at home with us. Our aim is to furnish as great variety of matter as possible so that readers of different tastes and different ages may find what they like.

—Push the canvass for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

—R. B. Havener began a meeting at Halltown, Mo., July 17.

—W. B. Craig has agreed to take up the work at Central Church, Denver, Col., Sept. 1.

—A. L. Criley has resigned the pastorate at Kellogg, Ia. His work there closes Aug. 31.

—C. E. Smith, formerly at Monessen, Pa., has taken charge of the church at Pine Flats, Pa.

—V. Hayes Miller has resigned as pastor at McMechen, W. Va.; resignation to take effect Sept. 1.

—J. F. Stone, formerly pastor at Huntington, W. Va., began work with the First Church at Findlay, Ohio.

—We are glad to welcome 105 new readers in the city of Columbus, Ohio, and 26 in Springfield, Ohio.

—S. K. White has removed from Fountain, Colo., to Windsor, Colo., accepting the pastorate at the latter place.

—The church at Edgar, Neb., has extended to E. W. Yocum a unanimous call to preach another year from Oct. 1.

—Geo. E. Lyon, of Lyons, Kans., will spend the month of August on a vacation at his old home in Eastern Tenn.

—We must have co-operation in our religious newspapers, as in every other department of our general work.

—Wallace Tharp, of Crawfordsville, Ind., has accepted a call to the pastorate of the First Church of Allegheny, Pa.

—The annual meeting of the Churches of Christ in the Maritime Provinces of Canada will be held in Pictou, N. S., Aug. 20-23.

—Let every friend of good literature join heartily in our campaign for increasing the circulation of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

—The Loveland, Colo., Church is raising a building fund and expects to have a beautiful church home dedicated early in the autumn.

—F. D. Power preached in the South Broadway (Denver, Colo.) Church, Sunday, July 12. He and Sister Power will spend some time in Colorado.

—The annual meeting of the Executive Committee of the International Sunday-school Association will be held at Winona Lake, Ind., August 6-10.

—F. P. Arthur, of Grand Rapids, is taking his summer vacation and the church is filling his pulpit meanwhile with preachers from Macatawa Park.

—T. P. Haley, of Kansas City, who came here in very poor health, is making steady improvement now and hopes soon to recover his wonted health.

—Jno. J. Higgs, pastor at Payson, Ill., preached the sermon on July 12, at the union meeting of all the churches in the Congregational Church building.

—The Christian churches of Jackson county, Mo., will hold a convention at Hickman's Mill, July 23, 24. The brethren at that place will entertain all who attend.

—During the first 15 days of July the Sunday-schools gave for foreign missions $10,918 67, a gain of $1,807.48. Every school should forward its offering at once.

—B. B. Tyler is preaching a series of sermons in the South Broadway Church, Denver, Colo., during July, which he calls the "Reason Why" series.

—Speak to your neighbor about subscribing for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. He ought to read it. It's the only way to get all the facts in an impartial way.

—As the religious newspaper helps every other interest and seeks to serve the welfare of the brotherhood, it has a right to expect reciprocity from the brotherhood.

—Evangelist Bennett writes that he has had 14 years' experience, is a leader of his own music and is open for engagements. He may be addressed at Box 121, Macatawa, Mich.

—J. P. McKnight, pastor at Oskaloosa, Iowa, is spending his vacation in the Summer Divinity School of Harvard University. Dean A. M. Haggard, of Drake University, is supplying the pulpit.

—J. W. Lowber, of Austin, Texas, is delivering a series of Sunday night addresses on "The Causes of and the Remedies for Crime," during the summer school of the University of Texas.

—J. Murray Taylor, pastor at Madison, Ind., is spending a few weeks in Colorado. He preached for the church at Golden, in that state, July 12. He reports the work in that field as prosperous.

—The success and popularity of the Disciples' Club of New York has encouraged the brethren in and about Boston to form a similar organization under the name of the Disciples' Social Union of Boston.

—Have you read "A Modern Plea for Ancient Truths"? If not, you ought to procure and read it at once. Although it has been published only a few months, the third edition is almost exhausted. Price 35 cents, postpaid.

—In another place in this issue will be found our offer to send the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST until Jan. 1, 1904 to a new subscriber for only sixty cents, or to two new subscribers, reported at the same time, for only one dollar.

—I am very busy, writes T. R. Hodgkinson, of Eldora, Ia., but I feel impelled to use a minute in telling you that Aylesworth's articles on "Faith" in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST are worth, to me, the year's subscription.

—E. B. Barnes, pastor at Noblesville, Ind., is able to be out again after a severe illness of seven weeks with malarial fever. He will spend the month of August in Canada. B. L. Smith addressed the Noblesville church, July 12.

—The church at Hopewell, Ill., wants a young preacher for half time. They can pay about $200 at present. Active man could soon make the work pay more. Communications should be addressed to Mrs. Carrie Shutt, Donnellson, Ill.

—President R. E. Hieronymous, of Eureka College, is spending a few days at Macatawa Park, recruiting his health. He says that he can note the improvement made each day, and hopes to return soon, greatly invigorated for his summer work.

—Herman P. Williams, writing from Manila, Philippine Islands, under date of June 2, says: "Baptized 5 natives 2 nights ago. Chapel finished in a few days. The printing press will be bought by American congregation. Everything in good shape."

—Grant E. Pike, recently of Sweetwater, Tex., called at this office last week as he was passing through, with his wife and family, to Alliance, Ohio. We regret to learn that Mrs. Pike's health has not improved during her residence in the south.

—J. F. Williams has resigned as pastor at Belle Vernon, Pa., because of demands made on his time by other matters in which he is interested. His successor has not yet been chosen. Applicants should address Elder J. M. Springer, Belle Vernon, Pa.

—John Williams, who lately resigned at Missouri Valley, Iowa, supplied the pulpit of the First Church, Joliet, Ill., last two Lord's days. The cause at Joliet is growing steadily and substantially, and the prospects of this faithful church were never better.

—Jos. C. Todd, pastor at Boonville, pays us the sincere compliment of sending in 19 new yearly subscriptions to the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST because he believes it will greatly benefit those who read it. Somehow we are partial to such commendations.

—Bro. W. R. Jinnett called at this office last Thursday, on his way from the Endeavor Convention at Denver, to his new pastorate at Earlinton, Ky. He has entirely recovered from his severe attack of typhoid-pneumonia and is in better health than before.

—We expect to find out before this canvass ends, who are the working friends of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, and their names will be written in a book of remembrance. We are already hearing from them, and we believe they constitute a great host.

—The new church at New Franklin, Mo., will be dedicated July 26. A cordial invitation is extended to all who can attend. There will be an old fashioned basket dinner. The provisions for entertaining those who come are very complete. Arthur N. Lindsey is pastor.

—President Ashley Johnson, of Kimberlin Heights, Tenn., called at the office of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST on his way to Girard, Ill., where he will spend a week preaching and visiting with the brethren. He reports a bright outlook for the school at Kimberlin Heights.

—The receipts for foreign missions during the first nine and one-half months of the missionary year amount to $157,809.02, or a gain of $14,813.97. A gain in the receipts of only $6,860.35 in the next two and one-half months will insure the $200,000. It will take work, but it can be done.

—During one year's pastorate of J. M. Morris, at South Haven and Hunnewell, Kans., there have been 43 additions, 22 of whom were by baptism. Both churches are making improvements in their buildings. During the year about $1,100 has been raised for home work and $150 for missions.

—The Sunday-school at Traverse City, Mich., observed Children's Day on July 12. Under the direction of Mrs. Guy B. Williamson they gave "Light and Life" before an audience of 800 people. Without any special appeal, the offering from the congregation was $65. Thos. P. Ullom is minister.

—Herbert Yeuell, of Uniontown, Pa., has been stirring up the town by an onslaught against the street fair or carnival in that place. The parties criticised are talking about slander suits and all that sort of thing. As a general proposition it is pretty hard to slander a street fair. Most of them are beneath it.

—John Lemmon, of Springfield, Ill., has recently given Eureka College $1,500. This was a generous offering to a great cause and ought to inspire the great brotherhood of Illinois to place Eureka College in the front rank of educational institutions in the state. It has a most honorable past and should have a great future.

—F. L. Davis, representative of the Benevolent Association for southern Illinois and western Kentucky and Tennessee, who is spending a few days at the headquarters of the association in this city, favored this office with a visit. The Benevolent Association can be said to be largely represented in the territory mentioned.

—The conference of young people and missions held at Lookout Mountain, Tenn., July 1-8, was a signal success. There were 164 delegates in attendance from 19 different states. The conference was interdenominational and embraced representatives of almost every church in the land. Thirteen young men and women volunteered for work in foreign lands and will be sent out by the various boards as soon as practicable. Every one present experienced a quickening and deepening of the spiritual life and went away determined to do more for the cause of world-wide missions throughout the coming year than ever before. We do trust that next year our people will have a large representation at this conference.

-The W. 4th Ave. Church, Columbus, Ohio, has made a splendid showing during the first 6 months of 1903. Children's Day offering, $100; last year, $40. Home missions, $67; last year, $33.89. Foreign missions, $50; last year, $31.46. Other mission work, $150. During the same term of 6 months, the pastor, M. E. Chatley, has made 342 calls and received 41 persons into the church.

-After trying for a year to do without the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, one of our western preachers gives up the attempt and petitions us to restore his name to our list. His request will be granted as he professes a complete cure from his foolishness. Don't try to do without this paper and don't let your neighbors do so either. See our special notice concerning new subscriptions.

-J. J. Limerick, pastor at Marceline, sends us the following report of his six months' works with that congregation, commencing May 1; three added to the membership by confession, two by letter and two reclaimed. For Salem Sunday school, located about seven miles in the country, he sends a detailed report showing an average attendance of twenty-seven and a total collection of $6.32.

-Unavoidable circumstances having delayed the collections for foreign and home missions at the church at Kingfisher, Okla., Sunday, July 12 was devoted to that important work. Isom Roberts, who took charge of the pastorate March 1, reports that the church raised $10 for foreign missions, a like amount for home missions and that the Bible-school raised $18.58 for foreign missions.

-In a letter just received from Wm. Reinfrey Hunt, Chu Cheo, China, he reports that the work in that land is being vigorously pushed. He says that the placing of the Bible College, with F. E. Meigs in charge, on a solid and permanent basis is one of the best things the brotherhood has ever done for foreign missions. The college is rapidly becoming self-supporting and will furnish the future preachers to carry on the work in that region.

-An old reader said to us recently, "I do not know whether the last issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST was so much better than usual, or whether it was because I gave it a more thorough reading than usual, that I seemed to appreciate it so much." It was probably the latter. We find it to be the case with ourselves that a hasty glance through a paper gives us no proper appreciation of its contents. Read carefully if you would appreciate fully.

-Much to the regret of the congregation at Webster City, Ia., H. F. Burns resigned the pastorate, July 12, resignation to take effect Oct. 1. During his brief ministration the church has prospered in both spiritual and financial affairs. Bro. Burns resigns that he may take a further course in his theological studies. He has not quite determined which school he will enter, either Chicago University or Yale. The committee appointed to secure his successor is composed of H. B. Hummell, J. D. McGuire, Dr. Elbert Storer, H. S. Lee and J. E. Clark.

-Geo. W. Hootman writes concerning the report of the Gideon convention published in last week's CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. The compositor did a good job, except in stating what I said of the all-day business meeting on Saturday. I said it was "punctuated" with songs, hallelujahs, praise the Lord, etc, while the compositor made me say "punctured," etc. I fear that this will leave the reader to conclude that we were a "windy" set over there and while the traveling man is famous for his talking ability, I am quite sure it was all used to the glory of God in that great meeting. So I protest against this evident unintentional "freedom of the press" in this special instance.

-Walter Scott Priest, who has served the church at Atchison, Kans., during the past eight years with such signal success, has accepted a unanimous call to the Central Church at Columbus, O. It will be a great sacrifice for the church at Atchison to give up Brother Priest for he is attached to the whole community by very strong ties, but there are reasons which urge him to the acceptance to the call at Columbus, chief among which is the fact that it brings him nearer his aged mother. The church in Columbus is to be congratulated in thus securing one of our most successful pastors and consecrated preachers, and we sincerely trust that the church at Atchison may find a worthy successor to their beloved and departing pastor.

-There is a significant conjunction of items in the last issue of our esteemed Cincinnati contemporary—the Christian Standard. We had suspected that there was a connection between the alleged libel suit of a California brother against the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, and the Standard's reason for refusing to publish the report of the trustees of the Berkeley Bible Seminary, that it would lay itself open to libel suit in doing so. The former was to give color to the latter. It needed color. Did the Christian Standard really fear that its California witnesses would bring libel suit against it for publishing the official report of the trustees? Those who think so ought not to stagger at any unreasonable proposition, but gulp it down. Now the Standard prints our regrets that its "Circulation Number" did not contain this report of the Berkeley Trustees, and follows it with a paragraph from the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST to the effect that Joseph W. Folk, of St. Louis, had been requested to prosecute us for criminal libel for publishing such report, as its complete vindication! This, on the surface, looks as if there were an understanding between the Christian Standard and its California co-adjutor, and that the latter had come to the assistance of his Cincinnati co-worker in its time of need. Does the Christian Standard imagine that the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST would be deterred from publishing an official report in the interest of truth and justice, because of any threat of a libel suit? If so, it does not know us. By the way, the Christian Standard calls in question the genuineness of the report of the trustees of Berkeley Bible Seminary saying, "It would take a search-warrant to discover who wrote it." What does it matter who wrote it, if the men whose names are attached to it approve it? Does the Standard mean to insinuate that this document is a forgery, without the sanction of the men whose names are attached to it? This is the culmination of injustice. And yet the Standard says "As soon as we can legally do so we shall publish it!" We would advise it first to satisfy itself of the genuineness of the document.

-The Christian Standard publishes the "Open Letter" by Jesse H. Hughes, which we declined to publish, and in a lengthy and labored editorial reads us quite a lecture on "honorable journalism!" By the way, it prints in its editorial a private and personal letter written to Bro. Hughes by the editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, without our consent. It may astonish the editor of the Christian Standard to know that there are papers, secular and religious, which do not regard this as "honorable journalism." It might well be that one would say in a personal letter what he would not care to publish to the world. But since the Christian Standard saw proper to print the "Open Letter" of Bro. Hughes, we are glad it also printed our reasons for refusing to publish this letter. Those reasons given in our personal letter to Bro. Hughes, are the only reply needed to the long editorial. The editor of the Standard comments on this personal letter as if he were ignorant of the fact that the policy outlined in it as respects the publication of charges against brethren, is that which is observed in every well-regulated newspaper office. It has been the rule of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST during its entire history, and it was formerly the rule in the office of the Christian Standard, that personal attacks on the character of brethren are not to be published; but that when an official report is made by the person or persons whose duty it is to investigate and report, such a report is to be published, and no private reply to such official report is admitted, which would mean a retrial of the case in the paper. The party feeling himself wronged may appeal to another tribunal. If the editor of the Standard does not recognize the wisdom of such a rule, he is hardly capable of giving lectures on "honorable journalism." In the case in hand, the report involving the name of Bro. Hughes, was made by the trustees of Berkeley Bible Seminary which had been attacked. They are the official custodians of that institution, and their report, as the Standard very well knows, touched the reputation of Bro. Hughes and others only so far as their defense of the Seminary and its dean made it necessary to do so. We regret exceedingly that the Standard should give its influence against this orderly method of settling difficulties, especially a difficulty which its own newspaper policy has brought about.

The Pope Is Dead.

On Tuesday, July 20, at 4:04 P. M. the aged Pope Leo XIII breathed his last after a struggle of sixteen days against death.

The news was received with mingled relief and regret; relief that his sufferings in the hopeless fight were ended; regret that the most intelligent, progressive and liberal of all the popes was no longer at the head of the Roman church. Leo will be rightfully known in history as a great man—not merely the occupant of a high office. He was truly wise; a keen observer of the trend of affairs and diplomat enough to keep in the current of them.

We believe he was animated by a more charitable, far more charitable spirit toward the Protestant world than any of his predecessors and did what he could to direct the teachings and actions of his church accordingly.

With the evils and failings of the Roman system our readers are sufficiently familiar, but in passing on Leo XIII as a man and as a pope, justice requires that we regard those which have been softened or removed rather than those that remain.

Let us hope that in the selection of his successor, if such there must be, that no backward step looking toward the diminution of that liberal and progressive spirit which has begun to manifest itself in certain quarters of the Roman church, be taken.

Death of C. P. Williamson.

The sudden death in Brooklyn, N. Y., on Thursday, July 16, of C. P. Williamson will cause sincere grief to the brethren. Although it was known that he had been in failing health for some time, his death was not expected and the shock is therefore greater.

He was widely known and admired for his usefulness, both as a preacher and as an educator, in both of which callings he met with success.

He was a native of Virginia, being born near Bowling Green, in that state and was the son of Gabriel Williamson, of the United States army. When a mere youth he enlisted in the Confederate army, and earned an enviable reputation as a soldier.

Forsaking the commercial life he had taken up at the close of the war, he entered the College of the Bible, Lexington, Ky., in 1868 to carry out his cherished purpose of equipping himself for the ministry, and graduated in 1872.

Four years later he completed his course in the College of Liberal Arts. He married in September, 1872, Miss Bettie Johnston, granddaughter of Jno. F. Johnston.

His educational work was with Hamilton College, Lexington, Ky., Madison Female Institute, Richmond, Ky., and Richmond Seminary, Richmond, Va. His most important pastoral work was at Atlanta, Ga.

Since March, 1901 his residence had been in Richmond, Va. To that city the bereaved wife has returned while the son accompanied the remains to Kentucky for burial.

Correspondence

Among Our New York Churches.

While this visit to America lasts I am anxious to learn as much as possible of our churches of Christ in such places as I have time and opportunity to visit. The more I see of my brethren in and around New York the more am I convinced that their efforts are destined to be crowned with success beyond the general expectation of the great American brotherhood. I am here at an unfavorable season of the year for seeing the churches in their proper strength, nevertheless, I have seen and heard enough to impress on my mind the idea that a fine forward movement is at hand.

The Seven Churches.

Our New York Churches of Christ have now reached the apocalyptic number. I will not begin to recite the history of these seven promising communities, put will simply glance at certain hopeful incidents and characteristics. I have already given an account of our brilliant brother who is leading the young congregation at East Orange, across the Hudson, Dr. R. P. Shepherd. Though this station is in New Jersey, it is solitary in that state, and is reckoned in the New York ring.

Last Sunday will be vividly remembered as long as I live. I was fortunate in being in New York on the very day when the members of the church on 169th Street were to lay the foundation stone of their new building. Emerson maintains that we are to estimate a man by what he has done. According to this criterion it is premature to attempt an adequate estimate of Pastor S. T. Willis, for though what he has done is admirable, he is still doing, and is going to do far more yet, if God should spare him the natural span of life. Belonging to the stalwart Kentucky stock, he has had a bright career. I have for many years noticed that the men usually best fitted for long usefulness in arduous city work are those who were cradled and reared in rustic surroundings. Brother Willis was reared on a farm. His record is interesting, and he is altogether a striking personality, being the incarnation of a peculiar blend of vivacity and stolidity rarely found. Very lively men are apt to be restless and nomadic, adopting the orbit of a comet for their ministerial circuit. Men of staying power are apt to become "stickit ministers" beyond the endurance of their congregations; therefore, the combination of sparkling fascination with indomitable tenacity in the same temperament is of immense value. Brother Willis was called to his New York sphere on Oct. 1, 1889. He and his wife, who is as indefatigable as himself, and belongs to Knoxville, Tenn., seem to be, if possible, more firmly riveted in their position than when I visited them four years ago. They are too well-known to the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for any further personal description to be needful. But I may say that I do not believe that Brother Willis would have succeeded as he has done in New York, but for his fine scholarship and culture, added to his possession of the proper spiritual gifts of a Christian minister. He is an excellent Hebrew scholar, and has gone through several years of study in connection with New York University.

169th Street Church.

A church of 200 members, located in Upper New York City, must naturally interest the whole brotherhood, especially when it is stepping forward in a new departure. On a plot valued at $20,000 the new sanctuary is to stand. Brother Willis on Sunday afternoon laid the stone himself. I had the honor of delivering one of the brief addresses. In the evening I preached to the congregation in the pretty Mission Church, which forms a branch of the work. The existence of this in itself shows how aggressive are Brother Willis and his people. They are in reality running two causes, so that in due time there will be an eighth church in New York. But for some time to come, during the process of building, the daughter will have to take in the mother, for the new building is to be erected on the site of the old, the latter having been demolished. I was informed that the work of preparing the foundations has been delayed somewhat seriously like many another building enterprise in the same city, through the effects of the great strike and the caprices of the walking delegates.

In Beautiful Brooklyn.

Brooklyn is my favorite spot in America. To its long, leafy, lovely avenues, stretching away for mile after mile across Long Island, my mind constantly turns when I am at home. Many of the members of the Sterling Place Church of Christ seem like my personal friends. Of this church the brightest hopes ought to be entertained, for it seems to have entered, under the pastorate of Dr. M. E. Harlan, on a career of splendid promise. This minister is an inspiration to everybody coming into contact with him. I have been reading with delight some of his "disputations" letters in the Brooklyn Daily Eagle. He has in its columns been sustaining a friendly war with Dr. Henson, the pastor of Hanson Place Baptist Church, Brooklyn, on the vital topic of "Christian Union," and he has even attacked certain positions adopted by that able and eloquent successor of Beecher in Plymouth Church, Dr. Hillis, whom I rejoice to acknowledge as my own personal friend. Brooklyn is famous for its preachers. They are as magnanimous as they are learned and diligent, and they have always been given to amicable controversy which is intensely interesting to the public. Brother Harlan tells me that he is to meet Dr. Henson in conference on Christian Unity. That is a sign of the times.

Greenpoint and Kensington.

Sterling Place has been fruitful in local mission work. Two promising Brooklyn branches owe their existence to its enterprise. Though these are not yet powerful, they are likely to become in their turn important centers of development. The churches planted at Greenpoint and Kensington will in due time be heard of. Bro. J. E. Keevil is the new pastor at Kensington. He is regarded with great esteem, and great results are expected from his ability and his energy. Greenpoint also will grow to need and support a minister of its own. Thus is the work in Brooklyn ramifying.

Lenox Avenue Union Church.

With special pleasure have I made the acquaintance of Bro. James P. Lichtenberger, pastor of the Third Church of Christ in New York Proper, situated on 119th Street, between Lenox and Fifth Avenues. It was organized in 1889 under the ministry of J. M. Philput, who resigned when suffering from debility after a severe attack of typhoid. Brother Lichtenberger is a man of most fascinating personality. He possesses that same attractiveness of aspect and manner which gives such a charm to R. J. Campbell, of the London City Temple. But he is also full of zeal and energy, and is in love with his work in New York. I never met with a more enthusiastic set of men than these New York ministers of ours. Our cause must succeed with such leaders as these. And I notice as I converse with them how their one wish seems to be to stay at their posts. Each seems to think he is in the right place, with the right church about him. So we are likely to make splendid progress in New York and Brooklyn.

First Church.

It has not been my good fortune to met with Bro. B. Q. Denham, pastor of the First Church, which is located at West 56th Street, New York. This is the mother church. Brother Denham has gone off to California for his vacation and has thus entered on regions in which I cannot follow him. But his praise is in all these churches. At this important sphere the beloved B. B. Tyler labored for 13 years. During Brother Denham's ministry the encouragement of minister and people has been constantly increasing. The membership has reached nearly 450. The cause is becoming a powerful and popular one.

Thus, it is evident that in New York and Brooklyn a magnificent harvest is destined to be reaped. Those who did the preliminary toil in earlier stages labored not in vain. And I shall return to England with the hope and expectation that there also, where the difficulties resemble those encountered by workers in New York, the tide may rise for our great encouragement and that of a sympathetic brotherhood.

WILLIAM DURBAN.

Brooklyn, N. Y.

South Africa for Christ.

We wish to spread before the readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST our reasons for believing South Africa to be the most inviting missionary field on earth to-day, promising the largest, quickest, most permanent and far-reaching results.

Natural resources. The Transvaal is the richest of any country in the world. Listen to Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Blelock and Mr. Farrar, who are authorities: "There will be great numbers going to develop not only the mineral resources of this country (Transvaal), but those still greater resources which we know to exist. In every kind of business occupation—manufacturing, industrial, mining—there must of necessity be great development, and this country (England) will be drawn upon for the majority, at all events, of those who carry out that development."—Chamberlain.

"It is self-evident that when American coal is one-half the price of British coal, provided the quality is nearly as good, then all the industries in which British coal secured to Great Britain a practical monopoly in the past, will, sooner or later, be wrested from her. The Transvaal has the raw material in as vast quantities, and probably of equal quality, to the raw materials of America. Why not found a Pittsburgh there and make the beginning of the inevitable change of situation of the great British iron industry? A few weeks ago this country (England) seemed to be seriously contemplating war with Russia about China, a country already thickly populated, and whose total export and import trade, with all her 400,000,000 and 5,000 years, is only about twice as much as that of the infant Transvaal."—Blelock.

"A country that produces $100,000,000 of gold per annum, and which has vast deposits of coal and iron, will one day be as prosperous as the United States of America."—Mr. Geo. Farrar.

"Those who have established branches or agencies in Johannesburg have not had long to wait for handsome returns. They are now settled, with splendid stores and warehouses, in the best business parts of the city, and doing extensive and growing business, and ready to take advantage of their position in the Chicago of South Africa."

This is not all idle talk. The Transvaal is divided into twenty districts (Transvaal is as big as Missouri and Louisiana together, with population, both white and Kaffir, of less than one-half million).

1. Pretoria, area 6,258 square miles, is part bush veld, part high veld. Bush veld is excellently adapted for grain and fruit trees; high veld for grain and cattle raising. . . . There is an abundance of water.

2. Patchefstrom, gold, iron, diamonds and copper found here. . . District is exceedingly well suited for agriculture and gardening.

3. Rustenburg, area 10,665 square miles. Gold, silver, copper, lead and iron are found. . . . All kind of grains and tropical plants grow magnificently. Translated from "Stad's Almanack," 1893.

Then look at Orange River Colony, in extent 50,000 square miles, as large as New York (49,000 square miles). The area is approximately 15,000,000 morgen (a morgen is 2,112 acres). Farms cannot be bought in the better districts under £2 ($10) a morgen (5 an acre). The whole area is healthy and eminently suitable for Europeans.

There is a wheat district in Oregon colony of about 2,000,000 acres, where wheat is of fine quality and good yield.

Mr. Blelock says: "It would be difficult to adequately describe the magnificent vigor-producing climate of the Transvaal high veld.

Time fails me to speak of the Natal country. See how railroads are building all over South Africa. It takes no prophet to tell that in twenty years will be accomplished in South Africa what took 100 years in this country. What does it all mean? 1. English speaking people. 2. A new people, new environment, good soil for the pure gospel. 3. Who are equal to the task of evangelization? They who, under somewhat similar conditions, did the work in this country. 4. What does it require? Enterprise, enthusiasm and the pioneer spirit. 5. Put the United States in South Africa, with its Pittsburgs, Chicagos and Denvers, and its all rail route into Asia, its clear water route all over the old world, it requires no prophet to tell the influence that will be exerted on these ancient un-Christian and anti-Christian civilizations.

Missouri Bible-School Notes.

R. B. Havenor did a fine work at Moundville, resulting in not only reviving the school, but in additions to the church, the one always influencing the other. He is now at Halltown, Lawrence county, hoping to put better methods into their work and more system into their exercises, while preaching Christ.

Lindenwood: O. T. Morgan, reports "68 enrolled in school Sunday before the campaign opened; 85 the first Sunday of the campaign; 114 second Sunday. Send more buttons." That's the report from all quarters where worked.

W. A. Moore has just visited Lucerne, Putnam county, new congregation, new house and now a new Bible-school with A. J. Fields, superintendent. R. W. Blunt, who has done such good work in north Missouri, has been prime mover in the work at Lucerne. In appreciation of what Brother Moore did for them and in co-operation with him in the good work of the Master, the brethren gave him $20 cash.

Senator Clay, superintendent at Farmington, reports their campaign closed with one of the happiest occasions—picnic—after a most interesting siege, the beginning of which showed 69 enrollment, the close, 107, and the offerings more than doubled.

Has your school sent in a report for the year ending April 30, 1903? How many on roll, not average attendance? How much to state Bible-school work, how much to home missions, to benevolence, to foreign missions, and how many conversions from the school? Please give us this immediately for the Second Year Book, which must be out on or before August 1.

J. T. Head is now in a meeting at Winona, fine prospects, and hopes to put the cause on substantial basis in that community. By the help of friends, the tent is nearly in sight. Will you lend a hand by sending one dollar to J. T. Head, Mountain View, Mo? We want to use the tent at Doe Run in August. Help quick.

J. T. McGarvey, writing cheerily of his work, says the Joplin convention assisted in quickening some of their membership who were slack before this, and their Bible-school is taking on new life in all its departments.

Bowling Green and Huntsville will enter upon the campaign, as the summer term does not seem to affect some people at all.

W. A. Moore has a county Bible-school convention at Harris; reports are that every minister in Sullivan promises to be present. Think of that, you laggards! The Harris brethren gave him $16.50 for state Bible-school work, feeling well compensated in the work by the good things given them by the evangelist.

The county and district conventions in north-west Missouri will be visited by W. A. Moore, and the brethren will help him and us by making dates in time and writing him so that he will be able to plan his work so as to be with you. Notify him of any and all changes.

The Year Book will go out without cost to our treasury by the kindness of the Harford Printing Company of this city.

H. F. DAVIS.

117 Locust St., St. Louis, Mo.

Dedication at St. Paul, Minnesota.

Some two years ago Bro. L. E. Scott took charge of a small mission church that had been organized in St. Paul numbering at that time some fifteen members. Through his faithful labors that number has been multiplied by three, so that now the church numbers forty-five. Of these, six are men, and thirty-nine are women. Not one of them owns the house they live in, and, while they are rich in faith and hope and good works, they are poor in this world's goods. Yet they have bought a good lot at the corner of Leech and McBoal streets, and have built them a beautiful house of worship costing $8,000.

On Lord's day July 12, the writer preached the opening sermon and dedicated this new and beautiful house.

At neither of the three services were there more than 200 people in the house at one time, and yet at these three services we raised in cash and good pledges the magnificent sum of $3,100. We have frequently at dedications raised many times more than the above amount, but never before have we known as large an amount raised from such a handful of brethren, practically representing no wealth at all. It was an evidence of devotion to the cause of Jesus Christ, and a willingness to sacrifice for it, such as we have never seen before.

We believe that the blessings of that God who loveth a cheerful giver, will be with this earnest, godly band of Disciples, and that a great congregation will be built up in that part of the beautiful city of St. Paul.

We have never met with a people where all seemed so fully to realize that "it is more blessed to give than to receive."

All the services were most inspiring, and we shall never forget our visit to one of the twin cities.

The First Church with Brother Harmon as pastor, is building an $18,000 house which will soon be completed.

Brother Harmon is doing good work in St. Paul. We were also glad to hear of the success of the good cause in Minneapolis. It was a great pleasure to meet Brother Abberly, an old Ohio friend, who now has charge of the Portland Avenue Church there. Several others of our preachers in the twin cities favored us with their presence and words of cheer and hope. Of course we visited beautiful Minnehaha Falls, and looked upon its "Laughing waters."

We are glad to know that the good cause of primitive Christianity is pushing ahead in this northwestern country.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers, that they offer one Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

Copper Cures Consumption.

When Doctoring and Travel Fail, There is Still Hope In That Greatest Remedy of Modern Times, Antidotum Tuberculose—The Home Cure for Consumption. Large Trial Treatment FREE. Write NOW.

One-sixth of the people who die every year, die of Consumption. This fact has furnished the problem with which medical men have been wrestling for ages.

O. K. BUCKHOUT, Chairman Kalamazoo Tuberculosis Remedy Co., Ltd., Member of National Association for the Prevention of Consumption.

England, Honorary President. And when O. K. Buckhout, a member of this honorable body, announces to the world in general that an actual cure for Consumption has at last been found in Antidotum Tuberculose, and when he further shows his faith by becoming identified with the company as its Chairman, it would seem proof indeed of its merits. Antidotum Tuberculose, the new and marvelous treatment is different from all others—cures where others fail. It exterminates the deadly Consumption germ, gives new life and strength. If you suffer from Consumption or fear that the disease is gaining a hold on you, write at once to the Kalamazoo Tuberculosis Remedy Co., Ltd., 1221 Main St., Kalamazoo, Mich., for the large free trial treatment. "A quarter per member this quarter for Mexico." This is the Junior rallying cry for this, the fourth and last quarter, this missionary year. Shall not Missouri Junior Christian Endeavors come up in September with this cry realized? You can, my dear young friends, if you each and all try real hard to do it. Think of the little children (and big ones, too) who will have no school building next year unless our little Juniors work hard to send the money to build it. I know some little boys who make from 30 to 50 cents a day selling lemonade. I know one little girl who makes money by sweeping and scrubbing the porches. Every bright boy or girl can earn enough to send a quarter for this building during August, if they only try. Only 25 cents. Will you send it, boys and girls? Will you help them, mothers and superintendents? "Train up a child in the way, etc."

State convention at Columbia the beautiful, Sept. 21-24. Every auxiliary should appoint a delegate and pay her expenses. A contingent fund should furnish the means. Try it, my sisters. Your delegate will bring back hope and enthusiasm.

Aiding Young Christians.

I consider "A Modern Plea for Ancient Truths," by J. H. Garrison, to be the best gem produced by our people in recent times, with malice toward none and charity for all, he speaks the truth in love. Its statement are clear cut and it emphasizes crucial points in our plea. It certainly is the best possible book to be put in the hands of the young Christian.

Brethren, Are You All Coming?

On Friday, July 24, Bethany Assembly, the national Chautauqua of the Christian Church, will open wide her gates, and most cordially invites our brethren to come in and enjoy the assembly meetings for the season of 1903. The program provides the best bill of fare ever presented to the Bethany family. All who attend will surely have a "feast of reason and a flow of soul." At no other place known to us can you find so delightful a place for your summer outing as at "dear old Bethany." Her beautiful campus with its abundant and delightful shade; its health-giving mineral water, where you can drink and bathe and have your health renewed; the delightful fellowships of "kindred in Christ;" the great sermons, lectures, entertainments, conventions, school for preachers, schools of methods; the special days, such as children's day, temperance day, Butler College day, Bethany rally day, patriotic day, etc., etc; the privilege of hearing such preachers on Lord's day as Stewart, of Chicago, Blount, Reed, Aylsworth, of Lincoln, Neb., Beattie, of Hiram, Ohio, Deweese, of Lexington, Ky., Dungan, of Canton, Mo., Hootman, Sniff, Smith, of Buffalo, Powell and Findley, of Chicago, coupled with the privileges of the assembly lectures, the concerts, entertainments, schools, etc., etc.—certainly you will want to enjoy this great feast of good things.

And then at no other similar assembly can you spend your outing with so little outlay of money. Tickets good for one day cost only 10 cents; for a whole week only 25 cents; for the entire season only 75 cents. This admits not only to the grounds, but to all the exercises of the assembly. And then you can buy tickets on all the lines of railroads operated by the Central Traffic Association in Indiana, at one-half fare. Buy your tickets to Bethany Park, Ind., not Brooklyn.

The Martinsville and Indianapolis inter-urban road runs through the assembly grounds. It gives hourly service from all points between Indianapolis and Martinsville. The hotel, annex, cottages, etc., in the hands of, and under the management of the Bethany Ladies' Aid Society, will give you fine entertainment.

So, brethren, take your wives and children, and come to Bethany during the sessions of the great Chautauqua, and you will never regret either the time or the money that it will cost you. L. L. CARPENTER, Pres.

Your Summer Vacation

Will be pleasant and invigorating if you spend it at some one of the lake or river resorts of Michigan. Write for booklet, "Michigan Summer Resorts," or "Fishing and Hunting in Michigan," beautifully illustrated publications giving details of the best places at which to spend a delightful vacation. Address all requests to H. F. Moeller, G. P. A., Pere Marquette R. R., Detroit, Mich.

A Hustling Church.

There have been added during the past year to the church at Steubenville, O., H. H. Moninger, pastor, 246, of which 182 were baptisms; 43 were granted letters and 9 were lost by death; 4 have been baptized, who have not as yet received the hand of fellowship, so the net gain for the year comes very near to 200. The present membership is over 900. The financial year ends April 1. From April 1, 1902, to April 1, 1903, the weekly subscriptions and loose collections have amounted to $2,507.93. All debts are paid, and we start the new year with a neat sum in the treasury. Receipts for the year from all sources, including the church debt, thank offering, regular offerings, Sunday-school and all, run about $6,000.

All missionary apportionments have been met, and a good increase is shown in all offerings. The offering for foreign missions was nearly three times as much as ever before. The church is now supporting Hirai San, a native minister in Osaka, Japan.

The missionary offerings, (not including the LaBelle View Mission or the money given by the two auxiliaries to the C. W. B. M.) were as follows: Foreign, $235; home, $60; state, $120.15. Total, $415.15.

The Right Mettle.

Kentucky University is to have in its student body next year a remarkable and promising young man, George M. Posey, of Indianapolis, Ind. He was employed at driving a delivery wagon for a butcher's shop in Indianapolis some five years ago when he took it in his head to obtain an education. He gave up his job, sent his grandmother, whom he had been supporting, to the country to her daughter and went down town and rented him a little room at a dollar a week, some friend having agreed to give him his meals at a restaurant until he could get on his feet. Then he went to the primary department of the public schools to sit with the little babies and begin his education. After a short time he naturally became involved in financial difficulties. Where his dollar a week was to come from he could not tell, but the people of the Third Christian church, of which he was a member, happened to hear of his struggles and they suggested to him to make up a newspaper route and they would take the afternoon paper from him. He immediately put this into practice and soon had a steady income of $3.50 per week. Meantime his grandmother had come back to town again and George rented the little rooms he had before and placed her in charge of his house. From that time forward for the past five years he supported her and took care of himself while in school. He raced clean through the public school system of Indianapolis from the primary grade to the last year in high school and in June graduated and won the interscholastic oratorical contest of the state of Indiana.

I chanced to tell this story to the editor of one of our local papers the other day and he immediately telegraphed to the young man, offering him a position on the city staff as reporter. George quickly accepted it and is in Lexington to-day serving on one of the daily papers and preparing to enter college next fall. He expects to graduate at Kentucky University and then to go on to Harvard Law School to fit himself for the legal profession. This is the kind of man who will be heard from in the future. BURRIS A. JENKINS.

A Constipation Cure That Actually Cures

is Vernal Saw Palmetto Berry Wine. It is not merely a relief. It permanently cures any kind of a case of constipation, no matter of how long standing. It is not a purgative nor an irritant cathartic. These simply lash and hurt the bowels, and bring but temporary relief. The condition left behind is worse than the first. Vernal Saw Palmetto Berry Wine does just the opposite. It is a tonic laxative of the highest order. It tones, strengthens and gives new life and vigor to the bowels. Only one small dose a day removes all the causes of the trouble, and leaves the bowels well and able to move themselves without the aid of medicines. It cures dyspepsia, kidney and liver troubles, indigestion, headaches, catarrh of the stomach, and all other diseases and conditions growing out of a clogged condition of the system. Try it, free. A sample bottle for the asking. Vernal Remedy Co., 19 Seneca Bldg., Buffalo, N. Y. Sold by all leading druggists.

North Central Indiana.

Our work at Logansport is prosperous as usual. We have had five additions to the congregation in the past five weeks, all excellent people. Yesterday morning at the 11 o'clock service, the house was filled with an excellent and attentive audience, and at the close of the sermon, Bro. Wilber R. D. Winters was formally set apart to the ministry by the elders. Elder G. N. Berry gave the charge to the young minister, the pastor read the scriptural charge and offered the dedicatory prayer. In the evening Rev. Yeats Hill, of the First Presbyterian Church, led in the opening prayer, and the pastor again preached on "Christian Power and Influence in the World." There was one addition by letter at the close.

We are sorry to report that our state evangelist, T. J. Legg and wife, have moved from here to Indianapolis, so as to be nearer their central field of labor. Brother Legg has for some years been one of the efficient elders in this faithful congregation. He will be greatly missed for his timely council, although he was absent much of the time on account of his arduous duties elsewhere in the state work. We understand that his absence, however, is only a temporary one.

Brother Milo Smith is now giving all of his time to Walton, Young America, and Onward. He is proving himself to be a preacher of power and ability.

Brother Edward Owers has taken up the work at Wolcott. They had their anniversary rally last Lord's day, and Monday, in the evening, the writer preached for them and assisted in raising the remainder of their $500 on the church property. They are now out of debt and have money in the treasury for church repairs. Brother Owers is a wise builder and an excellent leader and good preacher. He came to us some time ago from the Baptists in Buffalo, N. Y.

While at Remington, we found the church there in the care of Brother S. F. Rogers, formerly of Brook, Ind. He had gone to tempt the finny tribe on the beautiful Tippecanoe, so we missed his brotherly greeting.

Brother Parker informs us that their assembly will be better than ever. The Maxinkuckee assembly has every indication of going to high water mark this year. Many inquiries are coming in. The program is par excellent.

Des Moines Items.

As the Des Moines churches haven't been conspicuous in the papers recently, a little sketch of the present situation may not be amiss.

There are, of course, no large things to tell at this season, but conditions are perhaps as satisfactory as they ought to be, for if it were possible to reach such a Utopian state that we would be entirely satisfied, all incentive to further effort would probably be gone.

H. O. Breeden went to the Christian Endeavor convention at Denver, where he evidently gave one of the principal addresses, and from there to his regular summer resort at Grand Lake, Col.

The summer work at the Central is well cared for by Roy H. Caldwell, the wide-awake associate pastor. As the central group of churches have union evening services, Brother Caldwell will be heard at some of the missions Sunday evenings.

I. N. McCash will deliver the baccalaureate sermon at Highland Park College, July 26, and with other brethren, will spend the month of August at Spirit Lake, Ia. The supply of the University Church pulpit is not so much a question of who can be had as who to select.

T. J. Dow, of the East Side Church, is at his farm, among the lakes and forests in northern Minnesota, where he is investing his ministerial surplus and coaching himself for a farmer when he reaches the "dead line."

When these three brethren return, the Editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will have heavy competition in the line of "fish stories."

The church at Valley Junction, our western suburb, has a fine new building—much the best in the place—nearing completion. Park Avenue, at the southern limit in the direction of Fort Des Moines, our new army post, is building a parsonage.

Highland Park Church, at the northern extreme, near Highland Park College, is rejoicing in the payment of its debt and arranging to improve its house, while Grant Park, at the east end, has nearly liquidated its debt and is making good improvements.

We have three mission churches—South Side, Ninth and Shaw, and Chesterfield—in the recently inundated district.

The South Side building was completely wrecked by wind and thoroughly soaked directly afterward. The house at Ninth and Shaw was flooded to the window sills, and the one at Chesterfield considerably damaged by wind. The people in all these localities were driven from their homes and lost nearly everything. It looked as though no one could be induced to live in the path of such devastation again, but that whole region is already assuming much of its usual aspect. Those who did not return are replaced by others. Large plans are under consideration by citizens and city authorities for preventing future floods. The wrecked building has been sold, the lot traded for a higher one, and another church rented for use until further developments, and the Sunday-schools and church services resumed at each point.

H. H. Slayton, for nine years superintendent of the University Place Sunday-school, has gone to Chicago on account of business interests. The important vacancy is filled temporarily, until his return to Chicago University in the fall, by Prof. W. L. Carr.

The outlook for Drake University was never so bright as at the present time. The attendance during the past year was the largest in the history of the university, 1,208 not including the attendance at the summer schools. Many improvements will be made before the opening of the school this fall; the new Music Building costing $25,000, the new Medical Building $20,000, and various betterments such as a new heating plant for Science Hall, frescoing the Auditorium, laying of new walks, etc., being among the items of improvements. Donations to the university since September, 1902, now almost reach $100,000.

FOSTER.

F. A. Foster was born in Virginia, Feb. 19, 1836. In early manhood he served four years in the Confederate army. He came to Missouri in 1868 and engaged in the furniture business in Rockport. Was twice elected to the office of county treasurer, which he filled most acceptably. The latter years of his life were spent in Fairfax, Mo., where he died, June 7, 1903, loved and mourned by all.

J. GRESHAM.

GARRETTSON.

Edna M. Garrettson was called to her eternal home, July 1, 1903, after having blessed the world for nineteen years. She was a graduate of the Elyria high school, class of 1903, her death occurring two weeks after her graduation. She has now received a diploma given by the Savior, admitting her into his presence. In every relation of life she maintained the character of an affectionate, helpful and devoted Christian girl. She was a member of the Christian church, and her life was sweet, pure and good. She was fully prepared to meet her Savior.

MARTIN.

C. C. Martin, our beloved elder and staunch supporter of the church, passed away this morning. Funeral services, conducted by the writer, to be held in the church on Monday. The leading citizens of the city he served, will do him honor. The flags on the bridge are at half mast. At the hour of service Monday, all work and traffic on the Brooklyn Bridge will be stopped in honor of our illustrious brother. Our loss is great.

NORTHCUTT.

In August, 1901, Alexander S. Northcutt was stricken with paralysis and after patient endurance was released by death, July 1, 1903. He was born May 30, 1828, and on Nov. 3, 1863, was married to Mrs. Araminta P. Trevis, who, with three of their four children, survive. He was a member of the church nearly forty years, and lived a consistent Christian life.

G. F. ASSITER.

SUMMERS.

At the home of his daughter, Mrs. P. Wells, near Marling, Mo., July 9, after an illness of two weeks, C. L. Summers fell asleep at the age of eighty-four years. He was born in Boone county, Ky., Nov. 17, 1819, and removed to Pike county, Mo., in 1835, where he married Miss Sally A. Bryant five years later. Price's Branch church was organized in his home, and he was a helpful, faithful member until his death. His wife and one of his nine children have preceded him across the river.

G. F. ASSITER.

WESTFALL.

Born in Darke county, O., Nov. 22, 1828; died in Wichita, Kan., June 23, 1903, contains the opening and closing chapters in the life of John Westfall. He was a member of the Christian church for sixty years, and an elder for forty years of that time. Largely through his efforts was the church house at Valley Center built and the organization strengthened. He had made his home at Valley Center since 1883 until this spring, when he went to the home of his daughter, Mrs. L. Waller, in Wichita. He was a man of standing in his community, and his character was above reproach. His two daughters, Mrs. L. Waller, Wichita, Kan., and Mrs. W. P. Matlock, Emden, Ill., survive him.

ARKANSAS.—Eureka Springs, July 13.—Three confessions and two added otherwise at our regular services on the last two Lord's days.

COLORADO.—Denver, July 13.—Six additions to South Broadway Church yesterday. Four hundred and seventy-five in our Sunday-school.—B. B. TYLER.

ILLINOIS.—Watseka, July 15.—A most excellent lady confessed her faith in Jesus Christ at our morning service last Sunday, and two others were received into the fellowship of this congregation. Audiences fine for July.—B. S. FERRALL.

Martinton, July 13.—Three additions last month by confession and baptism; heads of families. Yesterday a young man united by letter.—T. F. RICHARDSON.

Bloomington, July 17.—A meeting at White-flock, near Plymouth, resulted in eight baptisms. A few faithful members were living in the vicinity, and they with the new members organized a church. We have time for a few more tabernacle and other meetings this fall.—J. ORVILLE WALTON AND WIFE, evangelists.

Camp Point, July 13.—One addition here yesterday. I have been supplying at home during my vacation.—R. A. OMER.

INDIANA.—State Line, July 14.—Held a four days' meeting at Old Union last week, resulting in five additions. Two others elsewhere recently. I engaged to preach for Old Union one Lord's day each month, and to hold a meeting this fall. Churches desiring meetings for fall or winter address me at State Line.—CHAS. E. SHULTZ.

IOWA.—Coon Rapids, July 13.—Chas. Gilbert Stout commenced a tabernacle meeting here last Friday. There were six additions on Lord's day.—M. C. HUTCHISON, pastor.

Shenandoah, July 13.—One added here yesterday by letter. We have gotten along well the first half of this year. The outlook for the future is good.—H. C. LITTLETON.

KANSAS.—Wichita, July 13.—Three accessions to South Lawrence Avenue Church yesterday, two by statement and one by confession and baptism.—W. T. McLAIN.

South Haven, July 17.—One added by statement, July 12.—J. M. MORRIS.

KENTUCKY.—Lexington, July 17.—A two weeks' meeting has just closed at Fairview, Grant county, Kentucky. There were twenty-four additions. The writer did the preaching, and Fred Carter, of Dry Ridge, Ky., led the singing. The meeting was opened by the dedication of their new church house. The work at Fairview is very encouraging.—W. A. BOGGESS.

MICHIGAN.—Saginaw, July 13.—An ideal day yesterday, fine hearing and two confessions; a wife in the morning and her husband at the evening service. Fourteen active members were added to the Christian Endeavor Society. The reception of these young Christians was made impressive by the president, Ralph Hoyt Wilson. Denver enthusiasm among us.—E. EVERETT COWPERTHWAIT.

MISSOURI.—St. Louis, July 15.—Two confessions at my regular appointment at Elvins last Lord's day. I baptized both converts before leaving for home, Monday morning. Our Bible-school and the other departments are constantly increasing in numbers. The idea has crept into the church that unless we have a "big protracted meeting" people hesitate about becoming Christians. While it is true that an experienced evangelist, with the help of a pastor, can do better work than can be done without such assistance, it is also a fact that no church can have a successful meeting without the hearty co-operation of its membership. Unity is strength.—J. G. M. LUTTENBERGER.

Rolla, July 13.—Meeting at Rolla ten days old; nine additions to date; interest growing; we hope for a great meeting.—JOSEPH GAYLOR.

St. Louis, July 19.—Additions reported yesterday were, West End Church, four by letter; Hammett Place, three by letter; First

WING ORGANS

We make the Wing Organs and sell them ourselves. They go direct from Factory to Home.

We do not employ agents or salesmen. When you buy a Wing Organ, you pay the actual cost of making it and our small wholesale profit. This profit that we charge is very small because of the large number of organs we sell. A single agent or dealer sells very few organs in a year and has to charge a large profit.

You save from $50. to $150.

by buying an organ direct from the factory.

Sent on Trial. We Pay Freight. No Money in Advance.

We will send a Wing Organ to any part of the United States on trial. We pay all freight charges in advance. We deliver the organ to your railroad depot free of expense to you. We do not ask for any advance payment or deposit. You can try the organ right in your home for 20 days, and if not satisfactory to you we will take it back entirely at our expense. You pay us nothing unless you keep the organ. There is absolutely no risk or expense to you.

EASY MONTHLY PAYMENTS. Thirty-four years' experience enables us to guarantee every Wing Organ for twelve years against any defect in tone, action, workmanship, or material. Wing Organs need absolutely no tuning. They have a sweet tone, easy action, very handsome case.

CATALOGUE.—A beautiful catalogue of Wing Organs containing handsome half-tone pictures will be sent free if you write.

field, of England, was closing a short address on what England may teach us, and I was about to introduce H. O. Breeden to speak to the great theme, "What America May Teach the Nations," when I observed the wind was rising and the side curtains of the great tent were being agitated, and I was about to speak a word to quiet the audience before presenting the speaker, when, in an instant, the wind swept under the tent and lifted it like a great balloon, and the heavy poles that supported it began swaying and falling. Down it came without a word of warning, the immense poles threatening to crush the thousands of people, or the canvas to suffocate them. Fortunately the poles came slowly, and the people could watch and avoid them. The center pole of great weight fell, crashing into the platform, demolishing the chair where I had been sitting, and crushing the piano behind me. Escaping the pole, I became entangled in the canvas, but with my pocket-knife very readily cut my way out. It seemed that no power could avert an awful calamity. Panic, the electric wires, the heavy beams that sustained the great structure, the immense burden of canvas, the ropes and electric lamps seemed to threaten fearful loss of life. By miracle all escaped. Only a few persons were slightly injured. Even under the debris of the great tabernacle before it ceased falling, voices were heard singing the doxology. There was not the slightest outcry or sign of panic. The people showed marvelous self-possession. No great multitude ever bore itself so well in time of great peril. After all it was no calamity. It taught a lesson of divine providence that will never be forgotten by the vast audience. We say "God taketh care of fools, children, and the United States." Surely we must add to the list the Christian Endeavor society.

Monday evening the tent was a wreck, and services of praise and thanksgiving to God for a great deliverance were held in the principal churches and thronged by thousands. H. O. Breeden's address at two of these meetings, and the presentation of the banners was made, and thousands of voices were heard in grateful praise and testimony. It was a fitting close to a most memorable convention. John Brandt presented an invitation to hold the next meeting in St. Louis, and offers came from Springfield and Minneapolis, but it is likely Baltimore will secure it. Only two of the trustees for the Disciples attended the convention, most of the old workers who figured in past conventions were not present, but the meeting was well up to the standard in all its features.

THE PULPIT

The Constraining Love of Christ By Robert Graham Frank

"For the love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that one died for all, therefore all died; and he died for all, that they that live should no longer live unto themselves, but unto him who for their sakes died and rose again. Wherefore we henceforth know no man after the flesh."—2 Cor. 5:14-17.

As regards their attractiveness, the invitations and the commandments of Christ present a very striking contrast. He calls men out of sin, but they have no sooner heard and answered his call than he sends them away to serve in the very swamps and cess-pools of sin. He lures men away from ignorance, and invites them to share his knowledge, but they no sooner enter into the enjoyment of his enlightening influence, than he sends them as his representatives to those places of earth where ignorance is deepest and darkest. He invites men to fellowship with himself, the highest, noblest and best of characters, and then sends them as ministers of mercy to the most ignoble and vicious of human kind. He calls men to the peaceful harbor and the safe anchor, and then sends them away to storm-swept seas and unlighted coasts. Contrast his, "Believe in me," and his "Love your enemies;" or his, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature;" and his "Come unto me . . . and I will give you rest." His calls are like the enchanted breathings of the Æolian harp attracting all men who come within its charmed circle, while his commands are like the blare of the war-trumpet calling men forth from home and ease to the hardships of the long march and the fierceness of the hard-fought battle. It is no wonder to me, that so many accept the invitations of the Master, nor is it any wonder that so many give such reluctant and half-hearted obedience to his commandments. Peter did a most human thing when he desired to build three tabernacles on the Mount of Transfiguration, and remain on its glory-smitten summit. And since his day all too many Christians have desired to imitate him in this human weakness. I wish in this sermon to indicate, explain, and apply Paul's great argument on the motive power which stands between the invitations and the commandments of Christ. What is it that brings us down from the mount of vision to the vale of duty?

Christ did not create religion or the philanthropy which flows from it, but his inestimable service for both is that he put a heart into them. Men had been religionists and philanthropists before the Advent, but when Christ came he brought with him a system of dynamics that had not before been used by teachers of religion and philanthropy.

Let me call your attention, shortly, to some of the systems proposed by teachers who preceded Christ. There were, first, those who moved their disciples to a sort of goodness—by arguments which, when stripped of all scholastic terminology, read as follows: "Give that you may get," "Go that you may come again laden with the fruits of your voyage," "Save men's lives so that they may again grow hungry, and buy your bread, and fill your coffers with gold." Who that knows anything of the insatiable greed of the human heart can for a moment doubt that arguments such as these moved men to a seeming service of their fellowmen? Such teachers made philanthropists of their pupils, but it was philanthropy of the poorest sort which they taught. It was crusted and frozen with selfishness. As soon as human greed, which was the motive power, had appeased its appetite, this sort of philanthropy broke down, and this "morality soon reached its last decrepitude."

Then came those teachers who used what is known as the "idealistic" motive. Humanity appeared so unlovable, so cynical, so ungrateful, that these teachers no longer sought to induce their pupils to serve man as man, but appealed to them to serve the men of flesh and blood about them as temporary incarnations of the ideal man who had his pure and endless existence in some upper realm. Their argument was, "In serving this unlovable man who begs at your door, you are really serving the ideal man of whom this one is but a poor manifestation." This is the argument of Plato's "Republic." This system is a decided improvement on the one proposed by the teachers of pure "egoism," but its fatal weakness appears when one considers the dullness of human ears which cannot hear the petitions of this ideal man from his shadowy realm, and when one remembers the poor sight of human eyes which does not see that misery that dwells in some far away and dreamy world. Thus, through the weakness of humanity, this system came to its failure.

Now Christ distinctly repudiates egoism. "When thou makest a dinner or a supper, call not thy friends, nor thy brethren, nor thy kinsmen, nor thy rich neighbors, lest haply they also bid thee again, and a recompense be made thee." No philanthropy whose motive power is selfishness can be Christian philanthropy. Christ used the "idealistic" motive, but not as preceding teachers had used it. "He gave the precept, 'Love all men,' and then set an image before the eyes of those who had been called to obey it, an ideal or type of man which is noble and amiable enough to raise the whole race, and make the meanest member of it sacred with reflected glory." He presented an ideal, but he was the ideal which he presented. He places such an investment of love upon the race, that his disciples can joyfully serve the meanest of men, knowing that "inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, ye did it unto me."

See, for a moment, how superior this system of Christ is to those which went before it. Down that narrow, grimy street, up those dark, foul stairs, in that cheerless, unfurnished room is to be found, on its bed of vermin-reeking straw, the disease-ridden form of one of earth's outcasts. Will the pupil of the egoist go there to serve that dying one? No, for there is no hope of gain there now. His service cannot be coined into gold, hence he will not go. Will the pupil of the abstract idealist find his way to that bedside, and minister some slight comfort to that aching heart? Maybe so, but all too likely that his dull eyes will be unable to see in that poor form there anything that is akin to his ideal man, and he, too, will be among those of whom Wordsworth says, they "Sigh for wretchedness,

Yet shun the wretched,
Nursing in some delicious solitude,
Their dainty loves and slothful sympathies."

But what of the disciple of Christ? Will he go to that room, and bring ease to that suffering body, and light to that dark heart? What motive will impel him to such service? Just this. He hears his Master saying, "If you go there and cool that aching brow, and cheer that desponding soul, and speak peace to that troubled heart, it is all the same in my estimation as if beneath the vaulted dome of some kingly palace you offered the richest of gifts to me." Thus it is that the love of Christ invested upon each and all men is the mighty motive to all Christian philanthropy.

This, as it seems to me, is the argument of Paul in our text: "The love of Christ constraineth us," because by his death for men Christ so identified himself with men, that all service of them is really service of the Christ who lived and died for them. And the conclusion is the very forceful statement, "Wherefore, we henceforth know no man after the flesh;" that is we know no man simply as a man, but as a man on whom Christ has invested the wealth of his divine love. "Thus Christians can dispense with philosophical phrases, and instead of saying that they love the ideal of man in man, can simply say and feel that they love Christ in every man." "Christ believed it possible to bind men to their kind, but on one condition, and that was that they were first bound fast to himself. He stood forth as the representative of men, he identified himself with the cause and the interest of all human beings. It matters no longer what quality men exhibit, amiable or unamiable, as brothers of Christ, as belonging to his sacred and consecrated kind, as objects of his love in life and death, they must be dear to all to whom he is dear." If Christ has made such an investment of love upon men, what shall be thought of the professed disciple of Christ who for any reasons of caste or creed or character shall refuse to serve with his best service all who in any way make demands upon him for help?

"If I can live
To make some pale face brighter,
Or to give
A second lustre to some tear-dimmed eye,
Or e'en impart
One throb of comfort
To some aching heart
Or cheer some wayworn soul
In passing by
My life, though bare,
Perhaps, of much that seemeth fair
To them of earth
Will not have been in vain"

There is no dominion comparable to the dominion of love. It is the motive of motives. Under its influence the mother gives herself up, mind and soul and body, to the gentle ministries of motherhood, and it is the motive that fires the patriot's heart, and sustains him on the march and battlefield. Greed, lust, hatred, and a host of other passions have held sway over the hearts and lives of men, but the power of none or all of them can for a moment compare with the power of love. Love shares her throne with no rival. Love opens the courts of glory and sends the messengers of heaven to minister on earth; love paved the way from the heavenly courts to Golgotha, and love, if enthroned in a human heart, will open wide its portals, and send all its powers trooping to the help of the needy and wretched of earth.

Nor does this gracious sovereign fail to shed a radiance in the hearts in which she is enthroned. Love reigning within the heart, insures light and life there.

"The night has a thousand eyes,
And the day but one,
Yet the light of the whole world dies
With the dying sun.
The mind has a thousand eyes,
And the heart but one,
Yet the light of the whole life dies,
When love is gone."

I have berries, grapes and peaches a year old, fresh as when picked. I used the California Cold Process. Do not heat or seal the fruit, just put it up cold, keeps perfectly fresh, and costs almost nothing; can put up a bushel in 10 minutes. Last year I sold directions to over 120 families in one week; anyone will pay a dollar for directions when they see the beautiful samples of fruit. As there are many people poor like myself, I consider it my duty to give my experience to such and feel confident anyone can make one or two hundred dollars round home in a few days. I will mail sample of fruit and full directions to any of your readers for nineteen (19) 2-cent stamps, which is only the actual cost of the samples, postage, etc. FRANCIS CASEY, St. Louis Mo.

Some Questions and the Answer.

Do you need any song books for church or Sunday-school?

Do you need Christian Endeavor supplies?

Do you need books for use by church and Sunday-school officials?

Does your church need a communion set?

Do you need any of the books written by prominent members of the Christian church?

The answer to the above question is, write the Christian Publishing Company, 1522 Locust St., St. Louis, Mo.

Bible characters are always interesting, and among our publications are to be found some well written books dealing with prominent persons mentioned in the Bible. "Queen Esther," written by M. M. Davis, is a vivid portrayal of the life of this queen, and many lessons are drawn from her wonderful career. Price, in cloth binding, $.75. "Elijah," by M. M. Davis, is a book containing the life of a great prophet and the lessons to be drawn from the study of this wonderful character. The book ranks high as a literary production. The book has 201 pages, cloth bound, price $.75 postpaid.

"King Saul," by Breckinridge Ellis, is a book that should be read by the worker in the Sunday-school of to-day. The Sunday-school lessons of the third quarter of the present year have King Saul as one of the prominent characters. It is an opportune time to read this book. The book has 281 pages, cloth binding, price $1 postpaid.

"In the Days of Jehu," by J. Breckinridge Ellis, is a book dealing with certain times in the history of Israel when the wicked Jezebel made all the nobles of Judah bow down to the worship of Baal. The book deals with an important period in Old Testament history; 189 pages, cloth, $.75.

Life of W. K. Pendleton, by F. D. Power, is a late book from our press. This book is the work of a skilled author, dealing with the life of a great and good man. The book contains more than 400 large pages and many fine illustrations. Price $1.50, postpaid. A few extracts from high testimonials follow:

"This is one of the most delightful volumes that has appeared from our press in many years. Bethany people, and thousands besides, will read it with the greatest interest and with the greatest pleasure."—Missionary Intelligence.

"This book ought to be owned and read by every preacher in Virginia. It is of absorbing interest to every Disciple interested in our pioneers and pioneer work."—Christian Monthly.

"A portraiture as charming as it is valuable. Dr. Power has performed a great service. The book is full of the personal charm of the subject and of the author. The life is a noble one—among the noblest and purest that are known to our annals—and it is worthily portrayed by a pen that ranks among the most skillful as well as the most delightful that is known to our literature to-day."—Christian Standard.

"Dr. Power's pre-eminent qualifications for the task undertaken by him are traceable not only to the fact of his long and intimate personal acquaintance with Dr. Pendleton, but also to his deep sympathy with him in his lofty aims and objects and his fellowship with him in his arduous labors and sacrifices."—J. The Unfinished Story.

You have told me, oh preacher, the story sweet—

How the prodigal son, bereft of pride,
Left the far country, with wayworn feet,
And returned to his father's house to bide.

You have told of the father, unfailing, fond;
You have told of the robe, the ring, the feast;
Of the long night's revel, all cares beyond,
Till the singing stars grew pale in the East.

But, oh, could I more of the tale invoke,
I would pray you tell me, thou man of God,
How it fared with the boy when the morrow broke,
And his feet the old pathways of duty trod.

How did he fare when his brother, cold—
Who never had strayed from the beaten path,
Or ever squandered his portion of gold—
Harbored his hatred and nursed his wrath?

Did he not, like others who countless are,
Off sit apart in the after nights,
And long to be under some distant star
And know again the forbidden slights?

Did he not forget that he ate with swine
And suffered sore 'neath the far-off skies;
Remembering only the nights of wine
And the light of the dancing woman's eyes?

Did he not grow frantic with equal days
And long for the wide world, prisoner-wise,
Till a horde rose up from the banished ways
To beckon and beckon with gleaming eyes?

If thus he fared, as we fare to-day,
Oh, speak, that the world may sing with joy.

And tell how the father could banish away
The beckoning hands from before the boy!
—Louis Dodge.

After the Explosion.

Every Sunday morning in one of the large churches of a country town a pew was filled to overflowing by the members of one family, the blond-haired young father and the dark eyed mother, with the five little ones between. There was hardly a proper step in the stairway of small heads, and none came far above the pew rail.

The people of the church had grown into the habit of smiling indulgently at the well filled pew, and perhaps envying the good management of the little mother, who could bring her entire family, so nearly arrayed, to an early church service. It is possible, too, that few of the congregation realized that their interest had confined itself to the smile across the pews, and the possible brief greeting at the church door. The man worked in a powder-mill just outside the limits of the town, and there, of course, he had to spend most of his time. The cares of the family prevented the wife's attendance upon the social affairs of the church, so that circumstances and not intention seemed to be to blame for the few intimate acquaintances the family had among the church people.

It happened on a Saturday, just at the usual early closing at the end of the week, when a part of the workers were already leaving the property and the rest attending to their final duties, that that awful heart-sickening explosion came.

For a moment it seemed that the very foundations of the earth were shaken. The streets of the village were lined with white faces of inquiry, in each one the question which a second thought answered. The mills on the outskirts of the town had been wrecked. In a few minutes it was learned that the flaxen-haired father, that faithful attendant at divine service, had been one of the victims.

Then it was that the church stepped forward, and enclosed the bereaved wife and the fatherless ones in its loving sympathy. No word of consolation or ministration of hand that tender heart could prompt was withheld. The widow recognized that this was not the spasmodic compassion of a sudden pity, but a tower of consolation, a sympathy to be leaned upon and trusted in, a love in which to take shelter. Her pastor, however, was shocked to know that this had come as a surprise to her.

"My husband often spoke of our having so few friends," she said, "and it was a great trouble to him, knowing he was always in such danger. 'If anything should happen to me,' he used to say, 'you and the children would have no one.' I only wish he could know what friends we have!" she exclaimed in tearful gratitude.

The pastor repeated this at a mid-week service, and his listeners sat in silence. They had indeed proved themselves friends in a time of need; yet this man had gone to work every day where his life was in constant jeopardy, believing that at any moment he might leave his family strangers in a strange land!

This had happened notwithstanding his membership in and constant attendance at a church called by His name. His fellow-worshippers had recognized the beauty of his faithful life, and loved him as their brother in Christ; but this recognition and love had not reached him across the pews. The church-members had not thought to show it, and the man had gone his lonely way without knowledge of it.

There had been nothing to mar the unity of the church, and the members, following, as they hoped, the teachings of the Master, had had confidence in their fraternal spirit; yet this humbling had come. They had stood in need of the experience. Do they stand alone?—Youth's Companion.

Irish Patriotism.

The attitude of the Irishman toward the country of his adoption is well shown in an incident related recently by an after-dinner speaker. The keen wit of the race is also evident. A certain Irishman, who was serving in the sutler's department in the Civil War, fell asleep on the field after the battle of Bull Run. Some Confederate scouts saw him; and, as he had no uniform, the leader awakened him and asked:

"Who are you? Where do you belong? What's your name?"

"Them's too many questions," says Pat, rubbing his eyes, "and be yure lave, I'll be afther askin' ye th' same."

"We're McClellan's men, just from Washington."

"I knew ye ware, gintleman, and I'm thot same."

"O, ho—that's where we've caught you. Put him under arrest, men! We belong to Beauregard's army."

"Thin ye lied to me, an' I suspectin' that same, I told ye the same thing ye told me," retorted the Irishman, promptly. "Now, give me the truth, an' I'll do the same by ye. What state do ye come from?"

"From South Carolina."

"So do I, an' from all the other states; an' that's where I'm thinkin' I've got the best of ye. Ye don't think I'd be sich a fule as to come all the way from Ireland to belong to wan state, do ye?"—Baptist Union.

The Inevitable.

I know not when the time shall come,
And neither do I care;
I'm sure the scenes will be more bright
Than I have seen while here;
For crowns and diadems of earth
And honors pass away
And lose their luster in the light
Of an eternal day.

As age comes on the stream of death,
To me, does not look wide,
For I now see a step will place
Me on the other side,
Among my old, familiar friends
In perfect joy and bliss,
Where friendship will be more complete
Than it has been in this.

Let the inevitable come,
I'll hail it with delight;
And leave this trembling house of clay
And gladly take my flight
To a brighter mansion in the skies,
And be forever blest
With those I loved so fondly here,
And ever with them rest.

I often long to go to them
And walk the golden street,
And dwell with rapture on the words
Of each one I shall meet;
But I am sure that this will be,
To me, the greatest joy,
To hold in my embrace and kiss
My darling little boy.

—J. H. Coffey.

The Price of Happiness.

"In the quest of happiness, in the attitude which we take toward the world, these things it behooveth us to mind.

"It is the things we desire that are our best index, and not the things that we have. It is willingness to pay the price of our happiness that gauges our real earnestness to have it. And it is not true that any other person's idea of happiness is 'all wrong' because it is not your idea or mine."

These are the concluding paragraphs of a paper by Miss Cara E. Laughlin, in the August Delineator, on the quest of happiness—a subject about which philosophers have busied themselves for some thousands of years, but a solution of which, adequate to all, none has been able to provide. Miss Laughlin does not offer any universal panacea, but some wholesome advice that may be taken to heart by many who are engaged in the pursuit of happiness.

Obeying Orders.

The Irishman that figures in the following anecdote would seem to have been excellently fitted to shine in some branches of the civil service where red tape is at a premium.

The late distinguished architect, Richard M. Hunt, used to relate that in his younger days, while he was supervising the erecting of a brick building, a recent arrival from Cork applied for a job, and was employed as a hod-carrier after being instructed that he must always carry up fourteen bricks in his hod.

One morning the supply of bricks ran out, and do his best the new man could find but thirteen to put in his hod. In answer to a loud yell from the street one of the masons on the sixth story staging shrieked down, "What do you want?"

"T'row me down a brick," said Pat, pointing to his hod, "to make me number good."

Failed to Locate It.

A young clergyman was preaching a sermon, when suddenly he lost the thread of his discourse, and, do what he would, he could not find it again.

The congregation was greatly embarrassed and was wondering what the matter was, when he startled it by exclaiming suddenly:

"Pardon me, my brethren, for pausing in my sermon, but it seems to me that I smell fire somewhere—and it might be as well to see that it has not broken out in the church or in any of the near-by houses."

He thought to stampede the audience, and thus get out of his embarrassment; but was surprised to see that they kept their places; in fact, part of them were asleep. One old pillar of the church bellowed out:

"Wherever the fire that you smell may be, it isn't in your sermon, parson!"

Hidden Treasures.

The ocean sweeps with restless tide,
And beats to foam 'gainst rock-ribbed shores;
Upon its heaving bosom glide
The snowy sails or bending oars.

Sometimes, so placid is its face,
The countless stars are mirrored there;
Or, trembling held in warm embrace,
The sunshine weaves mosaics rare.

But tho' the storm or sunshine sweeps
Its waves or lulls to peaceful rest,
Far down in its unchanging deeps
Are treasures gathered in its breast.

In these far depths how fair they lie—
The deep sea gems and coral caves,
Fore'er unseen by mortal eye,
All undisturbed by winds or waves.

So underneath the tide of life
The soul has its own deep-sea rest,
Where, undisturbed by care or strife,
Are gathered treasures, purest, best.

We lay these treasures up in store,
Against that day when God shall come
To count His priceless jewels o'er,
And gather us—His children—home.

The Round TableA NEW WEEKLY FOR GIRLS AND BOYS

EDITORS { W. W. DOWLING, Editor Our Young Folks, METTA A. DOWLING, Editor The Young Evangelist.

This New Paper is issued weekly and consists of eight pages of three columns each, printed on fine book paper, brand new type, in the best style of the art, and as far as appearance is concerned, will not suffer in comparison with any similar paper in the land.

For Whom Intended. THE ROUND TABLE is a paper for wide-awake, bright-eyed Boys and Girls in their "early teens," who are a little too old for The Young Evangelist and not quite far enough along in years and in their tastes and acquirements to be greatly interested in the material which goes into the columns of Our Young Folks, which is intended for young men and women who are engaged in Bible Study and Christian Work, especially along Sunday-school and Endeavor lines.

Its Contents. THE ROUND TABLE is quite distinctly a "Story Paper," five of its eight pages will usually be occupied with Serial and Shorter Stories, always pure in tone and instructive in character, with fine illustrations. The remaining pages will be filled with Table Talks on a great variety of themes; Odds and Ends of useful information; Outlines of the Sunday-school Lessons and Endeavor Topics; A Puzzle Drawer full of Riddles, Charades and Problems, to exercise the wits of young readers, and in each issue a sufficient amount of Pepper and Spice to keep its readers awake and smooth out any wrinkles that may have a tendency to gather in their faces.

Subscription Price. One copy, one year, 50 cents; in clubs of five, to one address, 40 cents each; in clubs of ten or more to one address, 36 cents each. Quarterly subscriptions at proportional rates.

Address. Christian Publishing Company,

1522 Locust Street,

My Mother's Faith.

The fire upon the hearth is low,
And there is stillness everywhere,
Like troubled spirits here and there
The firelight shadows fluttering go;
And as the shadows 'round me creep,
A childish treble breaks the gloom,
And softly, from a farther room
Comes, "Now I lay me down to sleep."

And somehow, with that little prayer
And that sweet treble in my ears,
My thoughts go back to distant years
And linger with a dear one there;
And, as I hear the child's amen,
My mother's faith comes back to me;
Crouched at her side I seem to be,
And mother holds my hands again.

O for an hour in that dear place!
O for the peace of that dear time!
O for that childish trust sublime!
O for a glimpse of mother's face!
Yet as the shadows 'round me creep,
I do not seem to be alone—
Sweet magic of that treble tone—
And "Now I lay me down to sleep."
—Eugene Field.

The Cabman's Gain.

A distinguished Edinburgh professor, desiring to go to church one wet Sunday, hired a cab. On reaching the church door, he tendered a shilling—the legal fare—to cabby, and was somewhat surprised to hear the cabman say, "Twa shillin', sir." The professor, fixing his eye on the extortioner, demanded why he charged two shillings, upon which the cabman dryly answered, "We wish to discourage traveling on the Sawbeth as much as possible, sir."

Track-Laying By Machine.

A new machine for laying railroad tracks is being used in Pennsylvania. It has proved itself capable, with a crew of forty men, of putting down two miles of track in a day. The track-layer has a huge crane, sixty feet long, which projects forward over the road, and it hauls behind it a train of sixteen flat cars loaded with ties and rails. A continuous double line of the latter moves forward over rollers and carries the ties with it. Both rails and ties are seized at the proper point by the machinery and placed on the road in front of the train, where they shortly form part of the track over which it passes. This device is said to be the most rapid and the most economical mechanical track-layer invented.—Success.

Facetious.

A Buffalo woman, while shopping the other day, thoughtlessly picked up an umbrella belonging to another woman and started to walk off with it. The owner stopped her and the absent-minded woman, with many apologies, returned the umbrella.

The incident served to remind her that they needed some umbrellas in her own family, so she bought two for her daughters and one for herself.

Later in the day, when she was on her way home, armed with three umbrellas, she happened to glance up, and saw, directly opposite her in the car, the very woman with whom she had had the unfortunate experience in the morning.

The second woman stared at the three umbrellas very hard for several minutes, and then, with a significant smile, she leaned forward and said in an icy tone, "I see you have had a successful morning."—Ram's Horn.

Half and Half.

I guess there never was a spot
Where shadders didn't fall;
But shadder's just the other side
Of sunshine after all.
An' there ain't no use in fumin'
When the world seems out o' gear,
Fer music's always in the air,
An' love, an' song an' cheer
Jest keep a feller's spirits up,
An' kinder make him glad,
An' come what will, he's bound to think
Life ain't so awful sad.
Sometimes a feller has ter weep.
Sometimes he has ter laugh,
The shadders an' the sunshine mix,
Jest kinder half an' half.

The Preacher's Geography.

Mr. Amos Boggs had his own ideas as to what constituted a good sermon. When he was asked his opinion of the learned discourse given by a clergyman from the great city, who was spending a few days in the village, he stroked his beard and replied:

"If there was anybody there that wanted to find out the road to heaven, they'd have been a big bit disappointed, I reckon," he said slowly; "but if they wanted to know how to get from Egypt to Jerico and back, they'd have found out." — Christian Endeavor World.

"Dear me," said May, scornfully. "The idea of your being afraid of old Towser, a poor old house-dog! Why, he eats out of my hand!"

"I don't doubt it," replied Skeers, dubiously. "What I am afraid of is that he may take a notion to eat out of my leg."

A Scotsman went to London for a holiday. Walking along one of the streets, he noticed a bald-headed chemist standing at his shop door, and inquired if he had any hair-restorer.

"Yes, sir," said the chemist, "step inside, please. There's an article I can recommend. Testimonials from great men who have used it. It makes the hair grow in twenty-four hours."

"Aweel," said the Scot, "ye can gie the top o' yer heid a bit rub wi' t, and I'll look back the morn and see if ye're tellin' the truth."

The chemist returned the bottle to the shelf, and kicked the errand-boy for laughing.

A Delightful Place to Spend the Summer.

With the Children

By J. Breckenridge Ellis

Mary Haymaker, Wichita, Kan.: "Will it be absolutely necessary for me to count the exact number of lines of poetry I read? I have been reading Pope's 'Essay on Man' and Scott's 'Lady of the Lake,' and will it do if I count the lines on a page and multiply by the number of pages, making sure I do not overestimate my work?" (Certainly; when you read poetry in a wholesale manner like that, the exact number of lines doesn't matter.)

Bertha Beesley, Moselle, Mo.: "How dare you say that I would fail in taking the teacher's examination?" (I'm not afraid of you!) "I am almost angry with you for it, and I didn't fail, so you see you spoke too quickly. My chum and I received second grade certificates last Thursday. I suppose I will teach next winter, and thanks to Lizzie McLain for her sympathy, as I shall be likely to need it. As to being a little girl, I am not old, but only —. But there! I won't tell you. I was a little girl when I joined the Advance Society, but a person can grow a good deal in four and a half years" (and not know much more, either). "How did you spend the Fourth of July?" (I got beaten in four games of chess, I played flinch, and I went over to the tennis court with a box of torpedoes. I was with some girls who are just big enough not to want to be called little. Well, when the tennis players would be called so serve a ball, I would give one of the girls a torpedo and she would explode it right behind the player. Then the player would jump and we would laugh and it was lots of fun, because it wasn't / making the disturbance, it was the girl who shot off the torpedo, and / couldn't help it making a noise. And at night I had fireworks.) "I went fishing, but didn't catch any fish. I had a good time and a pleasant drive" (and the fish a peaceful swim). "I hunted for measles." (I thought you had already found that). "I found a live one buried in the mud." (Let me go back and look at that word. Oh! it was mussels, it wasn't measles at all.) "When I took it out, the mussel closed its shell and I didn't get to see it." (Once I hunted mussels and found live ones, when I was visiting in the country. We showed 'em about hiding from us! We went right into the shell, and brought them out and cooked them at a camp-fire. You know mussels are like oysters; there isn't any part to throw away; you eat all of it; it isn't like chickens, for instance, which are not all good. We fried the mussels like you do oysters, and they smelled the oyster smell, but there seemed to be something in the taste that ought to have been left out.) "Where is Madge Masters? We haven't heard from her lately. I'm writing too often" (Oh, no!) "so I shall not write again soon" (Oh, yes!) "I just wanted to tell you I didn't fail." (Knew you wouldn't.)

Address. E. L. BARHAM, President, Camden Point, Mo.

I have been busy with a show. The neighborhood children have been wanting to have a show, so Louise and I got one up. I had nearly every bit of the work to do. We have a barn that is never used. It has a carpet on the floor and is furnished for a playhouse. Knowing the barn would not be large enough to hold the audience and the stage, too, we built a tent for the audience on the outside of the barn. The barn was the stage, and the sliding door was the curtain. I will tell what we had in the show. If you have read 'The Bird's Christmas Carol,' you will recall the chapter about the Ruggles family preparing to go to Carol Bird's Christmas dinner party. We played that chapter; I had to be Mrs. Ruggles. Poor Mrs. Ruggles! Such a time as I did have! There were several boys in it, and they were just terrible. The girls were all right, but my! those boys. I had so much to learn, I thought I could never get through with it. Our costumes were worth traveling to see. We got along all right with that, but Larry, when he fell, turned over a bucket of ice water and drenched us all. This didn't matter, as the audience thought it a part of the performance. Next was a play, Louise, my twin sister, wrote—'Aunt Jane and Her Sister's Children.' Aunt Jane could scarcely manage her nephews and niece. She wore a costume in style 20 years ago. The third was a funny dialogue in a railroad station. Mrs. Buttermilk comes into the station with her small son. She wants to go to Mauro, and the ticket agent thinks she says she wants to go to-morrow. They have it up and down. I played the role of Mrs. Buttermilk. Johnny Buttermilk says he is hungry, and his mother opens a basket and searches for gingerbread. She is on her way to her sister-in-law's son's wife, and she is taking a great many kinds of medicines to the sister-in-law's son's wife, who is sick. As she takes them out, she asks the ticket agent if he is subject to such things as they cure, till he is quite out of patience. At last she finds the gingerbread and just then hears the train. In trying to get all her things back, she gets nervous, starts after the train, loses all her things and misses the train. There was one other dialogue between a deaf lady and a tramp, and that was all besides a few recitations between acts. We took in $3.80, and the audience numbered 58. I suppose you would call our show a success. I don't believe I ever told you I won a gold medal. In our school, medals are awarded in memory of a Mr. Wm. McCoy, who died a few years ago. At the end of school they have a spelling contest in each grade, and I received the gold medal in the 7th grade. In the first year of high school, medals are given for reading. I intend to try for it next fall. I send in my 4th Av. S. report. My favorite quotation is from Goldsmith: 'Our greatest glory is not in never falling, but in rising every time we fall.' You were talking about the Av. S. meeting at the St. Louis Fair. I propose we have colors. Our pins are rather small—we might pass by a member without seeing the pin, while we would see the colors—and some members haven't the Av. S. pin. I hope you will put this before the society; we can decide upon the colors later. My! I had better close before you get tired of this letter—I did not know I had written so much. Good-bye." (You see I don't think it too much, for I have put in the very last word. As to colors, we have always been vague on that subject, allowing the members to take any three they pleased, so old gold was one of them. But I believe it would be best to have the same for everybody. I am going to let the society choose its own colors; let's have two—that's enough—and "Av. S." can be worked on them in a third color or not, just as you please, or are able. Vote on the two colors you think would go best together, and I will decide for the majority vote. I will give you the rest of this month and all of August to get in your votes. I would like to hear from everybody—the sooner the better.

THE MEDITATION OF A TROUBLED SPIRIT

See page 132.)*

Leo, the destined hour! Now must thou hence
And, as thy merits, take the endless way.

What lot awaits thee? Heavenly joy, thy gifts
Which God had freely given, bade thee hope—

But the great Keys! A trust of mighty weight
And borne so long—thou groanest at the thought;

For he who leads in honor all the rest
Must, if he fail, the keener suffering bear.

Amid thy fears, there comes a gentle face,
A gentler voice speaks comfort to the heart:

“Why does fear shake thee? Why, on gazing back O’er thy long past, should sadness stir thy soul?”

“The pitying Christ is here: He gives his grace
To those that seek. Have faith—He beareth all.”

What We Stand For.

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

Pope Leo is dead. While the church mourns nine days for its pontiff, the administration is in the hands of an executive council, headed by the chamberlain or Cardinal Camerlengo, a position which Leo himself held immediately prior to his own election. Within a few days the sixty-three cardinals of the Roman church will assemble in conclave for the election of a new pope. It is predicted that a choice will be made with but little delay, and we may well spare ourselves the task of attempting to anticipate the decision—a task which, even in the most capable hands, issues only in a confession of ignorance. Indeed, the choice of a pope is one of the hardest matters in the world to predict. Half of the cardinals are Italians, with an inherited genius for indirect methods; all of them are schooled in ecclesiastical statecraft. The manipulations of a political convention or the tactics of a presidential campaign in this country is mere child's play compared with the subtle influences which are brought to bear in the election of a pope. Before the balloting begins, the cardinals will be shut up in a building, the doors and most of the windows of which will be completely walled up by masons. This is to prevent them from being reached by any corrupt influences from without. Equal precautions are taken to prevent intercourse with each other while the balloting is in progress. But these measures are based on the naive assumption that political maneuvering could not possibly begin until the cardinals are shut up in the conclave. In reality, the issue will doubtless be virtually decided before they meet. It may be Rampolla, or Gotti, or Vannutelli, or Oreglia, or Celatro, or any one of several others. The only important issue, so far as outsiders are concerned, is whether the new pope will be of the irreconcilable and reactionary type, or inclined to view with toleration the liberal movements within the church.

The papal policy during Leo's pontificate may be stated in brief as follows: religiously, it was to encourage purity of life and true devotion; ecclesiastically, it was to strengthen the authority of the hierarchy, to make the church an absolute monarchy under the sovereignty of the pope, and to repress all movements looking toward greater freedom of thought or action for the individual; politically, it was to maintain a relentless hostility toward those who had deprived the papacy of its temporal sovereignty, to cherish a hope of its restoration, and to make all possible approaches to every government except Italy with a view to securing recognition as an sovereign power. When the papacy was deprived of its temporal power and the "Patrimony of Peter" became a part of united Italy, during the pontificate of Leo's immediate predecessor, a very generous provision was made for the pontiff's personal and official freedom. The terms of settlement gave him an annual allowance of about $600,000 from the public treasury, the Vatican and Lateran palaces perpetually free from taxes, the right to maintain armed guards and an independent postal and telegraph system, the privilege of receiving foreign ambassadors to whom are given the same assurances of protection as are accorded to ambassadors to the King of Italy, a guarantee of freedom for himself and his official representatives in the discharge of their spiritual functions, and an agreement that the palaces and grounds of the pontiff should not, under any circumstances, be entered by the police or by officers of the law in the discharge of their duty. In short, every possible assurance was given that the officers of the church would not be interfered with in the discharge of their spiritual duties, and these assurances have been fully lived up to. But both Pius IX and Leo XIII continued through their long reigns—the longest in the entire history of the papacy—to speak as if they were grievously hindered in their religious work. They locked their palace doors on the inside and called themselves prisoners. They refused to accept the very generous appropriation and alleged that they were being robbed. It is to be earnestly hoped that the next pope will be able to see the absurdity of this position and will content himself with being the head of the greatest ecclesiastical organization in the world without mourning over the temporal sovereignty that is gone never to return. The time is past when the Roman church has anything to gain by clinging to the fiction that its two keys represent spiritual and temporal dominion.

A complete chronicle of the lynchings of the past few weeks would be too long and too horrible for publication. The Wilmington outrage, the Evansville riot and the Danville disgrace are only the most prominent among dozens of cases scarcely less bad. The newspapers are flooded with such records. If one flees from the glaring headlines on the first page, it is only to be confronted with condensed tales of horror among the minor news. Justice Brewer, of the United States Supreme Court, in a recent address at Milwaukee, urged that every participant in a lynching should be considered a murderer, as he is in the eyes of the law, and should be treated accordingly. This is no new doctrine. It is so obviously true that it seems impossible for anyone to take the opposite view. But to put it into effect is a more difficult matter, for it involves an enlightened public opinion and an educated public conscience which will not only admit the criminality of lynching as a proposition of law, but will really feel that the lyncher is as guilty as the murderer and will support a prosecution accordingly. And while we are devising ways and means of punishing those who thus insult the law and outrage justice, it will be worth while to consider whether this lawlessness is not encouraged (we will not say extenuated, much less excused) by the delays and technicalities which embarrass the administration of justice in the courts. The maxim that "it is better for a thousand criminals to go unpunished than for one innocent man to be punished" sounds very humanitarian. But is it surprising if some grow impatient and arise in their wrath and go after one of the thousand guilty ones whose escape from the established machinery of justice they have reason to fear? Let us punish the lynchers; and let us also not be above learning a lesson from it for the improvement of our legal processes.

Judge Gray, of Delaware, has been mentioned for the Democratic nomination for the presidency next year. His great strength would be in Pennsylvania, where he gained great popularity through his work as chairman of the anthracite arbitration tribunal last year. It is believed that his sympathies were with the gold Democrats in 1896; certainly he has never been an exponent of the doctrines represented by Mr. Bryan. But he has taken no prominent part in the fight over which the party divided, and might therefore be acceptable to both wings. It would, however, be somewhat singular for the Democrats to nominate a man who owes his present prominence chiefly to appointments which he received from Republican presidents. President McKinley appointed him on the Paris peace commission which negotiated the treaty at the close of the Spanish war, and President Roosevelt appointed him a member of the strike commission. Little as the issue of imperialism is now worth to the Democracy, it would probably be worth still less in a campaign where the Democratic ticket was headed by one of the men who helped to draft the treaty under which the Philippines were acquired.

An Epidemic of Lynching.

A New Candidate.

An incident which took place in the Georgia legislature early in the present month should be well considered by those who interpret the southern attitude on the negro question as one of hostility to the race. A resolution was introduced to the effect that the money raised by taxation for common schools should be divided between the schools for whites and those for blacks in proportion to the taxable property of the two races. On the surface, this proposal has some appearance of fairness. It meant simply that the schools for each race should be supported by taxation of the property of that race. The resolution was overwhelmingly defeated, and very wisely so. Practically all the taxable property is in the hands of the whites. If this resolution had become a law it would virtually have put an end to the colored schools. The people in the South know quite as well as those in the North that it is a dangerous policy to keep the negroes in ignorance; what is more, they are willing to tax themselves for the maintenance of negro schools. The action of the Georgia legislature is to be commended. The Alabama legislature will do well to show the same spirit and intelligence in enacting some effective legislation for the prevention of the form of peonage which has been existing in that state for many years.

Leo XIII would have been famous as a scholar if he had not been famous as an administrator. The composition of Latin poetry was ever one of his most congenial diversions. When he believed that he was on his death bed he dictated the following poem, an English translation of which by Professor Harry Thurston Peck appears on the cover of this paper. The poem has just now been given to the public and we are able to publish it so promptly through the kindness of the Independent.

INGEMISCENTIS ANAMAE MEDITATIO

Fatalis ruit hora, Leo: jam tempus abire est,
Pro meritisque viam carpere perpetuam.

Quae te sors maneat? caelum sperare iubebant,
Largus contulerat quae tibi dona Deus.

At summae claves, immenso pondere munus
Tot tibi gestum annos, haec meditare gemens;

Qui namque in populis excelso praestat honore,
Hei misero, poenas acrius inde luet.

Haec inter trepido dulcis succurrit imago,
Dulcior atque animo vox sonat alloqui:

Quid te tanta premit formido? aevique peracti
Quid seriem repetens, tristitia corde foves?

Christus adest miserans: humili veniamque roganti
Erratum, ah fidas! eluet omne tibi.

When Christian union becomes a theme for encouraging comment in the secular press, it is a fair sign that it is being recognized as a vital issue affecting important interests in our national life. The following note from Leslie's Weekly calls attention to a phase of the union movement which is just now promising some practical results.

"Nothing so gratifying and so promising for the future has occurred in the realm of church life and work during the present year as the various movements set on foot for a reunion among the separated branches of several denominations and also for a larger degree of unity and co-operation among the churches generally, irrespective of denominational lines. More and more the feeling is growing among earnest and thoughtful churchmen of all sects and creeds that the churches are wasting valuable means and energies by keeping up so many divisions among themselves; and that while organic unity among all denominations in Christendom must be regarded as impracticable, even if it were desirable, there is no good reason why, for example, the Baptists should be split up among themselves into thirteen distinct and separate bodies, the Methodists into seventeen, or the Presbyterians into twelve, and it is evident enough that until something is done to bring the scattered members of these denominational families together it is useless to expect that the greater and more serious divisions between the churches will be bridged over.

The Christian Endeavor Society has, ever since its origin, been a standing reminder that the church still has, a measure of unity, and an influence toward the further development of that unity. Unfortunately its work in this direction has been interfered with by the secession of the young people's societies of some denominations which thought there was more to fear than to hope from this movement for unification. The following resolution, which was heartily endorsed by sixteen thousand Endeavorers at their international convention at Denver, is significant:

We, the undersigned members of churches and Christian Endeavor societies, and lovers of concord and Christian fellowship, earnestly petition all ecclesiastical governing bodies to allow full and untrammelled liberty to their young people to unite together in the interdenominational and international Christian Endeavor movement.

This movement, as the history of more than 22 years has proved, promotes thorough loyalty to the church and denomination, as well as fraternity between all churches and denominations, and we only ask that in the future the young people may be allowed freely to have both the interdenominational fellowship and the Christian Endeavor name either alone or in connection with their denominational name.

No one can measure the good that has been accomplished in the past by this united movement of millions of youths for good citizenship, pure politics, world-wide missions in home and foreign fields, in prisons and upon the sea; for the unevangelized of our great cities, for promoting confession of Christ and active service among the young people of all churches, and a cordial fraternity with all who love the Master, thus in part fulfilling his dying prayer "that they all may be one." Much has been accomplished, far more can be accomplished by the constantly increasing hosts in the future, if no ecclesiastical barriers to their fellowship are put in the way.

No other organization has ever done the work of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor. No new organization could do it, since the Christian Endeavor Society for a score of years has won the affection of the young and the confidence of the old, and already embraces within its ranks nearly 4,000,000 members in 80 evangelical denominations and more than 40 nations.

Not only may the society be an increasingly important link between the denominations, but between the Christian forces of all the nations as well; especially the English-speaking nations where it is already so thoroughly established. It brings the younger forces together in their great international conventions; promotes their sympathy for and interest in one another; helps to make war impossible and a lasting peace, based upon the principles of the Prince of Peace, ever more and more sure.

In missionary lands, where the unity and not the divisions of Christianity should be particularly emphasized, this union of forces is still more important, and any unnecessary separation of forces still more deplorable.

We, therefore, earnestly implore all those who have authority or influence not only to remove restrictions where any exist, but to promote the reunion of Protestant Christendom the world around, so far as it may be accomplished by the common methods, the united prayers, and the concerted work of the society of Christian Endeavor.

Last week's panic on Wall Street carried down two or three brokerage firms and involved a total loss of several million dollars in speculative values. The episode, however, is no indication of a break in the prosperity which the country is enjoying. In prosperous times there are always some men who are tempted to overreach themselves in speculative operations. The result is disaster for them and a Wall Street flurry. But the men who pay for what they buy and get money for what they sell, and make things that people want, have no occasion for alarm.

Pastors and Evangelists.

These are two classes of ministers mentioned in the New Testament. They constitute what we call among us, preachers. Pastors are those charged with the shepherding, that is the feeding and tending, of the local flock, while the evangelists are those who carry the gospel to those without, and have to do with the establishment and organization of local churches. No hard and fast line can be drawn between the kinds of work done by these two classes of ministers, because the pastor has some evangelistic work to do and the evangelist has some pastoral work to do, if he does his duty by those whom he brings into the kingdom of God. And yet the two classes of work are sufficiently distinct to require the two classes of men with their special qualifications to enable them to succeed in their respective fields.

Let us consider first the work of the pastors. The inquiry has already been raised in the minds of some as to any legitimate place for pastors, seeing that elders and deacons seem to have supplied the needs of the primitive congregations. Some are inclined to regard the pastor as an interloper, interfering with the legitimate work of the eldership; and the very word itself, scriptural though it be, and calling up as it does an idyllic scene of the shepherd and his flock, is regarded with disfavor. This comes from a confusion about names. The term pastor means shepherd, and pastors are only shepherds of the local flocks over which the Holy Spirit has made them overseers. Formerly they were men of age, as well as of approved character and ability, and hence were called elders. The terms elder, bishop, shepherd, overseer, pastor, are but different names referring to the same class of officers. But it is objected, again, that there were in the early churches a plurality of elders or bishops in each local church, whereas the rule now is to apply the term pastor to one man only. Here, again, we confuse names with the things for which they stand.

It is probably true that in most of the early churches mentioned in the New Testament there were a plurality of men set apart for the spiritual care and oversight of the members, variously designated as elders, bishops or pastors, who gave themselves wholly or very largely to this work, for many of these congregations, we know, were numerically large, and in the condition of things at that time would require more care, perhaps, than the same number of members at the present time in this country. If they had not been needed they would not have been appointed. It was the actual needs of the church that determined the number and kind of its officers. Some of our churches to-day have a plurality of pastors, and many more would, in our judgment, be better off if they should divide the labor between two or more men. But as a matter of fact very few of our congregations have felt able to employ more than one man to devote himself wholly to the work of the church, and since he is the actual pastor he is naturally called such. It would not help the matter in the least to have three or four men called pastors if only one were actually pastor.

There is a very clear intimation in the New Testament that there was a division of labor among the men charged with the spiritual oversight and care of the local churches. Paul writes to Timothy, an evangelist, "Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honor, especially those who labor in the word and in teaching" (1 Tim. 5:17). It would seem from this passage that not all the elders were called to labor "in the word and in teaching." No doubt, then, as now, some one man who had special ability for that kind of work devoted himself especially to the preaching. Perhaps in the larger congregations two or more were devoted to this work. But there is a great deal else to be done in a large congregation, or in a smaller one as to that matter, besides the public teaching or preaching of the gospel. There must be visiting, from house to house, with personal exhortations and reproofs and advice, there are matters of discipline and questions of policy toward this, that and the other practice in the community that would require wise counsel for men of experience and Christian character. So that it seems to us we have done wisely in seeking to maintain a plurality of men known as elders or bishops in each local church, only we have too often been content with the names without having the men capable of doing the work. Many fail to realize that a church with a plurality of men called elders without qualifications for discharging the duties of the eldership, is just as incomplete in organization as a church having no one designated as elder. Another truth which some have failed to realize is, that the chief thing is to have the needed work done, and that that is vastly more important than the mere matter of names of the officers by which it is done.

If this division of labor in the eldership, indicated by the passage we have quoted, as well as dictated by common sense, is to be recognized—and we do practically recognize it in all our churches—how, for convenience sake, shall we distinguish between the man whose whole time is employed by the church for its spiritual oversight and other elders associated with him who pursue their secular business for a living and devote such time as they can to the discipline and government of the church? This distinction is usually made by applying the term pastor to the man who, by virtue of the fact of his giving his whole time to that work, is naturally recognized as the pastor. The same rule prevails in other churches, because there is a necessity for such distinction, and the very use of names is to enable us to distinguish between things that differ. There is no reason why this should be regarded as exalting one man above others associated with him. As a matter of fact the pastor often has less authority in the management of the affairs of the church than one of the elders who does not labor in word and doctrine. It is simply a matter of convenience and if we did not use the term mentioned we would be compelled to use some other to serve the same purpose.

Other matters relating to the work of the local ministry and of evangelists, must be deferred for future articles.

Growth of Interest in Home Missions.

The report of the corresponding secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society, that its receipts have gained $10,000 in the month of June, and that it is now $8,000 ahead of what it was this time last year, is a very gratifying evidence of the steadily growing interest in the work of evangelization in our own country. We sincerely trust that this increase may continue until we pass the $100,000 line for home missions, which would not be a large sum for a religious body as numerically strong as we are, and having a plea which is so strikingly adapted to the needs of the people of this country.

The article entitled "Our Own Missionary," which appears elsewhere, including the letter from Brother Cooper, is the beginning of a new tide of interest for strengthening the basis of our operations, which we trust is but the beginning of larger things. It is an astonishing fact, stated in a communication from our corresponding secretary, that "thousands of our churches have not yet contributed a dollar this year toward home missions." No plea of poverty or indebtedness can justify this neglect of so great and pressing a work as that of the American Christian Missionary Society. Every church claiming to be alive should ally itself, according to the measure of its ability, with this co-operative effort to extend the knowledge of the pure gospel and of our plea for Christian unity, throughout all our borders.

Especially do we desire to commend to the consideration of local churches and of individual Christians that are able to do so, the matter of supporting their own missionary. Many churches can do that and there are many individual members who can do it. It must be a source of great satisfaction to a Christian business man who is giving his time largely to the demands of his business, and is making money, to know that some, one supported by his own contributions, is carrying the gospel of life and light to his fellow-men, to whom he is under strong obligations by virtue of the very blessings which he himself enjoys. When one thinks of the enjoyment that might be had by indulging in this luxury of doing good, as we have opportunity, it seems a wonder that more people do not avail themselves of it.

We are yet in the day of small things as regards home missions, but we thank God that on every side there are evidences of a swelling tide of interest and enthusiasm which is yet to come to its flood when all our churches and individual members shall join hands and hearts and offerings to make this, our beloved country, Emanuel's land.

Pope Leo's Exodus.

Joachim Vincent Raphael Ludovico Pecci, otherwise known as Leo XIII, the Pope of Rome, whose decease has been the sensation in the religious world during the last week, and whose fatal illness has constituted the chief news items in the daily press for several weeks, was, in many respects, a noble character. He was born March 2, 1810, in the ancestral home of the Pecci at Carpineto-Romana, a town near the city of Rome, situated in a cleft of the Mount Lepini. The boyhood of Vincent Pecci, as he was known, was thus passed amidst the rugged scenery of the Volscian hills. He was studious from his boyhood and at the age of eight went to the Jesuit College at Viterbo, where he studied Latin and the Latin classics for six years. After this he removed to Rome and continued his studies at the famous Roman College of the Jesuits in that city. Here he is said to have gone through a rigid course of study under the most eminent professors of rhetoric, philosophy and mathematics for three years, and after this he had a four years' course of theology. At the age of twenty-two he received his degree of doctor in theology, and, resolving to become a secular priest and devote himself to the service of the Holy See, he entered the University of Sapienza—"the academy or college of nobles, the nursery for all those who are destined for a diplomatic or administrative career." There, under the most eminent jurists of the day in Italy, he obtained a knowledge of civil and ecclesiastical jurisprudence, which has served him so well during his long pontificate, and took his degree as doctor in civil and canon law.

It will thus be seen that this remarkable man laid the foundation for his long public career in a most thorough training for his future work. He held several important positions prior to his election to the papacy, calling for administrative ability of a high order. He enjoyed the opportunity in 1846 of a month at the court of St. James,

London, where he had the opportunity of investigating the social and religious life of that great Protestant nation. He was thirty-five years Archbishop of Perugia, which was a good preparation for his elevation to the pontifical chair. His call to be the successor of Pious IX had been anticipated, because of his long and successful career as Archbishop and Cardinal, to which latter position he was elevated in 1853. It will be seen that the late Pope was the product of his times, of the education he had received and of the influences which surrounded him from his earliest infancy to the end of his life. Of his career as Pope we need not speak since that is familiar history. From the Roman Catholic point of view he was liberal in his thought and in his dealings with the nations of the earth. History will accord him a high place as a spiritual ruler and a skilled diplomat. He was doubtless a man of pre-eminent ability and of great purity of personal character.

It remains to be seen who is to be chosen his successor. In spite of the fundamental errors of the Roman Catholic Church, the fact of its antiquity, of its numerical strength, of its vast influence over so many of the peoples and nations of the earth, will cause its future to be regarded with deepest interest by all who have at heart the welfare of mankind and the unification of Christendom. Of one thing we may rest assured, that, in the fullness of time, all falsehood must give place to truth, all superstition to enlightenment and progress, and all organization which hinders the free growth of the spirit, and the free exercise of faith, must give way before the rising tide of civil and religious liberty. If the Roman Catholic Church is to endure through all time it can only be because of such modification of its teaching and government as will bring it into line with the enlightened progress of mankind and with the infinite purposes of God.

Editor's Easy Chair.

Or

Macatawa Musings.

What is rarer than a summer night when all the elements combine to make it perfect? There is no wind to sing a night dirge through the trees nor to disturb the placid surface of the lake. Nor is there the light of the moon to dispute the primacy of the stars. A perfect night wants no full moon to eclipse the innumerable candles that shine out of the dome of heaven. The evening star, blazing out in the western sky over the lake, like a diamond on the bosom of the night, makes a silvery pathway for itself across the still and sleepy waters of the lake. Higher up the radiant stairway of the skies hangs "the dipper," pointing now as it has through countless ages of the past, to the north star, guide of the ancient mariner, standing sentinel amid all the revolutions of the planetary spheres. What a panorama of shining worlds! No wonder Napoleon pointed to them, on such a night as this, as the sufficient answer to the atheism of his Marshals. Surely it is "the fool" who hath said, in his heart, "There is no God!"

Such a night as this calls us out on the veranda to watch the pageantry of the heavens. It woos us, also, to song, and we have been having one of those improvised concerts which we have often held at Edgewood-on-the-lake, on such glorious summer nights. But we miss the stringed instruments of other years which "the boys" used to furnish. But the "lost chords" are supplied by the boys in the cottage across the way, for every one is feeling musical on this calm, cool, starry night. It is the old songs we sing on such occasions. No new ditty need apply. But the old songs range in character from "Away down upon the Suwanee River," to "Nearer My God to Thee." Both of these songs live, because they are loaded with sentiment—one because it calls up memories of the old home, and the "old folks at home," and the other because it conveys one of the noblest desires and holiest aspirations which the human heart may know. A song that does not touch the heart is not likely to be sung by successive generations.

The past two weeks have given the Easy Chair a happy blending of work and play, the "play" being much the harder work of the two. During that time we have had the companionship of two congenial spirits, one following the other in his visits, and a third whose visit overlapped that of the second, all fond of the angler's art. The forenoon, as a rule, was given to editorial work, and the afternoon to piscatorial expeditions up Black Lake. We have had favoring winds most of the time, which have enabled us to sail our row boat up to the fishing ground, and in the evening Col. Hallack's launch is generally there and is always at our disposal for a tow home. The Colonel is an inveterate fisherman, and his skill as an angler and commodore of his beautiful steam launch, is only excelled by his courtesy. These expeditions have not been without good success, to say nothing of the joy of sailing and using the wind to overcome distance and toil. One of these expeditions during the past week was specially enjoyable. It was a family picnic at Point Superior, including our guests and two of our young lady friends from St. Louis. These young ladies, together with the editorial stenographer, made a trio of girls that would make any picnic a pronounced success. The way these young ladies—Grace, Pauline and Martha,—gathered wild dewberries for dessert, and wild flowers to decorate the table, and even assembled the wood for the campfire, while the male members of the party were catching the fish, was a delight to the two matrons and the two elderly fishermen; and when it came to eating, the truth of history compels us to say that these same young ladies played a no less distinguished part. With potatoes and fish baked in the sand, coffee made on the campfire, onions gathered on the ground, tomatoes, olives, eggs, etc., closing with cream and dewberries, it was a feast fit for kings. All voted this expedition a success, and the young ladies, whose cheeks and arms were crimsoned by exposure to sun and wind, were enthusiastic in praise of the "good time" they had enjoyed.

Among those of our preachers stopping at Macatawa Park this summer is Bruce Brown, of Chicago, who spends the week between Sundays here with his family, and returns Saturday to fill his pulpit. He sometime ago, while at Denver, made application for a United States chaplaincy in Uncle Sam's army. He had heard nothing of it until a few days ago, when he received his appointment. The application was made because of some discouragement he felt growing out of the sensational reports of the newspapers which did him great injustice, and when he found his application granted he was confronted by a grave problem. Would he be justified in limiting and circumscribing his influence and work as a preacher of Christ's gospel, by accepting a position which offered liberal compensation and permanency? After consulting with some of his friends here and elsewhere, and especially after weighing the matter well in his own conscience he has decided, we understand, to decline the tempting offer and continue in the liberty wherewith Christ has made him free of preaching the gospel where he believes he may accomplish the greatest good. We believe this is a wise decision, and one that God will approve by granting him still larger success in his ministry. He who appreciates properly the glorious privilege of preaching, a free, unfettered gospel in such a communion as that with which Brother Brown is associated, will not, for any earthly reward, turn away from such a calling, or place himself in a position where he cannot pursue his high calling to the best advantage. We highly esteemed Brother Brown before this, but more so now because of this proof he has given of his loyalty to convictions of duty.

Notes and Comments.

In the midst of all the current eulogy of John Wesley it is well to remember that the great reformer had his limitations like most other men. He once wrote, so it is affirmed, concerning the duties of a wife that they "are all comprised in two: first, that she should recognize herself as the inferior of her husband; second, that she should behave herself as such." But Mr. Wesley had an unfortunate matrimonial experience which may account for his low opinion of wifely duties and prerogatives. He has, no doubt, long since out-grown that idea of womanhood and wifehood.

It is lamentable that even in the homes of many church members there is little or no care given to the moral and religious instruction of the children growing up in the family. Home is the strategic spot, and childhood the strategic period, in which to inculcate those principles of truthfulness, of purity, of righteousness, of reverence, of unselfishness, which are so essential to a true and noble character. The time comes in the history of such parents when they look back with bitter regret to the lost opportunities for laying deep the foundations of character in the plastic minds and hearts of their children. Every religious home should have some method or some system of moral and religious training, and the very atmosphere of the home should be such as will develop those graces and virtues which beautify and adorn character.

We hope none of our readers failed to see and read the letter from President Jesse, of the University of Missouri, in a recent number, anent the report that a number of young men had lost their faith by their attendance at the University. At the Missouri Christian Lectureship, Dr. W. T. Moore stated that the moral and religious tone of the students and of the school was quite equal or superior to that of Bethany College in the days when he was a student there under the presidency of Alexander Campbell. C. H. Winders, pastor of the church at Columbia for many years, also stated that the moral and religious life of the students was quite equal to what it was in Christian University when he was a student there. Dean Lhamon of the Bible College also bore testimony as to the influence of the University on the moral and religious life of the students. This, in connection with the strong statements of Dr. Jesse ought to allay any disquieting fears concerning the influence of the University on the faith of its students.

The Central Christian Advocate raises the question as to whether there is or is not "an irreducible minimum of religious instruction that must be a part of our educational system?" It thinks rightly that, "the state has a duty as well as a right to teach some religious truth, that there may be a basis on which to rear good citizens. Among these truths are a personal God and our personal accountability to Him; the certainty of a future life; and the certainty of rewards according to that which has been done here in the flesh." This subject was much discussed at the late convention in Chicago for the promotion of moral and religious education. It was the consensus of judgment that at least the morality which is recognized by the civil law of the land should be taught in the public schools, and if this be granted it will be found difficult to divorce such instruction from the great basal facts mentioned by our contemporary, namely the existence and character of God and human accountability to him here and hereafter. It must be remembered that a large per cent of children in our public schools have no moral or religious instruction at home, and these become a menace to society unless such instruction be imparted to them in the public schools or by some other means.

Dr. Harper has an editorial in the Biblical World for July on the book of Acts, as written for the purpose of commending the gospel of Christ. "The conception of the gospel which we find in Acts," he says, "is that which came to prevail in the first century by the labors and the writings of those who say most clearly, and who worked most effectively to give their vision to others." Referring to the different methods of commending the gospel in that early age, such as the argumentative mode, as seen in the epistle to the Hebrews, the apocalyptic mode, as seen in the book of Revelation, the epistolary mode, as seen in the writings of Paul and others, he adds: "But the mode which was preferred above all, and was found to reach the largest number most effectively, was that of the narrative. To tell what Jesus had said and what Jesus had done was found to be the way above every other way for giving the gospel to men. The story, too, of how Jesus's disciples after his ministry carried on his work, communicated his teaching to others and built up the kingdom which he had introduced, was the most useful method of showing the universal and spiritual conception of Christ in its realization." The article ends with this statement: "One cannot even now find a better method than that of telling vividly the gospel story, and the story of the life and work of the First Christians, as a means of commending the gospel to the hearts and minds of men. Is it not true that we fail to make all the use we might of the book of Acts for persuading men of the intrinsic superiority and the power for universal victory which lie in the gospel of Christ?" We think Dr. Harper's question must be answered in the affirmative. It is also true, we think, that the book of Acts has not been sufficiently or intelligently used, by many popular revivalists, as the highest authority and only inspired guide-book in the work of evangelization.

The Passing of the Pope

By F. D. Power

All classes and creeds have been interested in the closing hours of Leo XIII. Whatever may be thought of him as "Supreme Pontiff," "Vicar of Christ," and all that the prominence of the man and his character and ability brought him of necessity into the vision of the whole civilized world. Millions who hold him as their spiritual leader are our fellow-citizens, and it may be easily granted that no human ruler occupies so large a place in the affections and regard of mankind. A man so entirely different from his predecessor, Pius IX, and so pre-eminent in the long line of occupants of the papal throne, who, in his twenty-five years of administration, has filled his high office with such dignity and gentleness of spirit, deserves the intelligent and candid consideration of his fellows.

He was a modern rather than a mediæval pope. Pius died with a protest on his lips against "the iniquitous spoliation of the church" by the Italian government. Leo remained the prisoner of the Vatican, but made no theatrical display over it. His policy has been one of conciliation. To modern social problems he gave special attention, and his attitude in every case has been that of a philanthropist—a well-wisher of his race. His action in protesting against the official celebration of the centenary of Voltaire; his restoration of the relations between the Vatican and Belgium, Germany and France—relations which had been sundered by the policy of his predecessor; his skill in handling Bismarck, in re-establishing the church in Scotland, in dealing with the Philippine question; his winning nature, broad policy, humble, childlike piety, interest in the cause of education and in the comfort of the masses and the rights of man, should all be remembered to-day, and full justice done him. The President's word of sympathy seems fitting, for he is chief magistrate of both Protestant and Catholic. The courtesy of this foreigner to America and his kindness during the nation's sorrow over the beloved McKinley, are not to be readily forgotten.

We measure the pope as a man. As an ecclesiastic we are interested in him, and as to his successor we are deeply concerned. It matters much every way whether Oreglia, Rampolla, Gotti or Vanuntelli is chosen as the 264th pontifex maximus by the college of sixty-four cardinals which meets in Rome the 29th inst. But while the religious world generally has a very deep interest in what concerns the spiritual welfare of the 250,000,000 of our Catholic brethren, we may separate the man, Vincenzo Gioacchino Pecci, from his ecclesiastical relations and rightly appreciate him for his character and work.

Leo XIII was surely a man of gracious and exalted life. His work along educational, sociological and diplomatic lines is an open volume for all, irrespective of religious convictions. Here he speaks not ex cathedra, but as his personal wisdom and extended experience and Christian spirit entitle him to speak, and the influence he exerted is a tribute to his personal force. He was a mathematician, he was a poet as well as a pope. His lines to a noble widow whose husband was his personal friend, entitled "For Love is Strong as Death," are well remembered and appropriate now in view of his own end:

Death claimed him and he met the common doom:

In dreams I see you stand beside his tomb,
And tearless press the swelling sorrow down—
Say rather, glimpse the fadeless laurel-crown;
For with fair brow raised to the bending skies.

Hopeful you look toward heaven with love-lit eyes!

Ah! whence thy strength and constancy of mind?

Faith nourished it; and Hope auspicious shrined

God's promises within thy heart! and so
Thou wouldst not yield thy soul to depths of woe.

Anon you see a sudden splendor bright
Suffuse the golden gates of heaven with light!
Open they swing; and lo! before your eyes
His dear face smiles on you from Paradise.
Ah me, with what a joy your heart must swell!
Inflamed with love it bids the last "Farewell,"

And shall with endless praise besiege God's citadel!

Then his little poem, "In Praise of Frugality," translated from the Latin, which was commonly his language, by Andrew Lang in 1897, seems striking when we think of his long battle with death in the little room in the Vatican palace, with such simple furniture and only one ornament—a Madonna, and when we think that this man—a leader of millions and with untold wealth at his feet—lived on less than one dollar a day, who shall say that his simplicity and abstemiousness may not be the secret of his 93 years? But here it is:

Seek neatness first; although the board be spare,

Be every dish and napkin bright and fair;
And be thy vintage purest of the pure,
To warm the heart and prove a pleasant lure
That shall both friends and wholesome mirth insure.

Be frugal here, however; nor decline
To put a frequent water to your wine.
Select for home-made bread the choicest wheat,

And have in plenty all the goodly meat
Of fowl and lamb and ox (but first be sure They're tender); nor with plenteous garniture

Of spice and pickle play the epicure!
Next have the beakers foaming to the brim
With milk no thrifty maid hath dared to skim.
No draught than this more wholesome shall assuage

The thirst of childhood or declining age.
Let golden honey be thy daintier fare;
Of Hybla's nectar take a scantier share;

Be thy fresh eggs the talk of all the to vn—
Hard boiled, or soft, or fried to savory brown.
Or poached, or dropped, or sipped ra^{ce} from the shell,

Or done in ways too numerous to tell. . .
Add herbs and salad to the feast.
Bring forth the clustered fruitage of the vine.

And last, delicious fragrance of the east!
With cups of steaming Mocha close the feast;
But taste the amber with a lingering lip—
No hasty draught! 'twas made for gods to sip!
Now, if you diet thus, why, I'll engage,
You've found the secret of a green old age.

Some of us would be glad to be the successor of "His Holiness." For one, I would like to step into his shoes for at least a few weeks until certain reforms which seem necessary could be inaugurated. As the office is not likely to be tendered, however, we can not but hope his successor may prove as worthy of his task and as wholesome an influence among the nations as the man the world honors to-day. He prayed for the unity of all sects; and the expressions, "dissident churches," "our separated brethren," those who have "drifted from the central station," used in reference to our Protestant religious bodies, indicate the benevolent and broad policy which has marked his ministry.

We have an inheritance in all good men. Thomas a Kempis and Fenelon are ours as well as John Bunyan and Jeremy Taylor; John Wesley and John Calvin and Martin Luther no less than Alexander Campbell and Barton W. Stone. "All things are yours, whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come." All good men and women in all ages and lands, of all races and schools, their gifts and graces, their faith and works, belong to us, are a part of our heritage in Christ Jesus. "Behold I am the companion of all them that fear thee." Nor is any scheme of Christian union broad enough that does not include Protestant and Catholic, all who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. When our divine Master prayed that all his people might be one, he did not refer simply to our Protestant Christendom. It was a universal prayer, and we thank him for it. Our affections should not be less broad, our prayers less comprehensive than those of the Son of God.

We would that the simplicity that is in Christ might characterize all his people. That Rome has departed from the Christianity of the New Testament, we are thoroughly convinced. For all good men in her ranks, however, we are grateful; for all progress toward liberty and light which we have seen during the long service of this remarkable man. Heaven hasten the reign of charity and benevolence in all the earth, speed the unity of races and believers, and bring in the day, blessed and beautiful and eternal, when the Master shall come to his own.

The Old and the New

By F. M. Green

This decade in Ohio will be the period of interesting anniversaries. The state opened the way early in the year at Chillicothe in the celebrating of the one hundredth anniversary of Ohio as a state. The year 1827-28 proved to be a year of battle and of victory to those who afterward came to be known religiously as "Disciples of Christ," or Christians only. It was at this period that Walter Scott came into his majesty as a proclaimer of the "ancient gospel" in the full assurance of the power of the primitive gospel to subdue the heart and persuade men to submit to the claims of Christ the Lord. The truth ran through the various communities in northeastern Ohio "like fire through dry stubble." It was in January, 1828, that Scott began "the siege of Warren," now the capital of Trumbull county, then one of the most important towns in northern Ohio. James G. Mitchell came with Walter Scott and was in every respect a worthy lieutenant to the great captain. Adamson Bentley was the preacher for the Baptist church in Warren, a man of commanding personality, lustrous in character, and an able preacher of the word as he understood it. The religious condition of Warren is well described by A. S. Hayden: "The town lay in spiritual lethargy, profoundly ignorant of the tempest of spiritual excitement about to sweep over the place. Bentley had preached well and lived well; but he held not the key to the heart, nor was he skilled to awaken the music of the soul. A new era was at hand in the religious history of Warren." Though the preacher came unheralded and the meeting was only for a few days, yet more than fifty persons became obedient to the faith.

Not long after the great meeting in Warren, Scott, Bentley and others visited Austintown in Mahoning county, where he preached his first sermon, March 19, 1828, in what was known as "the Jones' schoolhouse," and not far away from the location of the present church house. It was at this meeting and on March 20, 1828, that A. C. Hayden and many others were, by the hand of Scott, "lifted into the kingdom." June 16, 1828, the church of Christ at Austintown was constituted, and for 75 full years it has stood against all the forces arrayed against it. It has never ceased to meet, except by voluntary adjournment, to join with neighboring churches in the "yearly meeting." Not one of its original members is now living.

June 19-21, 1903, the church celebrated its "diamond anniversary." A three days' program was prepared and the following persons took part in the public functions: P. H. Wilson, Miner Lee Bates, L. J. McConnell, S. H. Bartlett, W. S. Cady, Dr. F. Whitslar, William Lauterman, J. H. Goldner, Prof.

C. T. Paul, M. L. Jenney, Alcinous Baker and F. M. Green. Of those mentioned Wilson, McConnell, Goldner, Jenney, Baker and Green have served the church as preachers and in pastoral work. M. L. Jenney is the present preacher, and much credit is due to him for the success of the anniversary.

I can scarcely realize that my own work in Austintown began more than 35 years ago and that my last sermon was preached 33 years ago. There are many interesting bits of history connected with the church at Austintown and no historian can do justice to the work of the Disciples of Christ in Ohio unless he writes the name of Austintown in large letters. It has solved as nearly as it can be solved, perhaps, "the problem of the country church." To the inhabitants round about, it is known as the "Four Mile Run Church." The meeting house is indeed "out in the country." There are not over a dozen dwelling houses within a half mile of the spot where 75 years ago its first church building was erected. This was the first meeting house erected by the disciples on the Western Reserve. The church of Austintown was one of the first in northeastern Ohio, built on "the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner." A. C. Hayden describes the event as follows: "The day appointed for collecting the disciples as a church of Christ was fair, and a large assembly convened. Walter Scott, Adamson Bentley and Ayllette Raines were present. After a discourse in the house we were called out upon the green in front of it. Here all the disciples, one hundred and ten in number, were disposed in a large circle. A space was open on one side of about twelve feet, in which stood the preachers. Thus, each member, with his right hand clasping the left of the one next him, so stood, that he could see all the rest, and also the brethren to whom we owed so much under Christ, and who were, in the most solemn manner, about to form and declare us an organized church. Each of the preachers, in turn, addressed us in the most earnest exhortation, in the things pertaining to the duties of this new relation, while all stood uncovered under the open canopy of heaven. Then followed a prayer by Walter Scott imploring blessings unbounded and unending from the divine Head upon every member of his mystic body. Then the hymn:

'Lo! he comes, with clouds descending,
Once for favored sinners slain!
Thousand, thousand saints attending,
Swell the triumph of his train!
Hallelujah!
Jesus comes and comes to reign!"

This hymn was led by William Hayden and John Henry, and was sung with raptures of joy."

The church thus begun was placed under the watchcare of William Hayden. John Henry was soon called to his side; and not long after Alexander Spears was chosen also to the eldership. So began the church of Austintown. So far as is known not one of the one hundred and ten who formed that "large circle" seventy-five years ago is now living. The voices of Walter Scott, Adamson Bentley, Ayllette Raines, William Hayden, John Henry, A. S. Hayden, A. B. Green, Jasper J. Moss, Philander Green, Amos Allerton, John Tune Smith, Jonas Hartzell, W. A. Belding, J. W. Lanpher, Alexander Campbell, Edwin Wakefield, Thomas Hillock, Isaac Errett, Symonds Ryder, Harmon Reeves, James A. Garfield, Calvin Smith and many others have, for a long time, ceased to call sinners to repentance and the church of Christ to its sublime activities. But their names are imperishable in all this section of Ohio and their personality as distinct after many years as "the man of Macedonia" in the vision of Paul.

Another event of scarcely less interest than the organization of the church transpired at Austintown. It was the dissolution of the Mahoning Association as an "advisory council." It was in 1830 when "not fewer than twenty preachers were present and crowds of peoples from long distances." Father Hayden, the father of William Hayden, A. S. Hayden, Christopher Hayden and David Hayden, "furnished provisions for uncounted numbers, and lodged one hundred and fifty; bringing into requisition for that purpose not only every floor and room in his house, but the barn also—empty, swept and furnished. All vied with each other in the profuse generosity which bid all a hearty welcome."

Of the meeting A. S. Hayden writes: "The meeting opened with salutations, songs, exhortations and reports. The next day John Henry stepped up quickly into the pulpit where were sitting the older preachers, and said in a low but energetic tone, 'I charge you to look out what you are about to do here. We want nothing here which the word of the Lord will not sanction.' They smiled at his bold independence as he returned to his seat. His meaning was apparent when he arose, soon after, and moved that the association, as an advisory council, be now dissolved. The resolution was offered, put and passed so quickly that few paused to consider the propriety or effect of it. The most seemed pleased, but not all. The more thoughtful regretted it as a hasty proceeding."

Among those who considered "the course proposed too precipitate" was Alexander Campbell, who was present at the meeting. Walter Scott was also

A Day on the Desert By W. H. Bagby

On a certain spring morning, the writer and his better half bid dull care farewell for a day, and taking the electric car which runs between Phoenix and the United States Indian school, which is situated some four miles north of the city, were soon landed at that very interesting and useful institution in which Uncle Sam is making an effort to teach the young Aztecs the ways of civilization, and of which mention will be made at some future time. Here we were met by Deacon Dysart and his good wife, who took us into their double seated rig for a day upon the desert.

For five or six miles our way lay eastward. The day, like most of the days in Arizona, was perfect. The road which followed the section line was perfectly straight and almost as smooth as a floor. On either side stretched away the wide, level fields of alfalfa, now ready for the reapers for the first of five or six crops during the season. Here and there we pass a field of wheat or rye, full headed and rapidly approaching the golden harvest time. Now on the left side of the road we come to a large olive orchard whose symmetrical trees, densely foliaged and ready to burst into bloom, stretching away in long straight rows, present to the eye a most charming view. Now on the right, we pass a large orange orchard. All the trees are in full bloom, and the atmosphere is heavy with the sweet breath of this favorite bridal flower. Many of the trees yet bear their burden of golden fruit, the combination of green and white and gold producing a most charming effect. Now we come to the canal, an artificial river bisecting the valley from east to west, to whose life-giving waters we are indebted for all these green fields and fruitful orchards, and for the presence of the beautiful birds whose sweet songs have pleased our ears as our eyes have been pleased by the freshness and beauty of the fields and orchards.

After pausing in the shade of the trees to listen for a few minutes to the cheerful song which the waters sing as they rush forward upon their mission of redemption, and to slake the thirst of our faithful "Norman," to whose strong limbs we are indebted for this delightful ride, we leave behind us the fields and the orchards and the waters that make them possible, and enter the desert which stretches away to the foot of Camel-Back Mountain, in the shadows of whose rocks we are soon to partake of our luncheon and enjoy some hours of such pleasure as can be found nowhere else in all the world except in close touch with Mother Nature and in the society of congenial friends.

Luncheon disposed of in the orthodox way, we went for a climb among the rugged rocks that form the camel's head. Standing upon an elevation lofty enough to entitle us to the designation of "higher critics," we gazed with enraptured vision upon a valley which for beauty, fertility and promise for the future, is not surpassed, perhaps, in all the world—a valley whose climate is semi-tropical, whose atmosphere is as dry and pure as that to be found at the summit of Pike's Peak, whose soil is as fertile as the valley of the Nile, whose future is as certain as the construction by the federal government of a reservoir for the storage of the abundant waters which annually go to waste for lack of such a structure, and which structure, at the present writing, seems to be well-nigh assured.

Turning from this Nebo rock, we entered upon a study of the flora and the fauna of our immediate neighborhood. Of the former we found many curious and interesting varieties of the cactus plant. Beginning with the smallest, we examined with the eye only, for they are all covered with thorns, the rat cactus, so called because its top, which peers up between the pebbles, and is studded with black thorns, bears a rather striking resemblance to the nose of a rat protruding from a hole. The "stag antlers" is a species that gets its name from its resemblance to the head-gear of the stag. A very interesting species is the cholla (pronounced choya), the thorniest and ugliest of all the cacti. It propagates its species by developing on its top thorny balls about the size of a chestnut bur, which, when it is ripe, springs from the parent stem, and if it falls stem side down, takes root and in time develops into a cholla, which in its turn develops and throws off pods. The mountain rats which make their nests under large stones on the mountain sides, gather these thorn-studded pods and scatter them thickly over the surface of the ground around their nests, as chevaux-de-frise to keep at bay the rattlesnakes, which, like the Chinese, are fond of rats as an article of diet. It is said that a rattler will not attack a nest so protected, dreading the sharp, barbed spines, which, when once started, continue to work their way into the flesh until stopped by contact with a bone. We saw one nest so protected. It is of the stalk of the cholla that the honeycombed canes, napkin rings and some rustic articles of furniture are made. Another interesting variety we saw is known by the several designations of fish-hook, tooth-pick and nigger-head cactus. One looking upon a specimen, will admit the appropriateness of all these designations. They retain a spherical shape until their normal diameter of ten or twelve inches has been reached, when they begin to grow upward, reaching a height of three or four feet, when they are dubbed barrel cacti on account of their supposed resemblance to barrels or kegs. At this height they are distinguished from the saguara, or giant cactus, only by their barbs, which are flattened and terminate in a curve or hook at the point. But the most interesting of all is the giant saguara, which sometimes attains to a height of fifty feet and a diameter of nearly two feet. They are great green, fluted columns, spindle shaped and armed cap-a-pie with strong, straight, sharp thorns. At the top of this silent, motionless column appears every spring a large, gorgeous, waxen flower, admired the more because it comes from such a source. Cut in cross section, this cactus reveals at the center a column of pith six or eight inches in diameter, around this central pith, lying parallel to one another and extending longitudinally the full length of the column, a dozen or more round ribs of tough wood, which constitute the frame work of the plant, and over all a covering of green, succulent flesh a little more dense than the discs of the prickly pear, so familiar to all. Other interesting specimens we saw, the mention of which time and space forbid. So we turn from the flora to the fauna of the desert.

Of the many interesting little animals and reptiles we saw, I shall mention only one—the Gila monster. It was our good fortune to capture one of these hideous saurians. All over his tuberculated body was written, "Handle with care!" and we handled him with care. It happened on this wise: As we were skirting a cliff, along the foot of which ran a sandy terrace, one of the ladies stepped upon a hole in the ground. It happened to be the home of a Gila monster, and he happened to be in. Rudely awakened from his noonday nap, he came out to see what was the matter. As he squirmed through the door of his damaged domicile, the lady who was bringing up the rear, and who happened to be the better half of ye scribe, caught sight of him and forthwith proceeded to regale his monstership with a song and dance that must have reminded him of the festal occasions while the gentle Apache was yet in the land. My first thought was to kill the beast. My next was to capture him and take him to town. Mrs. Dysart, who has been too long in Arizona to be afraid of Gila monsters, soon found a tin bucket which had been left behind by some picnics. Turning this down on its side, with the rib of a fallen saguara, I swept the monster into it. Quickly thrusting the stick through the bail and lifting the bucket from the ground, he was my monster. Arriving at the camp, a smaller bucket was telescoped into the larger, thus making his escape impossible. In this way he was brought to town, and is now on exhibition in a wire cage in front of a curio store. He is full fifteen inches long, and a fine specimen of his kind. But I do not like his kind.

Onward Ever.

By Aaron Prince Aten.

Highland, lowland, outward far
Stretches forth in sun-lit beauty,
Stretches out where swamp-lands mar,
All of life and all of duty.

Walk we out from self and sight
Toward where we know is ending;
Toward sunset's glowing light
Where may be a glad ascending.

What reck we for towering height?
Why a care for deep descending?
Far beyond the lowering night
Diamond-studded skies are bending.

Ambition-filled, our faltering feet
Onward shall not stay their going;
Though the trackless desert meet,
With its burning sands o'erflowing.

Life be lost and sentient joy
If it need to heed the beckon;
If eternal things employ,
So we may with heaven reckon.

Fighting well each foe of right,
Onward ever fearless pressing,
End shall be in conquering might,
End shall be in endless blessing.

Keep Your Eye on Rome.

By Cephas Shelburne.

Passing along the street, on my way to the Sunday evening service, my attention was attracted by a brilliantly lighted window in which was a large picture of the great Roman Pontiff, Leo XIII, and underneath it these words: "The eyes of the whole world are turned toward Rome."

When we consider the religious situation in America, that Protestantism is divided into 160 "opposing sects," that Roman Catholicism is a unit, it would be well for us to remember the clever Frenchman's admonition to Americans, "Keep your eye on Rome." We have already paid our tribute to Leo XIII as a good man, admired by both Catholic and Protestant. And if there must be a pope, let a man be chosen after Leo the excellent type rather than Leo the great, after the Gregory and not the Alexander type of ruler. But why any pope elected by a conclave of cardinals? The idea of the pope, the head and strength of the Catholic Church, was not born until 588 A. D., and then not at Rome, but at Constantinople. Christianity, with all its divine origin, energy and power to redeem and save, was on the earth 300 years before the papacy came into existence. It was 321 years after Christ before the council of Nice assembled to give us a man-made system. This was the period of greatest unity, power and spirituality of the church, "And hath given him to be head over all things to the church." The papal dominion begins as an institution with Leo the great. As a religion it began with the first Pentecost after the ascension and glorification of our Savior. Why any Roman see and pontiff? Why this usurped headship of Jesus Christ, and this spiritual tyranny over the minds and consciences of men? A good man, worthy of all praise, as is Leo XIII, is one thing; Roman Catholicism as a polity, government, institution and tyrannical faith, is quite another thing, and a more dangerous.

All eyes, Catholic and non-Catholic, are turned toward Rome! It is a recognition, not alone of the goodness of the supreme pontiff there, but of the power of the Vatican. It is probable that no sovereign on earth occupies such exalted worldly position, or has sway over such universal territory religiously as the pope at Rome. The church at Rome is among the greatest facts and factors in existence. Leo XIII was not theological or reactionary. He set forth no new dogmas; he issued few papal bulls and dispensations and infallible decrees; he was not of the Richelieu or Bismarck type of ruler,—Leo was a statesman, a diplomat, a man of affairs; wise, prudent, tactful, firm, sagacious. He knew men and countries. He knew that beyond the Alps lay other countries and people. He was the only pontiff that had a personal acquaintance with America. He was a citizen of the world, even in the seclusion of the Vatican. He was constantly in contact with political rulers, and with parties and factions of his own communion. He received American Ambassadors at the Vatican, and succeeded in placing an official in this country who is practically a nuncio. With singular tact he has become powerful in every European court except France. But the Frenchman has been instructed by experience. He knows that Rome's supreme pontiff and vicar of Christ, deals with all matters from the Roman standpoint. In every way Leo XIII has strengthened Rome and the church over which he presided. No man in high position was more fully conversant with movements and affairs of the world as was Leo XIII, and no man has manipulated them to greater advantage.

It is a sad commentary upon our holy religion, and upon our prayers for "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done, on earth as in heaven," to witness the conclave of cardinals in bitter struggle for the honor of wearing the papal crown, carrying the controversy for the papal succession and the vicarage of Jesus Christ to the very bedside of the dying pontiff. Sad commentary upon the religion of the New Testament and its Christ! But we may feel assured that whether Rampolla, Gotti, or Serafino Vannutelli, whether Italian or American, the new pope elected ten days after the death of the expiring pontiff, will rule in the interest of Rome and the Catholic Church.

When Protestantism speaks, it speaks for 160 separate and contending factions; when Roman Catholicism speaks it is for the solid, united Catholic Church. When Bishop Corrigan spoke in Chicago or Cardinal Gibbons in Baltimore, it means the solid vote of these cities. When a Protestant speaks he stands for hardly more than one of the 950 churches of Chicago, or one of the 450 churches of Baltimore, for the business of Protestantism is to protest. The power of Catholicism is plain to discerning eyes in every part of America. The public press shapes its policy and tempers its utterances to suit its Catholic constituency. The outcome of the Philippine issue is that the pope has the official nomination of 100 prelaties with American territory. In the recent coal strike, when the operators asked that a clergyman be included in the arbitration committee, the President of the United States chose a Catholic bishop. Why this favor to Rome? Because Rome, though a minority is a minority that is homogeneous, organized and disciplined. "They form a solid block in the midst of a heap of crumbling Protestant fragments." Mr. Urbain Gohier, the clever Frenchman in the Independent of May 14, has written an article on "The Religious Situation in America," in which he says:

The Catholic question in the United States is one of extreme interest. Within a few years it will be the Catholic peril. When one expresses this opinion to an American Protestant he laughs loudly, shrugs his shoulders, and pooh-poohs with hearty contempt. He answers that the Catholics of his country are animated by a genuinely republican spirit, that they have no religious fanaticism, that they are a petty minority with neither the purpose nor the power to trouble American society. Very well. The following statements will be judged idle by the American public, but they will interest the French public, which has been instructed by experience.

The Roman Church, which in the United States numbered 44,500 communicants in 1790, to-day numbers 12,000,000 or more. The total population of the country is twenty times more numerous than at that epoch; the Catholic population, three hundred times more numerous. To this we must now add 6,500,000 of Catholics in the Philippines, and 1,000,000 in Porto Rico.

When there shall be an army of fifteen or twenty millions of Catholics, firmly united by a tyrannical faith, trained under the regime of the confessional, blindly committed to the will of their priests, and directed by the brains of a few high Jesuits, we shall see how much of a showing there will be for American liberty.

There must be a breaking up of the present order of things, a massing together in unity of Protestant forces, or Protestantism is doomed. Christ's prayer "that they all may be one," must be answered, or our divided Protestantism can't stand against the 190,000,000 of concerted Catholics under the dictation of the Roman pontiff. Keep your eye on Rome

The Filipino and the Fragments

By H. P. Williams

"Gather up the broken pieces which remain over that nothing be lost."

Ask a Spaniard and he will tell you the Filipino is lazy. The average American will say the same thing if he is in the islands on a "revenue" basis. Even one of their own people, who is an ultra-Americanista, has said that the Ilocanos are industrious everywhere but in Ilocos. This last, while it confesses too much, indicates that the tribe is not essentially lazy, and that is true of the Filipino as I would analyze him. He is undisciplined; he is ignorant in his methods; he will cut out mid forenoon for his morning meal; he is thriftless, but he is not lazy. That thought is full of comfort. Laziness is semi-hopeless for every interest. Thriftlessness is more preg-nable.

The thriftlessness of the Filipino does not always involve blameworthiness. It seems rather an element of his simplicity than a sign of degeneracy. A theoretical survey of contributing causes encourages the thought that the invigorating influences of an advanced civilization and the Bible will dissipate this general unadmirable characteristic.

Among the causes of thriftlessness is, of course, the climate. The sustained temperature fails to excite the virtue that a common cold snap works for you in the United States. Then the sun's rays are especially debilitating, so that humanity must be excused if they love the shade overmuch. In the hot season it does no good to labor in the fields; for they are baked hard; a crowbar can hardly drill them. The people have not yet made all the year a springtime by means of irrigating ditches.

The common native diet reinforces the climate in affording Filipino bones and muscles only a measure of vigor. Fish, rice, and squash or such—open fires, scanty and irregular meals, would kill an American on a steady program, and can hardly be expected to sustain his standard of industry.

Our brother may be blamed for not setting a better table. He does sometimes at weddings and mortuary feasts, but he recognizes only the needs that nature easily supplies. A meal of green mangos and salt will keep off hunger on his journey, why does he need to plan and prepare. That is it. From a native's standpoint nature is entirely too kind, and therefore her son is still a child.

Then there have been political causes that were calculated to conspire against even a thrifty man's thrift. The tardiness and inequality of Spanish courts, the repressive form of government and abounding taxation—these are old reports for American ears. They are past causes, but their effects are present. They discouraged thrift.

The same thing may be said of Romanism, and with possibly a sustained emphasis. For some reason we find the most obdurate industrial depression in those countries where Romanism is ascendent. The pope and poverty have formed an alliance that is tragically unholy. How it worked in the Philippines, the moneys and estates of the friar corporations, and the great stone churches and convents, marking each town of huddled shacks, can best indicate. Fifteen days per year were required as a poll tax for public works, and the church deflected the lion's share of the labor. There was also a harmony of doctrinal instruction and parochial attention. Pennies were extorted for God's poor at the church doors, and pesos required for baptisms, weddings, and masses for the dead.

Again, the common lack of even rudimentary education among the people may be mentioned as unfavorable to their improvement. Where the mind was not stimulated, the sodden, unresponsive state of industry could not be changed. With the new American school, that state will ultimately be improved.

To return to natural causes again, we may find such in the many rapidly disintegrating forces of the torrid zone. These are beneficial in many ways, but they are economically discouraging. For example, bamboo is the almost universal building material. It is so easily accessible and so readily adaptable to every need that the imperishable timber of the mountains is rarely sought. Yet bamboo is a prey to insects and decay. Fences are customarily built anew every year. While conflagrations are not infrequent, that lick up the light, fiercely-burning cottages in a broad pathway from one end of the town to the other.

Most foodstuffs can be preserved only with difficulty. Ants by the myriads and other insects seek them out ravenously. One's pile of fire-wood literally hums with insect borers and sawyers. Then there is the mildew and rot of the rainy season. The average family must live virtually from hand to mouth. Milk and butter are out of the question, practically. The family has a pen of chickens; but disease slays them in a few hours. Their water buffalos may be feeding strong and well, when some fine year the pest sweeps them off over night. The rice fields may look green and promising, but a cloud, a storm of whirring wings, and the locusts are at work cutting and devouring.

The same destruction affects the family bond itself. I do not know, but judge that the average native life is much shorter than ours. Few households there are but are familiar with death. Orphans are plentiful, growing up in neighboring families. Small-pox, plague, cholera, dysentery, make the tenure of life always uncertain, and the Filipino knows it, and expects it. A neighbor lightly announces the death of his two children and a nephew a few days ago from small-pox. He does not mourn; his case is like the rest; but the situation does not encourage thrift. Even American planning and saving would stagger under such rebuffs.

Then the home interest is not sympathetic and rich. The bond is not strong and vital. Filipino life has not been deepened; it babbles on the surface. Family love is there, but not so powerful and steadfast as to inspire persistent and lifelong enterprise.

In social relations there still exists what may be called the "cabeza" system, a relic of ancient tribal traditions. The "head-man" was truly the "cabeza" (head), supplying the brains and sense of responsibility for his following. Sometimes this seems to amount to a semi-slavery, where the ordering of some personal head-man is tacitly assented to. Commonly to the "presidente" of the town or the lieutenant of the "barrio" (ward) are ascribed patriarchal powers from ordering out workmen for a house to providing a night's lodging for the traveler.

The Filipino lacks a sense of individuality. He doesn't strike out for himself. He goes where the rest go and does what the rest do. His father planted rice and camotes, as he plants rice and camotes. He does not live in the fields apart by himself, but in the villages, and goes out with his neighbors to work. He does not specialize at his trade, and perfect his skill. What one can do, all can do. He usually lives in his own town and adopts its peculiar idioms, at any rate he is known as a Piddig man or a Bates man or as from Bangui.

He lacks a commercial spirit because he has not seen commercial advantages nor been instructed in commercial methods. For buying, the petty dealing of the Chinese meets his need. For selling—a few bundles of fagots, or the small produce that his women may carry to town on market days, or bundles of grass for the town horses, a pig or a pony now and then will be enough. A business bigger than his needs is beyond the practical.

It seems that American commerce, which will sooner or later penetrate all parts of the islands, promises much to excite carefulness and thrift among the native peoples. Attended as it will be by new industrial methods and business suggestions, it will do much good in spite of all the demoralizing factors in pioneer trade. Then the public schools, opening the doors to wider and more practical knowledge, will assist tremendously to overcome natural discouragements and to encourage this element of thrift, which in one form or other is at the basis of all true achievement. But the most powerful incentives, insuring the eternal moral causes, and forfending that commerce should make mere counters of the Filipinos or that the schools should make them parrots, we find, it seems to me, in a hearty, healthful preaching of the gospel. This is calculated to give them individuality, enterprise, carefulness. They will cease to live from hand to mouth, but will live from time to eternity. They will care for the unrighteous mammon that they may be entrusted with the true riches.

The True Sanctification.

By J. W. Lanham.

"Them that are being sanctified."
—Hebrews 10:14.

To obtain a correct and complete view of this great subject, we should look at it from various and near scriptural view points. Some of these are Christian character, Christian evangelism, religious uniformity, and spiritual progress.

Sanctification or holiness means character, and is therefore intensely personal; in evangelism it emphasizes the merits of Christ, rather than exalted human attainments; it evinces its presence by uniformity of the Christian life instead of ups and downs in religious experience; and under its influence the calm and orderly progress of faith and practical duty, is substituted for the convulsive changes of mere emotion.

The Dynamic Influence of Woman.

By J. Durham.

"Having been reminded of the unfeigned faith that is in thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice, and I am persuaded in thee also." 2 Tim. 1:5.

No man ever rose to a prominence or success who did not have before him a good wife, mother or grandmother. Timothy was educated in the scriptures fifty years before he was born.

Look up the stairway of Jacob; ask the angels to open the windows of heaven; draw aside the curtains of eternity to see the picture gallery of the heavenly mansions. Let us gaze on the Sarahs, Rebeccas, Rachels, Hannahs, Deborahs, Marys, Marthas, Annas, Loises and Eunices of the last century. See them incarnated to-day on the supreme bench in the White House, in the council chambers of this republic, in the legislative halls in governor's mansion, in the world's pulpits, at the bars of justice, on the thrones, in her parliaments, educating the world, helping the afflicted, directing great enterprises and conducting the commerce of the world.

The Second Coming of Christ

BY PETER AINSLIE

As to the second coming of our Lord, the people known in the religious world as the "Disciples of Christ," by virtue of their position, are bound to the pre-millennial view, in opposition to the past-millennial by every process of logic, although practically it is not generally held among us; but we are an apostolic people and our plea is for primitive Christianity in doctrine and practice, and with hardly a dissenting voice, the apostolic church and its successors for three hundred years were pre-millenarian. Mosheim says in his history that this view "met with no opposition previous to the times of Origen," and Bishop Russell, although himself a post-millenarian, said in one of his published sermons, that "to the beginning of the fourth century this belief was universal and undisputed." The historian Gibbon, an infidel, and consequently an unprejudiced witness wrote in his well-known history: "It appears to have been the reigning sentiment of orthodox believers and as long as this error was permitted to subsist in the church, it was productive of the most salutary effects on the faith and practice of Christians." Hundreds of others thus testify.

But to the Bible. The second coming of our Lord covers more space in the scriptures than any other single subject, and every doctrine is bound up in it. Whole chapters in the four gospels are devoted to it. The book of Acts begins with this promise: "This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner, as ye have seen him go into heaven" (Acts 1:11). Peter's second great gospel sermon, recorded in the third chapter of the Acts (3:20,21) declared that God "shall send Jesus Christ, which was before preached into you whom the heaven must receive until the times of the restitution of all things." A large part of Paul's first letter to the Thessalonians is taken up with this subject and each one of the five short chapters closes with a special reference to the second coming of Christ (1:10;2:19;3:13;4:16;5:23) and it is the one theme of his second letter to the Thessalonians. In his two letters to Timothy, and both of them together may be read in fifteen minutes, he makes eight direct references to the second coming of Christ and in his short letter to Titus, Paul called it the "blessed hope" of the church (Titus 2:13). In his letter to the Romans, he mentions it seven times; in his first letter to the Corinthians, ten times; in his letter to the Philippians, five times, and there is not an epistle that Paul wrote, save to Philemon, but that he either directly or indirectly mentioned this hope. In the letter to the Hebrews it is mentioned eight times; James mentions it twice; Peter mentions it eleven times in his two epistles; John mentions it three times in his first epistle; Jude mentions it three times in his short epistle of one chapter, and the book of Revelation is full of it, closing with the earnest prayer, "amen, come Lord Jesus."

Neither does it belong distinctively to the New Testament, but nearly every prophet in the Old Testament makes mention of it, and Enoch, who was the seventh from Adam, prophesied of it, saying, "Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousands of his saints." Certainly a doctrine that holds such sway in the scriptures from the days of Enoch to those of John, the beloved disciple, cannot be pushed aside as out of date and not deserving our attention.

Some call the pre-millenarian position the position of pessimism, but it is impossible that this position should in any degree be pessimistic. It is hope from the very start and such a hope that it is impossible of being eclipsed, "for the faith of the righteous shineth brighter unto the perfect day." "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my word shall not pass away," was the dogmatic assurance of Jesus.

The second coming of our Lord was the scriptural motive enjoined for fidelity, sobriety, patience, sincerity, pastoral diligence, holy conversation, brotherly love, unworldliness, moderation, self-control, repentance, ministerial faithfulness—not once the coming of death as is now used so frequently, but then the one motive named by the apostles was the imminence of our Lord's second coming, when he will show who is the only potentate, the King of kings and Lord of lords. Then will be the first resurrection (1 Thess. 4:16,17), then will be the receiving of our rewards (Rev. 22:12), then will be the putting down of all sin (Rev. 20:2), then shall nations learn war no more (Isa. 2:4) and the whole world shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the deep. It is the greatest motive for missionary enthusiasm, and rarely will you find a missionary who is not a pre-millenarian. Jesus Christ has given the command, "Go," he may return at any time, consequently obedience to this command is the chief business of the church—action, action, action all the time, for no man knows when our Lord will return.

As most of the Christian world oppose scriptural baptism, so most of them oppose the pre-millenarian view, but the pre-millennial coming of Christ is as unanswerable as the Disciples' position on baptism.

News From Many Fields

Indiana.

S. W. Brown, pastor at Englewood Church, Indianapolis, has offered his resignation to take effect Aug. 1. He will probably locate in Iowa. We are sorry to lose him, as he is one of our best pastors.

J. O. Rose has located at Warsaw.

I. N. Grisso has resigned at Peru and located at Princeton, Ill.

W. P. Shamhart has resigned at Verdersburg. Hope some good Indiana church will get him.

W. G. Higgins, of Lebanon, was married July 20 to Mrs. Olive McFarren, of Zionsville. We extend congratulations. Mr. and Mrs. Higgins are now visiting in Colorado.

J. V. Coombs preached at Covington not long since. This was the former home of himself and wife previous to their marriage. Brother Coombs has visited there several times each year. It seems that under these circumstances Brother Coombs should have known the location of the Christian Church, and not wandered into the Presbyterian Church, taking his seat near the pulpit and remaining there until almost time to preach. We are told, however, that both churches are new structures and look somewhat similar. However, Brother Coombs discovered his mistake and slipped out and went to his own church and preached with his usual vigor to the delight of all.

What can a committee of five, appointed by the Indiana Ministerial Association, on "Ministerial Standing" do, when one of our assemblies places two of the worst men with which the committee has had to deal on its program for lectures, Bible readings, sermons, etc.?

The Christian Standard thinks the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST should not publish anything derogatory to the character of a brother even though it be a part of a report of an unduly appointed body of brethren, who have made proper investigation before rushing into print.

We would like to ask what the Christian Standard has been doing for the past three years. Men and institutions have been maligned in almost every issue,—but, it is all right for the Christian (?) Standard to do these things—in their own estimation.

That Prince Edward Islander, editor of that journalistic centipede of Cincinnati, has been over in Indiana recently. He reports that he heard many good things about the Standard. We only know of a few places in Indiana where compliments on that paper could be heard relative to its many attacks on some of the best men and institutions among us.

Bethany Assembly has a good program. Every preacher should spend a large part of his vacation at Bethany. It is not a private enterprise, but one of the integral parts of our state work. Who can estimate the good accomplished by dear old Bethany? The preachers should announce the program and date and use their influence to get others to go to Bethany. The fellowships enjoyed there will well repay any one, let alone the benefit to be derived from the feast of good things on the program. Don't fail to go.

Electric lights, interurban cars every hour to Martinsville and Indianapolis, refurbished hotel and many other improvements at Bethany are encouraging.

Why not raise $5,000 this year at the Assembly? Brother Carpenter has raised nearly that amount during the year.

Fountain Park Assembly at Remington offers a very interesting and up-to-date program. Those in the northern part of the state, unable to go to Bethany, should go to Fountain Park. Robert Parker, Remington, is president. He is one of the best Christian men in the state.

The oil bubble has burst. One preacher has gone into the grocery business, some are selling life insurance, while others have concluded to preach the gospel as of old and be satisfied. Thank the Lord for that! Experience is a good teacher, even though it cost one's money and position. We hear of one preacher who bought up the stock he had sold others, so they would not lose their money, and he is certainly to be commended for this act.

W. E. M. Hackleman will conduct the music at Bethany Chautauqua, Bethany, Va., Zionsville Assembly, Illinois Encampment and several state conventions this summer.

J. V. Coombs is at Livingston, Mont., spending his vacation. He will return about Sept. 1 and will begin a meeting at Waterloo, Ia.

T. J. Legg has moved to Indianapolis. That place is the center of the earth from a railroad point of view, and no doubt it is the place for a state evangelist. HOOSIER.

Iowa.

E. N. Tucker is the new pastor of the church at Sac City. Brother Tucker comes to us from Fairbury, Ill.

Sias and McVey are in a meeting at Harlan with a packed house and 15 accessions at last report.

Ralph C. Sargent has resigned at Mason City, and will close his work Oct. 1.

G. Lolin Eaton, now at Packwood, has accepted the pastorate of the church at Dewitt, and will begin work Oct. 1.

W. B. Crewdson will begin work in his new field, Atlantic, Aug. 1.

J. L. Fowler has accepted the work at Greene.

Joel M. Fisher has resigned the work at Martelle and is moving to Idaho.

The church at New Sharon is prospering under the ministry of T. J. O'Conner. The church is newly painted and otherwise improved.

Yielding to the unanimous call of the church, Bro. Noah Garwick has concluded to remain at Griswold.

J. Will Waters has accepted the pastorate of the church at Corning. I am truly glad that Brother Walters has concluded to remain in Iowa and in the southwest district where he is rendering such excellent service as president of the district.

J. P. McKnight is spending the summer in the Harvard Divinity School at Cambridge, and the pulpit at Oskaloosa is being filled in his absence by Dean A. M. Haggard. Bro. McKnight will return about Sept. 1.

John H. Swift, of Belleflower, Ill., and one of the successful pastors and evangelists of the state, will move to Iowa this fall. He will be in Iowa over Sunday, Aug. 16, and will be glad to preach for some church in need of a supply. If you would like his services for that day drop me a card.

C. G. Stout is in a tent meeting at Coon Rapids, and was meeting with excellent results at last report.

J. R. Johnson will begin a meeting at New Market, Aug. 16. Brother Johnson has resigned the work at Greenfield, and will most likely engage in evangelistic work again. In their efforts to erect a building at Greenfield, it was found that the congregation was not sufficiently strong financially to retain a pastor for full time.

Our series of annual district conventions will be held as follows:

Get Rid of Scrofula

Bunches, eruptions, inflammations, soreness of the eyelids and ears, diseases of the bones, rickets, dyspepsia, catarrh, wasting, are only some of the troubles it causes.

It is a very active evil, making havoc of the whole system.

Hood's Sarsaparilla

Eradicates it, cures all its manifestations, and builds up the whole system.

Accept no substitute.

Northwest district, Cherokee, Aug. 18, 19 and 20.

Central district, Norwalk, Sept. 8 9 and 10, Southeast district, Burlington, Sept. 15, 16 and 17.

Southwest district, Clarinda, Sept. 22, 23 and 24.

Northeast district, Vinton, Sept. 29, 30, and Oct. 1.

An excellent program is in preparation, and the district boards are at work on plans to make each convention a success in every way possible.

Iowa should raise $20,000 for Iowa missions, and $300,000 for Drake University between now and the annual convention of 1905, and the district conventions should give us a good start in that direction.

B. S. DENNY, Cor. Sec.

Indian Territory.

Our last notes left us at Sapulpa, going northeast from this place, on the Frisco about fifteen miles, brings us to Tulsa, where we have a congregation and a new house of worship completed and dedicated July 14, by Brother Wickizer, of Iowa. This is the home of our Bro. S. W. Marr. Brother Marr, as has been the case with some others of our territorial preachers, has given up the regular work and is in a bank, but as I understand it is a great help to the church in his town. Leaving Tulsa, going in a northeasterly direction, we come first to Claremore, and at this place we have some church influence, though very little.

At this place and in Chelsea we have quite a number of members, and ought to have in both places good churches; up to this time I have not been able to see them, but hope to before the year closes.

We now come to Vinita. This is the home of our Brother Cook, one of the most active men in the Indian Territory. When Brother Cook took hold of this work the church was very weak; now it is strong and in one of the best towns in the Territory. The brethren have bought a lot, and will soon move their house on it.

At Centralia, a country town north of this, we have a congregation. I don't know its strength; I know it has some good people, for I have met them.

We also have a church at Lenapah, on the Iron Mountain railroad, fifteen miles south of Coffeyville, Kan. This was organized by Bro. F. F. Walters, now of Colorado. Bartsville and Collinsville are places where there ought to be churches, and I hope will be soon.

Coming south from Vinita, we first come to Adair. I have not seen these people, but I am told that they are good, progressive and earnest workers, and there is that in that community, the prophecy of a good future. South of this place a few miles, is Pryor Creek. At this place we have the best house of worship belonging to our people in the territory. This was made possible by the liberality of a few good men in the community. There has been a little discord in this place, but now they are all united and doing good work under the wise leadership of Bro. H. F. Groom, late of Drake University.

In the country close to Pryor Creek, we have two or three congregations, some that I am told are strong and doing well, but as I have not seen them I can't speak from any personal knowledge.

Since we left Vinita, we have been on the M. K. & T. road going south. The first congregation south of Pryor Creek is Wagoner. This work has been under the care of the C. W. B. M. and has been well cared for. Bro. J. B. Askew is the pastor, and has done a splendid work. The report of this work will compare with any in the Indian Territory and Wagoner is one of our good towns.

We next come to Muskogee. This is the home of our Bro. S. B. Dawes, the president of our territorial board. At this place we have a good congregation, and one of the best towns in the territory. Brother Walling is their pastor. Brother Walling has been in feeble health, and this has greatly hindered his work. It is hoped that he will soon be around again, and then we shall expect good work from this church.

Our work throughout the territory is looking up. Our plans have been greatly broken into in the last year by the weather. All religious work has been cut short in this way, but with all we are hopeful.

G. T. BLACK, Cor. Sec. of I. T.
Ardmore, I. T.

Maryland, Delaware and District of Columbia.

At our Washington preachers' meeting, July 13, there were present, E. B. Bagby, F. B. Sapp and Philip Johnson, assistant pastor at Vermont Avenue; also Bro. W. L. Harris, Brother Kimmel's successor at Whitney Avenue. The brethren welcomed him among us, and were favorably impressed with the late addition to our preaching force. The Whitney Avenue Church gave him a pleasant reception on Friday, July 10.

Brother Power was out of the city at the Denver Christian Endeavor Convention.

F. B. Sapp reported one confession. He visited Hyattstown the previous week and preached the funeral of Mrs. Virginia Price, a member of the church at that place.

A grove meeting began at Jerusalem in Harford county on July 19. J. O. Shelburne, of Baltimore, preached in the morning and the writer at night. Communion service in the afternoon. One made confession in the morning and two came forward in the afternoon.

After spending a few days here the writer will go to Bethany Beach, Del., to take charge of the music.

W. J. Wright will preach from July 26 to Aug. 2. Assembly program from Aug. 3 to 16.

Tickets may be secured east of the Ohio river to Rehoboth, Del., at excursion rates. Change to Queen Annis railroad in Baltimore. The Pennsylvania railroad also sells excursion tickets to Rehoboth. From this point take steamer for Bethany Beach.

J. O. Shelburne goes to Virginia for a change. He is ill. J. A. HOPKINS.

Chicago.

The heated term is on, but most of the preachers are hard at work in their respective fields, and notably among those who have been added to the force of late is J. V. Updike, who has taken charge of the Garfield Park Church. This is an important field and the church counts itself most fortunate in securing for a time at least this distinguished evangelist and successful pastor to assist them in their struggles.

The Metropolitan Church, under the direction of Chas. Reign Scoville, has certainly undertaken a tremendous task. They have just secured a splendid piece of property costing $30,000, on which they expect to erect "an institutional church in the strictest sense" as set forth in prospectus just sent out. "This church is not to be closed six-sevenths of the time, but will be open seven days in the week." It will take some time to fully prepare plans for building, but in due time such plans will be made public. On Saturday, July 18, the Sunday-school of Cook county enjoyed an outing at Island Park, near Mokena, on the C. & E. I. railroad. The day was not promising, and only about 1,200 people took advantage of the opportunity to spend the day in the country. But it was an enjoyable day and afforded an opportunity for pleasure for fellowship, and withal an opportunity to eat a picnic dinner in the woods, something not often given the average Chicagoan.

Additions are a marked feature of the work. One addition at Douglass Park last Sunday, two at the First Church, seven at Metropolitan and two baptisms at Harvey last Wednesday night. A. Larrabee, corresponding secretary of the C. C. M. S., assisted by N. G. Buckley, of West Pullman, and the writer, has started a flourishing mission in South Chicago. The outlook is hopeful. R. L. North Idaho.

The annual sessions of the North Idaho camp meeting, held this year near Orofino, closed June 21. On account of some unfavorable conditions, the attendance was not so large as usual; but a good representation was had from the churches, and in some respects the meeting was the best and most important ever held. The Disciples in North Idaho who remained away are much the losers.

The cause of primitive Christianity has grown rapidly in North Idaho in the past two years. The consecrated work of Brother and Sister Stephens, our district evangelists, has done much to bring this about. They have done a most excellent and enduring work. Not only is Brother Stephens a strong preacher of the word, and Sister Stephens a splendid leader of song, but with true devotion to their Master, their time, strength and talents are freely given to "whatsoever their hands find to do" to establish and set in order the churches. We regret the fact that they have not seen fit to remain with us a little while longer. Their work is not finished in North Idaho.

The report of the corresponding secretary shows 29 communities where we have enough brethren to organize a church. Churches have been organized in 23 of these places; 21 have regular preaching. There are fifteen preachers doing regular work in the district, eight giving all their time to one church. We have twelve houses of worship, all of which are free from debt. Preparations are being made to build at five other points. Less than three years ago there were in the district thirteen organizations in all, five houses of worship, eight preachers and about five hundred brethren. We now have about fifteen hundred brethren in the district.

The reports of the Bible-schools and Christian Endeavor societies were incomplete. Fourteen schools out of at least twenty-two reported 853 scholars. Ten Christian Endeavor societies reported 399 members (active) and 29 associate members. Three Junior Christian Endeavor societies reported 95 members.

All indebtedness for the past year's work was met. For the advance work, the churches having ministers were asked to release their pastors to hold one meeting in the district at a needed point.

Bro. W. H. Harris, of Princeton, lately from Missouri, whom we all gladly welcome to North Idaho, will devote all his evangelistic effort to the district this year. A district evangelist will be employed. Our plan is to strengthen and set in order the things that are lacking in the churches this year, and thus prepare ourselves for a strong forward movement at our next camp meeting.

A splendid step in advance was taken in the organization of the North Idaho Christian Institute to work along the lines of Bible study and institute work. Bro. J. B. Daisley, of Bultesac, is president, Bro. Horace Siberell, of Clarkston, Wash., is vice-president, and Bro. E. B. Harris, of Moscow, is secretary. Any Disciple may become a member by enrolling with the membership.

The annual meetings will begin each year the first Monday in January. Our first meeting will be held in Moscow next January, the Lord willing.

Among the many excellent features of the program that deserve mention were the sessions of the Bible school, the Christian Endeavor, the C. W. B. M. and a Junior Christian Endeavor meeting, led by Sister Bessie Loony. This last was coupled with an address by Mrs. Davies on the work of the Northwestern Home Finding Association. These were all very helpful.

The official board for the coming year is as follows: Pres., Professor Cobbs, Moscow; Vice-Pres., T. J. Ware, Ferdinand; Rec. Sec., J. S. Hogue, Orofino; Cor. Sec., J. A. Pine, Lewiston; Treas., J. S. Mounce, Lewiston. The convention selected the writer as delegate to the national convention at Detroit in October and will defray expenses.

Omaha.

The members of the First Christian Church are anxiously looking forward to the time when their new church will be completed. Under the wise and efficient leadership of Brother Hill the work is progressing rapidly; but funds are not forthcoming as they should be. Every person who was present at the Omaha convention when the First Church collapsed, should send a free will offering of not less than one dollar to H. G. Hill, 530 S. 26th Ave., Omaha. If this worthy appeal is answered by our brotherhood, a commodious building can be erected at once in this strategic city.

Never before in the history of our work in Omaha has there been such an opportunity for us to present the simple gospel to the people. With an evangelist in the field and an organized city missionary board, we are standing on the "firing line" ready to take the city for Christ.

The Grant Street Church, led by their successful pastor, Brother Bicknell, are preparing for a great fall campaign. With their corps of willing and efficient workers, we expect to hear great things from this church.

The congregation in South Omaha has sold its old house and lot and purchased an excellent lot in one of the most desirable locations in that "magic city." A beautiful ten thousand dollar building will be erected at once, and Bro. Lauder Lane and his faithful congregation will have one of the most commodious houses of worship in South Omaha.

The city missionary society is carrying on work at present at three different points. Brother Bicknell is preaching every Sunday afternoon at Irvington, where we hope to plant a church in the early fall. A thriving Sunday-school has been organized on Ames Avenue, where Sunday-school is conducted every Sunday morning at 10 o'clock, and preaching and communion at 11. A church will also be organized there soon. A number have already expressed their willingness to connect themselves with this organization. The work at Florence is being revived, and we have hopes of adding much strength to the church there in the future.

AN AWFUL SUFFERER.

If there is any disease which is awful in its effects upon the sufferer, that disease is Asthma. Suffocating, gasping for air, and sitting up, perhaps for weeks, in an agony of despair, weary, worn and helpless, such is the life of one who is afflicted with Asthma. An explorer on the Congo River, in darkest Africa, discovered the wonderful Kola Plant, which has proved an unfailing cure for Asthma, Hay-fever, and allied spasmodic diseases. And now all over Europe physicians are endorsing and prescribing the Kola Plant as the only sure constitutional cure for these diseases. There are three thousand recorded cures within three months. So sure are the importers of Kola of the fact that it cannot fail to cure, that they are sending out large trial cases free, to any sufferer from Asthma or Hay-fever who makes the request. For the benefit of our readers who may be afflicted, we cheerfully give the address of the Importing Company, who have given this boon to humanity. Address Kola Importing Co., 1162 Broadway, New York, and they will send you a Large Trial Case free, by mail, and prepaid. It costs you nothing and you should surely try it.

DAVID AND GOLIATH.—
1 Sam. 17:38-49.

Read Chapter 17.

Memory Verses: 45-47.

Golden Text: If God be for us who can be against us?—Rom. 8:31.

A Tangled Narrative.

It is not a matter of first-rate importance, but still it is worth noticing, that the episodes related of David in chapters 16 and 17 are not altogether easy to fit together into one consistent narrative. 1 Sam. 16:14-23 tells how David was introduced into Saul's court, how he came into very close relations with the king, inasmuch that Saul "loved him greatly" and made him his armor-bearer. In the next episode, the conflict with Goliath, Saul and David converse as total strangers and after the fight Saul inquired who David was. Besides, the introduction of David in the Goliath incident (17:12) is scarcely such as would be expected, considering that he had already been introduced and his family described in the previous chapter. It is possible that the narrative may have gotten tangled by the arrangement of the episodes in other than the chronological order.

Israel and the Philistines.

Between the tribes of Israel and their Philistine enemies to the south and west there was almost perpetual warfare. The periods of peace were but breathing-spaces, during which one or the other of them was preparing for an attack. While Saul had been turning his attention to the enemies on the east, the Ammonites and Amalekites, the Philistines were strengthening themselves for a grand assault upon the new kingdom. In considerable measure the Israelites had probably been subject to the suzerainty of the Philistines during most of the time since their occupation of Canaan. The establishment of the monarchy was a formal declaration of independence, an assertion of their political equality. The Philistines resented this and renewed the old warfare with vigor.

The Champion and his Defiance.

When the opposing armies were assembled on opposite mountain sides with a valley between, the Philistines brought forth a champion, Goliath, and proposed that the issue be decided by single combat between this giant and some champion of Israel. In the days when sword and spear and javelin were the weapons of war, stature and muscular strength made the warrior, and an army with a nine-foot giant for its champion might feel reasonably safe in proposing single combat. But Israel had no giant, and so they hesitated, unwilling to bear the shame of refusing Goliath's challenge, yet afraid to accept it. The time was ripe for the appearance of a popular hero. It was one of those rare occasions which called for a piece of spectacular heroism under circumstances where it would touch the imagination of all the people and win the highest degree of popular applause. It was most fitting that such an opportunity should be offered to David who, as the supplanter of Saul in the kingship, would need all the popularity he could acquire.

David Volunteers.

It is somewhat singular that David, who had already been described as "a mighty man of valor" and who was the king's armor-bearer, should have been feeding his father's sheep at a time when the Philistines were in arms against Israel and when "all the men of Israel" (verse 19) had joined Saul's army, and that, when he came to the camp in the humble capacity of a carrier of provisions, his surly elder brothers suspected him of no purpose more serious than a boyish desire to see the battle. It requires no great degree of ingenuity, however, to reconcile these details if one feels the need of doing so. Under a regime where the birthright went to the eldest and where honor was in proportion to age, the youngest of eight sons could not expect to be treated very respectfully by his elder brothers. If their jealousy was aroused, as well it may have been, by Samuel's anointing him and by his preferment at court, they might be the more disposed to belittle and deride him. That David was at this time a man, not a mere boy, is clear from many circumstances. The fact that men reported to Saul his inquiry about the reward to be given to the slayer of Goliath and that Saul thought it worth while to confer with him; the fact that Saul offered him his armor and actually put it on him; the fact that David refused to wear Saul's armor, not because it was too large or heavy for him, but because he had not tested it and accustomed himself to it as one does to a favorite weapon or tool; the fact that David was made commander-in-chief of Israel's army immediately after this event—all this indicates that he was a grown man at the time of the fight with Goliath.

The Fight.

It was natural that Saul should be reluctant to let David go as Israel's champion against Goliath, for on the issue of the duel depended not only the champion's personal safety, but also, by the terms of the agreement, the freedom of all Israel. Saul must have seen that this young man who was full of all the craft of forest and field, who slew bears and lions with his bare hands, who was willing to go with his sling against the heavy armed giant, carried with him a power other than his own.

This was precisely David's view of the matter. He did not expect to conquer Goliath by his own personal prowess, but by the help of Jehovah. That was the difference between the giant and his young antagonist. Goliath's defiance and disdain were based wholly upon his own sense of superiority. He was big. He was strong. He was afraid of nothing. This is always a dangerous frame of mind. Even humanly speaking, over-confidence is weakness. What is still more important, reliance upon one's own strength without regard to the will and help of God, means utter impotence. Compare Goliath's defiance (vs. 42-44) with David's reply (vs. 45-47). Goliath glorified himself. David glorified God.

The outcome was as it usually is: Self-confidence failed and trust in God succeeded. Goliath fell, the Philistines fled, and Israel was saved. No wonder they hailed David as their hero and that the women sang: "Saul hath slain his thousands, but David his ten thousands."

But Saul's evil heart was moved with jealousy and, while he promoted David to high military rank, he began that day to seek his life.

Lesson Thoughts.

God often chooses the weak things to put at naught the strong.

Better a sling and a stone on God's side than full armor against him.

Men of most meager equipment sometimes do the best service. David's ammunition seemed scanty, but in reality he had four stones left over.

It was nothing against Saul's armor that David could not use it. It was good armor—for Saul. The army of Israel did not throw away its swords and spears and use slings and stones thereafter. The incident does not show that God prefers poor equipment to good equipment (ignorance to education, for example) but that he wants each man to use the weapons best suited to his powers and to the occasion.

All human efforts directed against the purposes of God are sooner or later futile. The current of the divine plan flows on. Better be moving with it with a feeble force than against it with the mightiest.

Preaching and Teaching.

In preparing a young man for the ministry, our Bible colleges have been very particular that he should study "The Preparation and Delivery of Sermons," but where has he been taught even the simplest rules and principles of pedagogy? They have instructed him as to the general management of "church" services, and in "pastoral duties," but where have they taught him how to conduct a Bible-school? As a people, we are not behind others in these matters. Theological seminaries, with but here and there an exception in the way of a few lectures, have uniformly ignored the teaching function of the church. They have turned their attention to the production of preachers instead of teachers, pulpites instead of school men. But a Bible people should be the leader in Bible teaching and Bible studying. While we are well along with others, we are not satisfied. We must lead in this, as in other matters in the restoration of the ancient order. Some progress is being made. The plan to introduce into every school a normal course, with the idea that each congregation should so instruct certain ones in its membership that they may be able to "teach others also," is a long step in that direction. The Home Department, which insists that "every Disciple shall be a Disciple," if not in the main church school, at least at home, is another advance step. The constant remodeling of old church buildings, and the modeling of new ones to conform to the needs of the teaching work as well as the preaching service, and the equipment of our church houses with modern appliances for the teachers, are other evidences of this appreciation. Each year we have heard of the revival season for the ingathering of members to the "church," but only this year has there been anything like a general, concerted move made for adding to the membership of our schools.—J. H. BRYAN, in Iowa Bible-school Year Book.

LESSONS FROM PAUL. II.

Rom. 1:1-17.

The epistle to the Romans is the greatest of Paul's letters. It deals with profound doctrines of the Christian faith. Perhaps it was for this reason that Paul thought it necessary in the introductory verses to state some of the most elementary things. The following are some of the lessons which Paul teaches in these verses:

The Dignity of Christian Service. Paul suffered much from persistent enemies who denied his apostleship and tried to weaken the power of his message by personal attacks. So at the very outset of this epistle, as of several others, he asserts the divine authority of his message and his own authority as a bearer of a word from God. There is a sense in which every Christian ought to be, as Paul said he was, "separated unto the gospel of God." Not separated from the world, but separated from the evil of the world and dedicated to the gospel and to the work of spreading it. Paul gloried in his apostleship. He wore it as proudly as he might have worn a kingly robe. And we may well glory in our discipleship. It is an honor and a dignity above anything that earth can offer.

The Fame of the Faithful. "Your faith is spoken of throughout the whole world." Faith is by nature contagious. Men of faith strengthen the faith of others and multiply the number of the faithful. So when one's faith is widely known it means that streams of positive influence are going forth. It is not like the fame that consists in mere personal praise for the gratification of vanity or ambition. Here is the sort of reputation that is worth while. The faith of the church at Rome is still spoken of and is still an encouragement to the faith of the whole world.

Unceasing in Prayer. Paul prayed without ceasing for the welfare of the Roman church. Yet it was not one of the churches which he had founded; he had not yet even visited it. But he prayed for the advancement of the cause of Christ in all places. We should do the same. Even more urgent and more constant than our petitions for the satisfaction of our own wants should be our prayers for the success and prosperity of the gospel both at home and abroad. It would work a revolution in our home and foreign missionary work if we could get all our churches to praying for missions as Paul did.

Debtors to the Needy. "I am debtor both to the Greeks and to the barbarians." Paul had a treasure of priceless worth. It was not his to keep, but his to administer in the interest of those who needed it. It was a trust, and he was a debtor until he had discharged his obligation to the full. It was this which sent him throughout the then known world to preach the gospel amid perils and discomforts to both bond and free. He was only paying his debt. He did not claim that he was playing the part of generosity, but only of simple honesty and justice. Such is the imperative obligation which rests upon all who have received the gospel message and its blessings. They are debtors to the millions who sit in darkness.

The Power of God to Salvation. So Paul describes the gospel. It was perfected in weakness, but it is not weak. It is the power of God. Judged by the record of what it has accomplished in saving individual men, in purifying society, in brightening the home, in freeing the captives, in bringing joy into life, there is every reason why we should not be ashamed of it, but should find in it our glory and pride.

THE GREAT TEACHER.—HIS AUTHORITY.
MARK 1:21-27. JOHN 10:1-9. MAT. 28:18-20.

The Scribes and Pharisees thought they had all religious authority in Jesus' day, and they were incensed that he should preach and teach without consulting them. The people who listened to him wondered at his message, for he spoke with authority. He commanded the winds and the waves. He cast out demons. He healed the sick. He was, in every point of contact with nature and society, a man of authority.

Whence did it come? There can be no gain-saying it; but how was it derived? The authority of Jesus was something new in the world. To this day there are religious organizations, such as the Roman Catholic church, which claim all authority in religion. According to the doctrine of the dead pope, every issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, as of all other Protestant papers, is a huge impertinence. All Protestant teachers are without authority. To get authority to teach, according to the Roman Catholic or Episcopalian view, you must touch hands with their long line of bishops.

But Jesus of Nazareth went about teaching and preaching, as did John the Baptist, without consulting the established centers of authority. Who gave them authority? Was it from heaven, or from men? The carping Pharisees would not say from which source they considered John the Baptist had his authority; they dared not take either horn of the dilemma, against which Jesus thrust them. Neither would he tell them by what authority he wrought and taught.

The authority of the Master was the authority of the truth. It is because he spoke the truth that he spoke with authority; and he spoke the truth because he was the truth incarnate. If we can imagine Jesus to have spoken one false word, then where would have been his authority? But his words were true, his life was true.

Truth is evermore authoritative, because it is man's right to hear it. The human mind has an inherent right to the truth. Truth enlightens; truth liberates; truth inspires. "The truth shall make you free." Every man who comes into the world with a message of truth is a man sent from God. Jesus himself declares the pre-eminence of John the Baptist as Jehovah's messenger; "there hath not arisen a greater than John." And John says of Jesus, "He must increase, but I must decrease."

The church and the world have much yet to learn of Jesus, who is the way, the truth and the life. He commanded the winds, and they obeyed him; he rebuked diseases, and they fled away; he spoke, and the sheeted dead arose; he uttered his voice, and sophistry was silenced. No wonder Milton says, "Let truth and falsehood grapple."

And this truth which Jesus spoke it is our high privilege to echo. First, we should incorporate it into our lives. He who would speak the truth must himself be the truth. In a much mis-quoted phrase of Emerson—"How can I hear what you are saying when what you are is thundering in my ears?" Day by day the struggle to live a true, upright life must go on. There is no salvation otherwise, for ourselves, or for those we seek to guide.

And then, conscious of living true, we are to proclaim the truth. And whether in the small circle or before the great audience, we are to speak with boldness, with confidence unwavering. It is impossible to think of Jesus Christ as an impostor. He lived a life of sinlessness; his character is flawless; and the same witnesses who tell us of his birth and public ministry, report his claim to be the only begotten son of God. With his authority, what need we fear? "All authority is given unto me," he said; 'go ye therefore, and teach.'

Prayer.

We thank thee, O God, for the truth which redeems and sanctifies; for the Great Teacher, whose word still enlightens the world, and spreads benefactions everywhither. Grant, we beseech thee, that we may ever obey him and trust him fully, and as his disciples, teach the truth in confidence. Amen.

A Great Railroad.

It may be truthfully said that railroads, more than any other medium, make a great city. St. Louis is truly great in her railroads, having some twenty-one important lines terminating within her borders.

One of the most important of these roads to St. Louis is the WABASH LINE, from the fact that it draws the commerce of nearly all sections of the country to this metropolis, as a magnet draws kindred metals to itself.

The great arms of this growing system reach to Kansas City, Omaha, Des Moines, Albia and Ottumwa, Ia.; Chicago, Toledo, Detroit and Buffalo, and attract business from beyond these important gateways, even from the remote Pacific Coast, the extreme Northwest, the Great Lakes and the Atlantic borders.

It is commercially aggressive, and in its never ceasing activity is to-day reaching its great steel tentacles toward Pittsburg, Pa., and Baltimore, Md. In a little more than a year these two beehives of industry and all their tributary territory will be bound to St. Louis by the continuous rails of the WABASH.

Its through-car system is perfect, running solid, fully equipped trains for night and day service to Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, Des Moines, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Toledo, Niagara Falls and Buffalo, and through sleeping cars to New York, Boston, Montreal, Denver, Portland, Ore., Los Angeles and San Francisco.

Its train equipment is modern in every particular, there having recently been placed in service many new passenger cars, consisting of Observation-Cafe and Library Cars, Reclining Chair Cars, Dining Cars, Day Coaches and Combination smoking and Baggage Cars, which are models of beauty and neatness, representing the highest state of development in car building.

This road will be called upon to transport hundreds of thousands of visitors to the World's Fair in 1904, and its facilities will be found ample for so gigantic an undertaking.

THE WABASH is essentially a St. Louis line, having its General Officers, from the President down, located here, and has an army of employes, necessary to carry on this vast system, who are citizens of St. Louis.

It spends its money largely in St. Louis and it has the interest of St. Louis always in mind.

Truly this is "A GREAT RAILROAD," and above all things, it is a St. Louis railroad.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

75 HOME BANK BUILDING,
DETROIT, MICH.

Our Budget

—I. R. Lines has taken charge of the work at Hartford and Fowler, O.

—The church at St. James, Mo., is preparing for a meeting in September.

—The college will open September 1, with every prospect of a good work before it.

—Geo. Darsie, of Frankfort, Ky., is spending the month of August at Boulder, Col.

—W. T. Brooks, of Ladoga, Ind., has been engaged for a meeting beginning Nov. 10.

—J. H. Hardin writes that his permanent address is No. 5 Fountaine Hill, Boston, Mass.

—J. H. Gilliland, of Bloomington, Ill., is spending the summer at Niagara-on-the-Lake.

—The church at Maitland, T. B. Dry, minister, is preparing to erect a new building this autumn.

—The church at Granby, Mo., will need a minister after Sept. 1. Write J. M. Miller for further information.

—Cecil J. Armstrong, pastor at Winchester, is spending his summer vacation at Oil Spring near Indian Fields, Ky.

—Chas. Bloom, Scio, N. Y., has accepted a call from the church at Leroy, Ill. He will take charge about August 25.

—J. N. Crutcher was formerly installed as pastor of Central Church, Moberly, Mo., July 25, J. B. Briney preaching the sermon.

—Philip Evans has located at Craig, Mo., where he is engaged for half time, and will employ the other half in work with nearby places.

—W. H. Trainum, of Monroe, Tex., expects to take a medical and dental course at Nashville, Tenn., preparatory to missionary work in Mexico.

—Edward Clutter, of Bethany, is having good success doing field work for Cotner University, and the outlook for the school is very encouraging.

—The ninth annual session of the Fountain Park Assembly, Remington, Ind., begins Aug. 1, and lasts through Aug. 16. The program is attractive.

—A neat folder announces the new correspondence school of Drake University. This department will be ready to begin with the fall term of 1903.

—Are you assisting us in increasing the circulation of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST? Its power for good is increased just as its readers are multiplied.

—C. G. Blackman, a promising young minister, filled the pulpit at Butler, Mo., on the evening of July 19. He desires fourth time appointments near Butler.

—On Wednesday, July 22, Horace Augustus Pearce was ordained to the ministry by the elders of the church at Aurora. W. B. Cochran was the officiating minister.

—The fifteenth annual convention of the churches of Christ of southern California and Arizona will be held at Long Beach, Cal., Aug. 6-16. A good program is in readiness.

—E. H. Williamson, of Butler, Mo., writes that he knows an able and consecrated young man who desires to engage as minister of a church paying a salary of $600 or $800.

—W. A. Moore, the efficient Bible-school evangelist, has organized a thrifty Bible-school at Lucerne, Mo., and has another in the process of organization at Antioch, Mo.

—The fourth Maxinkuchee Assembly near Culver, Ind., will be held August 6-31. A. M. Hootman, Sec., Logansport, Ind., will be glad to furnish you with all information and a program.

—The South Street Church at Springfield, Mo., has purchased the house and lot adjoining it on South Street. This gives ample room for enlarging the building, which will be done in the near future.

—Woodland Street Church, Nashville, Tenn., has a new minister in the person of Jos. D. Armistead, of Hopkinsville, Ky., lately graduated from Kentucky University. Woodland Street is the original missionary church of Nashville.

—H. Morton Gregory, pastor of Highland Park Christian Church, Des Moines, Ia., desires to rent a tent about 46x30 feet in dimensions for a couple of weeks in August. Any one having such a tent may write to him at 3507 Second St., Des Moines, Ia.

—On Sunday, July 19, W. M. Taylor, lately missionary to Porto Rico, delivered an address on that field in the Vine Street Church, Nashville, Tenn., in the morning and at the South College Street Church (same city) in the evening, to the edification of his audiences.

—The Metropolitan Church of Christ, Chas. Reign Scoville, pastor, has purchased a fine lot and will begin the erection of a building at once. Meanwhile a tabernacle tent, seating nearly 2,000, has been purchased and located at the corner of Harrison Street and Irving Avenue.

—The Bible-school campaign in Sullivan county, Mo., was a great success. It has done much to increase both zeal and good fellowship in Christian work. Northwest Missouri counties desiring to know more about it may write to W. A. Moore, care of H. F. Davis, 117 Locust St., St. Louis, Mo.

—At Wister, Ind. Ter., W. H. Winters will discuss with I. J. Yandel, (Free-will Baptist) the question of whether, as the latter affirms, the church he represents is the Church of Christ. The name, conversion, design of baptism, baptism of the Holy Spirit, and foot-washing are some of the points in controversy.

—Albert Buxton, the new president of Dex-Christian College, arrived in Dexter Sunday, July 12, and preached at the Christian church both morning and evening. On the Tuesday following at the Cumberland Presbyterian church the citizens of Dexter extended to him a formal welcome, the mayor being spokesman.

—The receipts for foreign missions for the first twenty-three days of July amounted to $20,504.38, a gain of $3,343.24. The receipts for the missionary year up to July 23, amounted to $163,466.45, or a gain of $17,304.22. A gain of only $4,372.10 during August and September will insure the $200,000. Let it be made by all means.

—The churches and Sunday-Schools in St. Joe county, Ind., have raised $400 to pay Dr. Susie C. Rijnhart's traveling expenses to Tibet. This is about double the amount that was given last year by the same churches and Sunday-schools. This is a good advance. A similar increase all along the line would more than insure the $200,000 for foreign missions before September 30.

—Surely all those who enjoy and are helped by the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will take an interest in enlarging its number of subscribers. We have made it so easy to do this by our summer offer of only sixty cents until Jan. 1, 1904, to a new subscriber, or one dollar for the paper during the same period to two new subscribers. Many are aiding in this campaign; why not every one?

—Butler College of the University of Indianapolis has conferred the degree of L. L. D. upon James R. Challen, of Jacksonville, Fla. Mr. Challen was a professor of Northwestern Christian University, from which was evolved the University of Indianapolis. He has been practicing law in Florida for some years, and was a member of the convention which framed the present constitution of that state.

—The minister of Lockland Church, Nashville, Tenn., L. E. Crouch, called at this office on his way to Luther, Okla., where he will visit his parents. He reports the condition of his congregation very encouraging. There have been forty-one additions during the year. Robt. L. Cave, of Clarksville, Tenn., has been engaged for a meeting beginning the fourth Lord's day in August.

—J. G. Creason and family are spending a few weeks with Mrs. Creason's parents near Olustee, Okla. Brother Creason began a meeting in the Presbyterian church building July 22. We have no organization in the town.

—The Central Church of St. Louis, Howard T. Cree, minister, is attempting to support two missionaries this year, one on the home and one on the foreign field, thus becoming a "living link" church in both home and foreign societies. And this church, too, is preparing for a new building, which will involve great expenditures, yet it does not believe that missions should be made to suffer because of local needs.

—The Prairie View Church, of which Rev. Thos. Wallace is pastor, elected the following officers on Lord's day evening, July 12. Organist, Alva Brashear; assistant organist, Miss Stella Paris; chorister, F. M. Brashear; assistant, Chever Day. Delegates to the county convention, J. N. Caldwell and Dr. Paul Coil. A ladies' aid society was organized and the following officers elected: First president, Mrs. Columbus Smith; second president, Mrs. Clarence Ragsdale; treasurer, Mrs. Day; secretary, Mrs. F. M. Brashear.

—The Church convention of Montgomery county, Ind., will be held at Ladoga, Aug. 14, in the Tabernacle. The following congregations will be represented: Crawfordsville, Ladoga, Waveland, Waynetown, New Richmond, Darlington, New Ross, Alamo, Bowers, Parkersburg, Whitesville, Young's Chapel, Mace, Fountain, Bethel, Beckville, Ridge Farm, New Market and Brownsvalley. Write to E. E. Moorman, secretary, for a copy of the excellent program.

—It will be remembered by many that S. G. Griffith and wife, of Boone, Iowa, volunteered at the late Iowa convention to accompany Dr. Susie C. Rijnhart to Tibet, as missionaries to that strange land. Mrs. Griffith was not able to stand a satisfactory medical examination. She is not physically strong. This is a great disappointment to the foreign society. Is there not some brave, well-equipped man ready to volunteer for this position? Dr. Rijnhart is ready to go out, but desires to be accompanied by a man and wife.

—The Nodaway Valley district will hold its annual convention Aug. 18-20, at Stanberry, Mo. A good and interesting program has been prepared. Some of the speakers are: Brothers Frank Garrett, China; W. J. Lhamon, Columbia; C. M. Chilton, St. Joseph; B. F. Hill, Plattsburg; W. A. Moore, St. Louis; Mrs. L. G. Bantz, St. Louis, and others from the district. The Stanberry Church is making extensive preparations to entertain them, and requests that all delegates send in their names to the chairman of the assignment committee, A. C. Frisbie, Stanberry, Mo.

—The Central Christian Church of Columbus, Ind., known all over the state as the "roof garden church," celebrated its third anniversary yesterday by holding appropriate services. The present minister, O. W. McGaughey, preached the sermon in the morning. In the afternoon there was a union service of all the churches of the city, the several ministers being present and engaging in congratulatory remarks. The ladies served dinner at the noon hour in the roof garden. The amount of the subscription exceeded $1,000. The members and friends of the church are happy.

—Dr. Amory H. Bradford, pastor of the First Congregational church, Montclair, N. J., and president of the National Council of the Congregational churches, says in a recent letter to the editor: "It seems to me that in Mr. Durban you have an almost ideal correspondent in Great Britain. I do not find any letters in any American papers concerning things in old England more illuminating and interesting than the admirable letters of Mr. Durban in the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST." We are glad to publish this well-deserved compliment to our London correspondent, Brother W. Durban. We are sure our readers will endorse most heartily the appreciative words of Dr. Bradford.

—We have a card extending an invitation to be present on the occasion of the 25th anniversary of the marriage of Mr and Mrs. Greece Lawrence Wharton, Saturday evening, August 1, at home, Hiram, O. Our sincere congratulations are tendered to Brother and Sister Wharton on having reached their silver wedding and we sincerely trust that their useful lives may be continued to celebrate their golden wedding together. We understand it is their purpose to return to the foreign mission field soon to resume their work under the auspices of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. The good wishes of the whole brotherhood will be with them on their anniversary occasion as they go once more to their distant field of labor beyond the sea.

—A somewhat new feature of "religious activity" has been introduced among the St. Louis churches by the formation of the St. Louis Christian Church Baseball League, composed of teams from the various churches in this city. A regular schedule of games for each Saturday afternoon has been arranged and the winning team at the end of the season is presented with a handsome cup. Only those are privileged to become members of the clubs who are members of the churches or interested in some department of the church work. The minister of one of the churches and the captain of his own team says a greater proportion of the ball team is present at the regular church services than from any other organization of the church. It is the only league of the kind in the city and has received quite favorable comment from the local press.

—The first annual roll call meeting of the Church of Christ at Sandoval, Ill., was held in the high school park, Sunday, July 19, 1903. Invitations to the neighboring churches brought in a number of visitors, and the perfect weather, the basket dinner and the universal spirit of Christian good fellowship made the occasion a most enjoyable one. Bro. J. Fred Jones, the secretary of our Illinois state work, was present and gave two of the most sensible, practical addresses ever given in Sandoval. Even members of the other churches of the community were enthusiastic in their praise of his message. He also ordained the pastor and the elders and deacons of the new church board. The reports show the church membership to be 177. During the year there were eight added by conversion, six by statement, and one by letter, making fifteen in all. R. Burt Doan is pastor.

—And now comes our esteemed Cincinnati contemporary discussing once more the subject of Federation. It insists on seeing ghosts and spooks in Church Federation, and refuses to accept the most direct and positive denials of certain things attributed to, and affirmed of Church Federation by those who are in a position to know what Church Federation is. One of its statements which has been punctured time and again, is the following: "To say that Federation has no authority over the individual church is a confusion of ideas. Voluntary agreements are authoritative within their own proper conditions. As long as a church is under a federation agreement it is compelled in all honor to carry out the terms of that agreement." Exactly so; but federation, as our esteemed contemporary has been told, time and again, does not ask for any "agreement" on the part of the churches to do anything against their judgment or conscience, but simply asks their voluntary cooperation in such measures as have their hearty endorsement. There would, therefore, be no violation of any "agreement" if any church should decline to enter upon any work because it could not conscientiously cooperate in such work. But still we expect our neighbor to go on asserting this and kindred statements, just as if no one had ever denied them. Our contemporary cannot be unaware of this feature of Federation, because it quotes a statement from the Outlook asserting that, "No one of them [that is the co-operating churches] is asked to give up its essential principles," and objects to that statement, interpreting it to mean that, "there must be no interference with denominational peculiarities." But suppose it is one of our "essential principles" to teach a broad, undenominational Christianity? Would we be expected to give that up? This reminds us of our neighbor's objection to Christian Endeavor, that it pledged each Endeavorer to be true to his own church, and it held that this was protecting denominationalism and providing for its perpetuity! But suppose the pledge had granted liberty for each Endeavorer to be false to his own church! It is very hard to please some people and papers.

Popular Hymns No. 2.

By C. C. CLINE.

The ruling purpose of the author has been to give to the public a worthy successor of Popular Hymns. He has not sought to duplicate it, but to make a book as well adapted to the new methods of Church, Sunday-school and C. E. work as the first was to the conditions twenty years ago when Popular Hymns was launched upon its long and useful career. POPULAR HYMNS No. 2 is better than its predecessor, not because it contains better music, but because the music is better adapted to the present wants of all the working forces of the army of the Lord.

Evangelists will find the Gospel Proclamation in Song a department of the book eminently suited to every phase of a successfully conducted revival.

Choristers will find the average choir supplied with a rich selection of beautiful and impressive solos with choruses, duets, quartettes, invocations and doxologies specially selected for the distinctive part a choir is expected to take in the service.

Christian Endeavorers will find in Popular Hymns No. 2 all that they can wish, because it is full from back to back with soul-inspiring sentiment set to soul-inspiring music, the only kind C. E.'s care to sing. The Solos, Duets, and Quartettes may be impressively used to enrich every session of the Society.

S. S. Superintendents who believe the Sunday-school should be the nursery of the church, the church at work saving the young, will find Popular Hymns No. 2 richly supplied with music within the voice compass and heart reach of the children, giving them a desire to remain and participate in the song service of the church.

Pastors who are responsible for the kind of pasture upon which the sheep and lambs are fed will not find a sentiment out of harmony with New Testament Christianity. He will find it a companion vade mecum for his pocket Testament, containing gems for public worship, for the prayer-meeting, for funeral occasions, for Baptismal, Thanksgiving and Convention services. He will find that an expensive hymnal will not be needed unless it be to keep in style.

Like its predecessor, IT IS AN ALL ROUND BOOK.

Correspondence

Church Federation in England and New Jersey.

R. J. Campbell, the successor of Joseph Parker, occupies what is perhaps the most conspicuous non-conformist pulpit in Great Britain. Mr. Campbell arrived in New York on the 20th of June on his first visit to this side. The following day he preached from the pulpit made famous by Henry Ward Beecher, and in the evening he addressed the united congregations of Montclair, N. J., in the First Congregational Church, commonly known as Dr. Bradford's church. On Monday at noon he spoke to a great assembly of ministers in the assembly room of the Presbyterian mission house.

Mr. Campbell has already been described by the London correspondent of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, and nothing need be said here in that line except to note the accuracy of the description. The one disappointing feature of Mr. Campbell's address is due to his voice, which, because it is neither heavy nor penetrating, prevented a majority of the congregation of fifteen hundred at Montclair from hearing him, and the like result was commented upon regretfully by the Monday audience.

In his discourse to the ministers, Mr. Campbell spoke on three topics, "Church Federation," "The Education Bill" and "The Spiritual Outlook in England."

Of the first subject, Mr. Campbell briefly noted the origin of the movement some thirty years ago, and that this country had borrowed the idea from the mother country. He spoke of the growing consciousness that, despite denominational differences and peculiarities, the church of Christ was one indivisible church, and that it slowly dawned upon the minds of many that, such being the case, it would be a good thing to come together and say so from the same platform. In this way it has come about that in all matters of general and common concern, but two churches are spoken of, the Established church and the Free church, the latter representing all the denominations, with few minor exceptions, and comprising a membership of about eight millions, somewhat more than the membership of the Established church.

The advantages of the federation of churches have been strikingly demonstrated in the present religious crisis. Under cover of the education bill, the very heart of the Free church movement is assailed. Following the leadership of the intrepid Dr. Gifford, the late Dr. Parker, Dr. Fairbairn and men of like mold and temper, the tremendous moral power of the massed and unbroken sentiment of the Free church adherents could be summoned and expressed on notice of twenty-four hours. Such grouping and expression of the non-conformist mind is an object lesson scarcely less valuable to the Free church itself than to the government.

The reception of Mr. Campbell and his message by the great gathering of preachers representing the denominations, was, as clearly as such a thing can be, a public demonstration that denominationalism is infinitely less sectarian than it has been in the past. One interested listener kept revolving in his mind the Master's expression, "I have yet many things to say to you, but you are not able to bear them now," and wondering whether it were better to improve every opportunity to condemn these brethren for their blindness and perversity, or on the contrary, to applaud heartily their timorous and tentative efforts to "get together," to encourage them to persevere and demonstrate the advantages of union yet more clearly, and to keep in touch with them and prove his own sincerity until these institution-loving brethren were sufficiently, if unconsciously, prepared for the full gospel program of union, and then let them have it, the whole of it, and in the spirit of Christ.

Federation in New Jersey.

The relation between mosquitoes and church federation is certainly not apparent at first glance. But let it be understood that the pest in question succeeds in getting into intimate relation to pretty much everything in this state. Were it not for his unwelcome ubiquity, real estate values hereabouts would increase by many millions. The people who do brave the ravages of the diminutive but voracious bird are a hardy lot of home seekers, kindred in spirit to the pioneers of early days. Were it not for the assiduous and insidious attentions of the insect, north Jersey would be a paradise. Its thousand miles of perfect roadway, its magnificent parks of many thousand acres in extent, its perfect mountain scenery, its proximity to the ocean and to the commercial metropolis; even with the mosquito throwing himself in for good measure, north Jersey is favored in great degree above most of her fellows.

Lying east of the Orange Mountains, which approach to within twelve miles of the Hudson river, and lying immediately contiguous to the city of Newark, is a unique group of scattered municipalities. They are connected by a veritable network of steam and electric roads, as well as by numerous boulevards and paved highways. They are all peopled most largely by New York business men who prefer suburban home life to the crowded city. These cities and villages have, therefore, like characteristics, conditions and local problems. If joined into a single municipality, as may happen in the not remote future, the result would be a city having a population but little less than that of Philadelphia, it would be the fourth in size of the cities of this country, and, in all likelihood, it would be the most homogeneous municipality of any at all comparable in size in all the world.

From this it will be seen that the social problems of the churches are almost identical. The larger interests of all Christian bodies are matters of common concern, and it is only the part of wisdom to recognize the situation.

All the Christian preachers of the northern part of the state were invited to meet in Newark on the afternoon of June 22. Many of them had gone over to hear Mr. Campbell; some did not return. But a respectable number did gather in response to the call, seven denominations being represented, and the ministers present were among the most prominent leaders of thought in their various works.

Having read so much about federation, I was anxious to see the plan worked from its inception. I knew well enough that I was not invited to federate on the ground of the tremendous influence of our work in this state. As the sole active representative of our brotherhood in New Jersey, I was the most nearly a negligible factor of any, and I went to the meeting in the capacity of an interested listener, with all my critical armor properly adjusted.

Strangely enough, as I thought, the Methodists, represented by Dr. Jesse L. Hurlburt, were most conspicuous in seeking co-operation with the other churches for the common good of all. The Presbyterian and Reformed ministers were not at all behind the Congregationalists in affirming their earnest desire to unite forces in all ways which would further the earthly interests of the heavenly kingdom. In a two-hour discussion, which included the remarks by the rectors of two of Newark's prominent Episcopal parishes, and the Baptist and Methodist Protestant preachers present, there was not one discordant or un-Christian sentiment uttered, the name and cause of Christ over and above all ecclesiastical differences was exalted by every speaker, and the committee to draft a constitution for the organization of the federation was appointed with the kindest and most consistent desire for fraternal fellowship with all who love Christ and work for his glory.

During the discussion, my judgment was sought with as much deference as if I represented a multitude rather than a handful. I told them plainly that only in so far as the federation was a good step toward the union for which Jesus prayed and which the apostle urged by most solemn adjuration, did I favor it; federation was not all I wanted, but I would count it a happy privilege to take what I could get now and work heartily with them for closer fellowship throughout the body of Christ.

The meeting of New Jersey preachers on last Monday was worth everything to the preachers who were there. Its larger influences are yet to be measured. As our only preacher representative in the state, I stand a good chance to get on most of the working committees without any self-seeking. At present, my purpose is to use every advantage to make known the position and aims of the Disciples of Christ, and to encourage the good brethren to get together and to keep as closely together in the spirit of the Lord as possible, and if the spirit of the Lord does not point them in time to the positive necessity of scriptural union, I shall lose faith in my ability to read aright the spirit of the word.

About one year ago, Mr. Baer won for himself the hearty and universal contempt of pretty much the whole nation by the haughty and uncompromising way he chose to follow in "refusing to recognize the unions." Every one could see that the union was an accomplished fact and had to be reckoned with; to refuse to see things as they are, and to deal with them accordingly, was an intolerable course. Which thing is a parable.

The denominations are here. There is less sectarianism among them than since Protestantism divided into parties. What shall we do about it? Shall we continue to affirm falsely "that the denominations are our worst enemies" and make ourselves intolerable to them and others? Or shall we recognize that they have come into their institutions by inheritance, that they are already chaffing under the narrowing yokes, that they are doing wonders in breaking down denominational walls and in getting together, and that the closer they do come together, the more willing will they be to hear and heed us, if, meanwhile, we have exhibited the splendid manhood which ought to be the result of our scriptural plea for Christian union?

East Orange, N. J. R. P. SHEPHERD.

The Disciples of Christ in Washington.

Among the Protestant bodies of Washington the Disciples of Christ rank about sixth. The Methodists are first with about 250 churches and about 15,000 members; the Presbyterians are second with 145 churches and 9,000 members; the Congregationalists are third with 134 churches and 7,369 members; the Protestant Episcopalians, fifth with 98 churches and 6,000 members and the Disciples, sixth with about 75 churches and approximately 5,000 members. Our actual strength is hardly so large as our numbers indicate owing to the fact that our membership is largely in the country. It is universally conceded that the cities are the centers of wealth and power. They largely control the political and religious life of the nation. The greater part of our missionary money comes from our city churches. I have tried to discern why it is that we are not as strong in the cities of the state as we are in the country and find a few facts that partially account for the situation. We cannot raise the cry that others were here first, for some of the leading families of the early settlers were members of the Christian church. I could mention the names of many who came to Puget Sound in the fifties and whose children are now wealthy and influential, but they are not in the church. Neither were they wanting in opportunity to get church property, for the lot on which our people built their first house of worship in Seattle was donated and more ground was offered them, but they refused it because they would have to pay tax on it. They were good people, but they were not seers. They were wanting in prophetic vision. Their preachers were defenders of the faith, but not wise master builders. Another reason our strength is in the country and not in the city is that many of the farmers of eastern Washington came from Missouri, Iowa, Kansas and Nebraska where we have many members, while many of the business men of our cities came from the far east where our numbers are few.

Within the last few years our work in the cities has taken on new life. We have good and growing churches in Spokane, Walla Walla, Waukegan, Dayton, North Yakima, Tacoma, Olympia, Seattle, Ballard, Everett, and Whatcom. There is one interesting fact in connection with the work in nearly all of these places, namely, it was either begun or fostered by the American Christian Missionary Society. There are many names that will live in the history of our work and are worthy of special mention. Bro. F. Walden called the first state missionary convention, was for some years state evangelist and has been actively identified with the work in its entire history. Other men who have served as state evangelists are E. C. Sanderson, R. E. Dunlap, F. B. Sapp, N. S. McCallum and the present evangelist, J. M. Morris. Prominent pastors who have served our churches are J. S. McCallum, Doctor J. M. Allen, J. T. Eshelman, J. N. Smith, W. S. Crockett, A. C. Vail, M. L. Rose, B. E. Utz, H. K. Pendleton and others whose names I cannot now recall. But among all the men who have been instrumental in bringing our work to the front, there is none more worthy of mention than that of William F. Cowden. For years he has been the able and efficient representative of the American Christian Missionary Society. Like Paul of old the care of all the churches has been upon him. He has been a wise counsellor and a faithful steward.

Washington is one of the richest of states in her natural resources. Her climate is salubrious, her scenery is unsurpassed and her possibilities are beyond the ken of man. God has intended that she should support a great people. Our plans for the kingdom of God ought to be commensurate with the greatness of her possibilities. B. H. LINGENFELTER.

Dedication at Alexandria, Mo.

One of the best works done lately in this vicinity was that of building a beautiful church at Alexandria, by the Christian church of that place, led by Rev. Seymour.

The part Brother Seymour performed was both unusual and commendable. He did all the carpenter work, practically donating his services, or at least the greater portion. The frame work was made of native elm lumber which was very hard to handle. Church is valued at $1,600. Size 32x46; circular pulpit platform; baptistry under pulpit; two dressing rooms; beautiful tower 19 feet, six inches from base to pinnacle; seating capacity 325.

Dedicatory services were held Sunday July 19, under the leadership of Rev. H. A. Northcutt, of Kirksville, Mo., assisted by Rev. Seymour, Rev. M. S. Ackles and Rev. Jas. Connoran, of Keokuk, Ia.

Church desired to raise $600; amount raised at services, $470. Remaining $130 subscribed by ladies' aid society. M. S. ACKLES.

Dedication at Toledo, Ohio.

Until within a few years our people only had one church in the great city of Toledo, O. Now we have four. On last Lord's day it was our joy to dedicate the beautiful house on the east side. We have never had readier responses to our call for money than on this occasion. All the services were inspiring and joyful. Bro. W. G. Walters is the pastor of the church. His heart and soul are in the work and he rejoices in a very large measure of genuine success. The church is in a part of the city where they have a field almost uncultivated by others, and where there is a splendid opportunity to do great work for the Master. It is always a great joy to go back to our native Ohio and meet brethren there.

When You Are All Bound Up and are suffering from indigestion, lack of appetite, foul breath, headache, dyspepsia, catarrh of the stomach, kidney and liver complaints you need a tonic laxative, something that will move the bowels quickly, easily and without leaving hurtful effects behind. Never use a purgative or cathartic. They weaken the bowels and system and make the disease worse. Use instead Vernal Saw Palmetto Berry Wine. It tones, builds up, gives new strength and vigor, not alone to the bowels, but to the whole being. Only one small dose a day will cure any case, from the lightest to the worst. That means cure, not simply relief only. Most obstinate cases yield gently and easily and the cure is permanent. Vernal Saw Palmetto Berry Wine is not a patent medicine. A list of ingredients is in every package with explanation of their action. Write us for a free sample bottle. Vernal Remedy Co., 19 Seneca Building, Buffalo, N. Y.

Orange County, California.

Orange County, California, has a population of 20,130. I presume that in no other county of the state is the population increasing more rapidly than in this.

Santa Ana, with a population of six or seven thousand, is the county seat. Santa Ana has one of the handsomest courthouses in the state. Orange county is one of the richest counties in the state in natural advantages and product. It may be cut off from all the rest of the world, and with the exception of clothing it would be almost self sustaining. Its chief products are oranges, lemons, walnuts, apricots loquats, berries of all kinds, potatoes, barley, wheat, oats, corn, hay, and all kinds of vegetables. We have three churches in the county.

Anheim has a membership of about 125, with a Sunday-school of about 100. A good building and some very earnest members. Bro. Geo. C. Ritchie has accepted a call to this church, and will begin work there in September.

Orange, where Bro. J. P. Ralston ministers, has a membership of about 140, with a Sunday-school of about 125. We have some very delightful people in Orange. Many new people are moving into that vicinity, and we hope ere long to have a very strong church there. The writer of this held a very enjoyable meeting with the Orange people last spring.

Santa Ana has about 200 members, with a Sunday-school of about 275, a fine Endeavor society, a live C. W. B. M., and a very excellent class of members. Santa Ana needs a new church in a new location. It is the peer of any church in the city, and could be the superior of the most of them if it had a proper building.

There are about a dozen members at Placentia, where lives the combined fruit-grower, preacher, and all-round business man, Bro. C. C. Chapman. Brother Chapman is recognized as the leading orange man in this county, if not in the state. He preaches in a large schoolhouse to a union church once a month. He is a genial Christian gentleman, whom it is a delight to know.

Bro. Eugene Burr, who recently resigned at Anheim, has accepted a call to the East Side, Los Angeles. F. N. CALVIN.

"Our Own Missionary."

About twenty churches have decided to become "Our Own Missionary" churches this year—that is, they are to be living link churches for home missions—but we want to call them "Our Own Missionary Churches" to distinguish them from the living link churches of our foreign society.

Three hundred dollars a year will make a church an "Our Own Missionary Church." For that sum we will select a mission field and a missionary, together with the supporting church, and that missionary will work in that field a whole year for the $300 of missionary help. He will be the missionary of the supporting church, will report to that church, will keep the supporting church in touch with the field, and will preach the gospel, plant the cause, baptize people into Christ and in every way build up the kingdom of our Lord as missionary of that church.

What an inspiration to have our own home missionary.

Below we print a letter, showing that not only churches, but individuals can have their own home missionary. Read this letter:

S. M. COOPER,
UNION TRUST BUILDING,
N. W. COR. FOURTH & WALNUT STS.,
CINCINNATI.

CINCINNATI, OHIO. May 15th, 1903.

Mr. B. L. Smith,
Cor. Sec. A. C. M. S., City.

My dear Bro. Smith:—

The success of your work increases our interest in it. Considering the small amount of money at your command, the good work accomplished under the direction of the American Christian Missionary Society is truly marvelous. Every disciple acquainted with the recent history of the Society has rejoiced in the constant increase of its funds from year to year and above all in the proportionate enlargement of the Kingdom of God.

Your efforts to secure "Living Link Churches"—churches contributing three hundred dollars, thus supporting a missionary in the field -- have suggested to me the idea of "Living Link Brethren".

I am confident that one hundred disciples can be found each of whom will contribute twenty-five dollars a month for the Year 1904 to preach the Gospel in America, thus adding $30,000 to our treasury. This would give a wonderful impetus to the work, inspiring individuals and churches to greater liberality and telling mightily in the great work of evangelizing our beloved land.

The success crowning every effort you have made warrants me in believing that you will be able to secure the number designated above thus to identify themselves with the work you are leading.

I count it a great privilege to make Mrs. Cooper a "Living Link Sister" and authorize you to draw on me for twenty-five dollars a month during the Year 1904.

Yours very truly,

S. M. Cooper

This shows the wonderful growth of home missions in the increased confidence and estimation in which our home mission work is being held. We are hoping and praying for a hundred brethren and sisters to join this honor band and support their own missionary.

S. M. Cooper is chairman of the acting board of managers of the American Christian Missionary Society; he is chairman of the financial committee; he gives his time freely to the society; he receives no compensation for his services, and knowing all about the work, he shows his confidence in it by being the first to support his own missionary in the home field. Who will join in this splendid work?

A Free Kidney Remedy.

DR. D. A. WILLIAMS, East Hampton, Conn., says if any sufferer from Kidney and Bladder Disease will send him their address, he will mail them free of all cost, some of the remedy they are looking for—The One that will cure them.

Now in India.

For a long time my soul has felt the need of this prayer, "Lord help me to see little things little, and great things great;" for it seems to me that must settle many life questions. As rapidly as his church learns her great work, so rapidly will she cease to strain at gnats and waste her precious strength in petty discussions. When I see every day and almost every hour, men who know not the fundamentals of right living, who have never had a single joy greater than the poorest physical happiness, if they have had so much as that, to whom all the books of every language are sealed, whose whole vision of life is horribly distorted, my heart cries out for a more even distribution of learning and knowledge as it never did for a more even distribution of property. To us there has opened a comparatively easy pathway to such a world conquest as never entered into the plans of worldly king or soldier, but such a conquest as Jesus himself commanded, and as his saints only have dreamed.

How we pray for such pioneers as endured hardship and sickness, and separation from vistas of life eternal.

But oh, we need more workers. Now some of our stations are pitifully under manned and great opportunities are opening to us beyond from which we can only sadly turn our eyes.

Physicians, if you love your profession as a profession and not as a money-making process, here is your field, your needs are supplied and you can give your service to relieve so many poor child-people who have been tortured almost to death, and whose hearts will be opened to hear of that remedy all so sadly need, the remedy for sin. Here are interesting cases from whatever point of view you may take. How I have longed to be the master of your skill!

Ministers, here are the millions who need your ministry, who can test every resource of mind and heart, natural or acquired, which you may possess. "Keen and kindly" are two words which go well together in your makeup.

Teachers, here you may train teachers who shall go out to the great majority who can neither read nor write, whose ancestors perhaps never possessed a book, though they possessed gold earrings and noserings by the dozen. You can open to them the literature of the world, and can think that it is your work, that if you were not doing it the work would remain undone.

Young men and women we beg of you to "go west" so far, so very far, that it shall be the far east; and oh, we need you now!

A Word of Praise.

I have read with great satisfaction "A Modern Plea for Ancient Truths," by your editor. The sweet spirit in which he presents the propriety and necessity of twentieth century Christians of every name and creed to unite upon the conviction that Jesus is the Christ, the son of the living God, to obey, serve and follow him, discarding all human names, tenets, traditions and customs, reminds me of John, the beloved apostle, while the invincible logic and soul searching persuasiveness are worthy of Paul the last and greatest of all the apostles. I have not been content with reading it, but have passed it on for others to enjoy and be persuaded.

C. W. B. M. in Missouri.

Our sisters are slow to respond to the request of our president, Mrs. M. M. Goode, to send in suggestive mottos and rally cries for our marching orders, next missionary year. One comes from far off South Carolina. Our Sister Fenster Macher (we still claim her. She is only lent to South Carolina for a season), late of Lexington, sends her suggestion, which we gladly place on file. She writes courageously and hopefully of the work in Charleston, and, while full of joy in its promise, and her privilege of a part in it, her heart often turns to her home state and those with its borders near and dear to her.

A special appeal for the Burgess Memorial Mission is being sent to a few Disciples, who are not members of local auxiliaries, and only to those whose known generosity and devotion to the Master cause us to believe they will consider it a privilege to have an opportunity given them to "help those women" who labor so faithfully to establish a church of Christ in the great city of Calcutta.

What preparation are you making for the state convention to be held at Columbia in September? Every auxiliary should send a delegate, and as many representatives as possible. The prayers of every member are asked that this year may see our aims realized, that we may be strengthened and guided as we've never been before. District and county conventions are now in full swing. So is the hot weather. It needs a little more determination and a little less catering to self than usual, to make these conventions fulfill their purpose. Do not, in excusing yourself for not going to them, say "I shall not be missed." You will be missed. If each one should say that, where would the convention be. Go, and with the full determination to appropriate to yourself all the good there shall be in it. It is yours.

Commencement at a Big College.

The commencement exercises at the Dixon College will begin August 5, and continue to Aug. 14. There will be over 300 graduates. Friends of the institution and old students are cordially invited. The prospect for the next school year at the Dixon College is very propitious and will without doubt be one of the best the institution has ever had. The institution is now closing one of the most prosperous years of its history. The advantages of this institution and the moderate rates make it advisable for those going away to school to investigate. Catalogues will be sent free. Address J. B. Dille, Station A. N., Dixon, Ill.

From "Henceforth."

I was glad for your word, "henceforth," in "Easy Chair," June 25, but I wish you had set the word "from" just in ahead of it: "from henceforth." That makes dying, as we commonly term it, an act; an act of passage. A covered bridge through which we pass from light here to greater light beyond. In the exquisitely beautiful language of the Psalmist, a walk through "the valley of the shadows." As one walks through a shadowed aisle of woodland. As dear old Paul has it, the moment of absence here, the moment of presence there: face to face with Christ, in the "place prepared." The chief beauty of the season in Alaska is the duration of the light, and it illustrates my thought. Up there, the sky is brilliant all the time. The distance between the points, in summer, where the sun sets and where it rises, is so slight that the last tints of evening merge into the glow of the aurora. So in the going of these loved ones in Christ. No pause; no break in the consciousness. And do you notice that the pope, who is lying on his death bed, within three miles of Tre Fontaine, where Paul met the executioner, has this thought of his going; note that he expresses it. Without intending it, he, the head of the Catholic church, deals a hard blow to the maintained doctrine of purgatory. No purgatory for him. No millions of millenniums of unconsciousness, in some intermediate state for him. He says, "I am going to my heavenly Father: I have no fear." "From henceforth." can mean but one thing; that the heavenly joys in the presence of Christ, date from the moment the dying body emancipates the spirit. C. B. CARLISLE.

A New House for Hot Springs.

The Hall and Updike meeting has fully convinced us that we are and have been making a mistake in trying to build up in our present location. There were large audiences in the down town meetings, small ones at the church. There were 64 additions, 34 of whom go to the brotherhood at large. Men and women from nearly every state in the union heard our plea for the first time. With all the facts and conditions before us, we have decided that in order to build up the cause here, and serve the brotherhood at large, and push the work of the building of the Christian Home, we must build down town where the people are.

We have organized our building committee and are now raising funds, and we hope that the various missionary organizations and the brethren will come to our help. Without your help we can do but little.

The importance of this point may be gathered from what the denominations are doing here. One year ago there was no Presbyterian (Cumberland) church here. Their missionary society has entered the field, set $500 a year aside toward supporting a minister, made an appropriation of $15,000 for a building. The organization has in less than a year, 60 members, has, with this help, purchased the lot we tried to buy and had to surrender for want of encouragement, paying $7,000 for it and are building upon it. We have had a little "collar box" here, on the outskirts of the city, fifteen years, which have been fifteen years of struggle and trial, yet we have, after all, only 135 members. I have been here five years: 100 have been the net gain in that time, there being only 35 when I took charge. Brethren, why can our people not see as far as the denominations? The Baptists have had a church here for many years, and have a membership of some 300, and many people of wealth, yet their association, realizing the importance of this place, has come to the support of the brethren, and a $21,000 lot has been purchased, and an $80,000 "institutional church" is to be built. But we stand still. I am not dreaming. This is a great mission field, and the brotherhood must come to our help in erecting this new house.

M. L. BUCKLEY.

Harrison, O., July 22, 1903.

ARKANSAS.—Uniontown, July 24.—Our two weeks' meeting closed last Monday. Bro. E. C. Browning, of Little Rock, Ark., did the preaching. Attention good. Harmony prevails. Additions, 10: nine confessions, one from the Baptists. Brother Browning, as corresponding secretary of our state board, is doing a great work in Arkansas.—COMSTOCK BROTHERS.

Newport, July 20.—One baptism and one by statement at Beebe. The work at Bald Knob is very hopeful.

Fayetteville, July 22.—Five additions to the First Church on Sunday: one restored, two by letter and two conversions.

Pine Bluff, July 23.—Five added here at regular services since I reported.

Blackton, July 24.—I have just commenced a promising meeting. House overflows at each service. One addition last night. I will be glad to correspond with any one who needs a meeting after September. My time is all taken until then.—E. W. SEWALL.

COLORADO.—Trinidad, July 20.—Two additions Sunday, July 19, fourteen the Sunday before, and two the Sunday before that, making a total of seventy four in the present pastorate of twenty months. Present membership 172.—DAVID C. PETERS.

ILLINOIS.—Watseka.—Received a lady into the fellowship of this congregation last Lord's day. Two estimable people having requested baptism at my hands. I will comply with pleasure.—B. S. FERRALL.

Lanark, July 22.—The Lord's work here starts off nicely. One confession and baptism recently. Have brought about a united effort with the other churches of our town for regular quarterly temperance meetings.—B. L. WRAY.

Chicago, July 23.—We had seven added last Sunday, and have additions every week, having missed only four weeks in a year and a half.—CHAS. REIGN SCOVILLE.

Cisne, July 27.—The work here is prospering. The church was filled at both services yesterday in spite of the heat. A splendid interest prevails in the midweek prayer-meeting, and the young people's meetings are largely attended. The Sunday-school has reached 110, and we have had no rally.—OTHA WILKISON.

INDIANA.—Elwood.—Work moves along nicely here. Summer audiences are large; frequent additions. A young preacher came into the church last Sunday.—L. C. HOWE.

Loogootee, July 20.—We had a fine day yesterday: good audiences at all services, music inspiring. Had one confession. We are having additions at our regular services. The work is hard here, but hopeful and refreshing and deepening in spiritual life. All departments building up.—C. A. DONNELSON.

Knightstown, July 27.—Two more additions yesterday at regular services. We leave for Bethany Park to-day.—ALLEN T. SHAW, pastor.

IOWA.—Mason City, July 14.—We have had six additions in the past few weeks—additions for four consecutive Lord's days. The work generally is prospering.—RALPH C. SARGENT.

Adel, July 26.—Can report some progress here. Fourteen since June 1: seven baptisms. Adel has many fine people.—H. JAS. CROCKETT.

KANSAS.—McPherson, July 21.—Have had two additions in the last two weeks, one here and one at Moundridge. Audiences are large for such warm weather. We have union services here on Sunday evenings, so I visit Moundridge every two weeks and preach on Sunday evenings.—W. T. ADAMS.

Wichita, July 20.—Three additions to the South Lawrence Avenue Church yesterday: one by baptism and two by statement.—W. T. McLAIN.

Pleasant Grove, July 20.—At Pleasant Grove, where I work one-half time, there was one baptized on June 7, two were reclaimed June 21, two were baptized July 5, and one reclaimed July 19. I begin a meeting at Potter, Kan., July 27, at Pleasant Grove, Aug. 16, and at Bethel, Mo., Sept. 29.—R. E. CALLITHAN, Dearborn, Mo.

Wichita, July 27.—One by baptism at the South Lawrence Avenue Church yesterday.—W. T. McLAIN.

Valley Falls, July 27.—Two baptisms at Meridan at my last appointment. Work moving along very well. We hope to have a meeting soon. Pray for us.—J. W. PAINE.

KENTUCKY.—Elmira, July 20.—I immersed two on Lord's day afternoon here: a lady (a leading Methodist) and a young man twenty-five years of age.—N. R. DALE. (New Albany, Ind.)

Petersburg, July 27.—A young lady whose father had for several months forbidden her to be baptized, finally decided to "obey God rather than men" and was buried with her Lord in baptism here yesterday. The writer expects to begin a meeting with the church at Tolesboro, Ky., Aug. 10.—MILO ATKINSON.

MISSOURI.—La Belle, July 21.—Two additions by letter last Sunday at morning service. One baptism at evening service.—J. H. JONES.

Springfield, July 21.—Our work prospers during the summer months. Twelve additions during the last six Lord's days.—D. W. MOORE.

Appleton City, July 24.—Good interest in our meeting at Center; two additions up to the present.—FRANK JULAGEAS.

Troy.—Seven additions since last report. Two baptisms Wednesday night: one from the Presbyterians, one by confession.—DRAYTON POWELL.

Butler, July 19.—Three added to-day: two by letter and one by confession.—E. H. WILLIAMSON.

Huntsville, July 20.—Two additions yesterday.—W. H. KERN.

Rolla, July 22.—Rolla meeting closed with 20 accessions: 10 baptisms and 10 by letter. Meeting in many respects a success.—JOSEPH GAYLOR.

St. Louis, July 27.—One addition by letter at Carondelet yesterday, and two by letter at Hammett Place. There were two baptisms at the latter place in the evening.

Weaubleau, July 27.—We had one added here Saturday by primary obedience. An old man suffering with consumption sent for me to come and read, sing and pray with him; also demanded me to baptize him, which I did, and Sunday we brought him to church and gave him the hand of fellowship and the Lord's Supper. Also had one added last week at Humansville from the Baptists. They are in need of a preacher there.—S. E. HENDRICKSON.

Wellsville, July 27.—At recent prayer-meeting received one by statement and one by baptism. At Bellflower Sunday, the 19th, gave the right hand of fellowship to two (husband and wife), whom I baptized shortly before. At the evening service so crowded was the church that people were unable to secure seats, though the platform was fully utilized and many listened outside.—G. F. ASSITER.

New Haven, July 27.—Two added at Union at my last appointment there, by confession and baptism. The ladies' sewing society gave an "apron bazaar" recently and cleared about $35, to be applied on church debt.—A. B. JETT, pastor.

MONTANA.—Livingston, July 21.—Twenty-four accessions yesterday. I will be here until Aug. 2.—J. V. COOMBS.

NEW YORK.—Gloversville, July 20.—Our special meeting, conducted by Evangelist W. J. Wright, closed July 8. The direct results are 23 added to the church. Brother Wright's coming was a great help to us; his clear, constructive preaching proved to be just what we needed. The interest continues. Two confessions since meeting closed.—JOS. KEVIL.

OHIO.—Findlay, July 20.—The Central Church of Christ here, under the pastoral care of M. L. Pierce, of Kimberly Heights, Tenn., is doing well. Last Sunday there were two additions by statement and two confessions. Brother Pierce has been here seven weeks, and nine have been added since he came. He is now raising money to buy a lot, and a house will be built.—B. F. BOLTON.

Harrison, July 22.—Three additions since last report: one by letter, one from the Methodists and one reformed.—M. L. BUCKLEY.

OKLAHOMA.—Kingfisher, July 20.—Two of our leading merchants made the good confession yesterday and were baptized the same hour of the day in John's Creek.—ISOM ROBERTS.

OREGON.—Corvallis, July 15.—Bro. Allen Wilson and A. R. Davis were with us 16 days. It has been a great meeting for Corvallis. There were 74 came forward during the meeting. We have been strengthened both in numbers and influence. We regret that Brother Wilson was compelled to leave. We VIRGINIA.—Martinsville, July 22.—Some months ago, C. E. Elmore conducted a meeting at Shera, which resulted in an organization, several Baptists coming into the organization. I visited them and preached a week. Ten Baptists and two Methodists united, and four made the confession. This is the kind of federation I believe in. The outlook is good. This is destined to become one of our best churches. Many more Baptists will unite.—W. H. BOOK.

WASHINGTON.—Tekoa, July 20.—Closed a short meeting at Tekoa, with 27 additions.—FRANK THOMPSON, Pine Bluff, Ark.

there and in favor of the "course pursued," and at his earnest request Mr. Campbell did not "oppose the motion," so that it passed unanimously. William Baxter, in his "Life of Elder Walter Scott" (page 217), says: "The action taken at Austintown may be regarded as the formal separation from the Baptists. Up to this time the association was a Baptist body, and the members of it Baptists, although many of their peculiarities had been abandoned in consequence of a better understanding of the scriptures. Those Baptists who had embraced the new views, together with the new converts made, were called Campbellites, and by many Scottites; but after the dissolution of the association, which was really brought about by the efforts of Scott, they were called Disciples. The wisdom of the course pursued in this has been questioned by some since then, who thought, no doubt, that it would have been better to have remained with the Baptists and leavened that body with their views; but Scott ever regarded it as the wisest course, and assumed whatever responsibility there might be in the matter, claiming that it was at his instance that John Henry introduced the motion, and that his own personal appeal to Alexander Campbell prevented him from using his influence in opposition to the action, which really made those who had accepted the primitive gospel a new and distinct people."

I quote another paragraph from Baxter bearing on this action at Austintown. "This was one of the marked eras in Elder Scott's career. His first step was to fix upon the divinity of Christ as the central and controlling thought of the New Testament, and which he afterwards demonstrated and illustrated with a strength and facility that has never been surpassed.

"Next, he arranged the elements of the gospel in the simple and natural order of faith, repentance, baptism, remission of sins and gift of the Holy Spirit; then made baptism the practical acceptance of the gospel on the part of the penitent believer, as well as the pledge or assurance of pardon on the part of its author; and in the course pursued at the last meeting of the association at Austintown freed the Disciples from the last vestige of human authority, and placed them under Christ, with his word for their guide."

Many other interesting events have transpired in Austintown, but what I have written must suffice for this time. Its seventy-fifth anniversary was in every way pleasant and to me a delightful occasion.

WING ORGANS

We make the Wing Organs and sell them ourselves. They go direct from Factory to Home.

We do not employ agents or salesmen. When you buy a Wing Organ, you pay the actual cost of making it and our small wholesale profit. This profit that we charge is very small because of the large number of organs we sell. A single agent or dealer sells very few organs in a year and has to charge a large profit.

You save from $50. to $150.

by buying an organ direct from the factory.

Sent on Trial. We Pay Freight. No Money in Advance.

We will send a Wing Organ to any part of the United States on trial. We pay all freight charges in advance. We deliver the organ to your railroad depot free of expense to you. We do not ask for any advance payment or deposit. You can try the organ right in your home for 20 days, and if not satisfactory to you we will take it back entirely at our expense. You pay us nothing unless you keep the organ. There is absolutely no risk or expense to you.

EASY MONTHLY PAYMENTS. Thirty-four years' experience enables us to guarantee every Wing Organ for twelve years against any defect in tone, action, workmanship, or material. Wing Organs need absolutely no tuning. They have a sweet tone, easy action, very handsome case.

CATALOGUE.—A beautiful catalogue of Wing Organs containing handsome half-tone pictures will be sent free if you write.

Places Where Federation Might be Useful.

The little town of Sharon, Kan., has one church—the Christian. It is all that is necessary to meet the religious needs of the people, and is very liberal in its offers to co-operate with all Christians, whether they wish to take membership with it or not. There are a few—very few—Free Methodists, who think that the cause of the truth necessitates another building. They seem to be sincere in their convictions of duty. The result will probably be that Christianity will be weakened instead of strengthened in that community.

Not far away is the little town of Hazelton, which has two fairly well supported churches—Presbyterian and Methodist. There are a few—very few—Disciples of Christ who think and honestly believe that the cause of Christ demands an additional church. They are as sincere as are the Free Methodists over at Sharon, and if they can succeed in building a house, the result will be a dividing and weakening of the aggregate religious forces in that community.

It occurs to me that the few Free Methodists at Sharon and the few Disciples at Hazelton have a higher duty to perform relative to the unity of God's people than they have relative to their respective pleas for doctrinal soundness in conversion, baptism, etc. And there are hundreds of localities where the situation is similar to that in the towns mentioned.

Some Needs.

Every church needs a business head as well as a spiritual guide. Without either, the church is dead. Righteous living without righteous leaders is as impossible as business leaders without practical knowledge.

It is not a hard thing to persuade men, women and children to "join the church," but it is real hard to educate and teach them their moral, physical and spiritual worth as members of the church of the living God. To embody the thoughts of Christ, to live them out in our daily lives, to possess that fraternal spirit that existed in the First Christian Church among preachers and members, is hard to find in the twentieth century churches.

Missionary enterprises and other necessary Christian duties have kept many preachers and church members in close touch with the new commandment; but we need a unity among ourselves. We need a better system. Better business methods. More economy. More contribution from each church member. More faith in God and in our common Redeemer, and more love for our weaker and helpless brethren. Unlimited mercy toward the sinner in and out of the church.

Moreover, we need better protection for our men in the ministry. Men who have large salaries can easily lay by in store. But there are others, less fortunate and less skillful. Any man is to be pitied that has to depend upon the church for help. The system of providing for our disabled and worn-out preachers and evangelists is in its infancy, and with many people as unpopular as my good intention of converting Germany to Christ. Yet I believe I can do that more easily, if it is the Lord's will, in a few years from now, than we are able to provide for our godly heroes.

Too many people think more of the Chinaman, the Hindu, the Ethiopian, the Mongolian and others, than of those poor neglected heathens at their own door. The cry for the protection of the missionary should be as great as the cry for the support of the missions. May the time be not far distant when preachers and churches will co-operate with that love that bound the twelve apostles together. For the Christ-like method alone can win. May God hasten the day when all of God's people shall be "one."

Church Federation in Actual Operation.

The inclosed clipping from the Des Moines Leader and Register is a point in fact relative to church federation. I understand a much larger number was received than given in clipping. Question: "Will some of our pastors who still hold in question the propriety of entering into union meetings with the sects, and federating with them, tell us whether it would be possible for any one congregation, working independently of all others, to accomplish such a work as is recorded above?"

When the Lord's hosts are found working together for the accomplishment of the same things, we will find many of our points of differences falling away. D. A. WICKIZER.

Centerville, Ia., July 7. (Special).—Stirred up against the boot legging element and the whisky selling drug stores by the recent meetings conducted by Billy Sunday, the people of Centerville have organized a law and order league in which many who have heretofore been prominent saloon advocates are now active workers. The entire police force has joined the league, and what makes it remarkable is the fact that the mayor, by whom they were appointed, was elected on what was called the saloon ticket. His force all fell under the spell of Billy Sunday's preaching and have joined the churches and are taking a prominent part in the law and order movement. The Sunday meetings have made a wonderful change in Centerville. Last Sunday the churches would not hold the people. The Baptists had to lay seats on the lawn. The Methodists received 150 new members, the Baptists 127, the Christians 74 and the Presbyterians 75, and 200 more will join the churches. The Baptist minister immersed 85 Sunday. One country church near Centerville received 40 new members Sunday, and every church in the county has received additions. The total of conversions was 871.

"Church Arbitration."

The Disciples of Christ profess to love "the truth" and, as learners, to search for it honestly and are pledged by their position and proclamation to accept it when they find it. They cannot tolerate any departure from this spirit of honest research without self-stultification.

Differences will arise in the course of biblical investigation in the increasing light of modern study and discovery. A man who shrinks from a critical examination of fundamental questions for that reason has not come to the full stature of a free man in Christ. Courteous and dignified discussion of disputed questions helps to clear the view and discover the truth.

Angry quarrels and hateful strifes are always unseemly and never more so than when arising from religious disputation. Their publicity scandalizes the cause of Christ. An editor should endeavor "to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace." To assume the prerogatives of the churches and make himself a self-constituted judge or advocate is to become a disturber of the peace. He is not the arbiter of human destiny nor the settler of differences among brethren.

When disputes and misunderstandings arise that disturb the harmony of the churches they can only be determined by wise men chosen by the churches themselves to consider the matter and decide the issues as it seems good to them and to the Holy Spirit, as he has revealed in the inspired scriptures. A study of the New Testament will show that this is the tribunal of church arbitration, whose findings delivered to the churches by men, "chief among the brethren" and appointed for the purpose, all are bound to "keep" and so maintain peace.

This is sufficient, without the doubtful method of state or national committee appointed by conventions assembled for another purpose. Such a committee could do no more than exercise powers that belong to the

Kola Plant CURES HAY-FEVER AND ASTHMA.

Free. The African Kola Plant is Nature's Positive Cure for Hay-fever and Asthma. Since its recent discovery this remarkable botanical product has come into universal use in the Hospitals of Europe and America as an unfailing specific cure for Hay-Fever and Asthma in every form. Its cures are really marvelous.

Dr. J. R. Duncan, the oldest physician of Crawfordsville, Ind., writes Jan. 29th, I feel it my duty to tell all I can of the great virtue of Himalya. Dr. W. H. Vail, a prominent physician of St. Louis, Mo., writes March 8th, that he used Himalya on six different Hay-fever patients last fall with satisfactory results in every case. Mr. Frederick E. Wyatt, the noted Evangelist of Abilene, Texas, writes Jan. 31st, that Himalya permanently cured him of Hay-Fever and Asthma and strongly recommends it to sufferers. Mrs. M. A. Scott, Crosby, Mich., writes March 6th, that Himalya completely cured her after fifteen years persistent suffering of Hay-fever and Asthma. Mr. Alfred C. Lewis, editor of the Farmers' Magazine, Washington, D. C., was also cured, although he could not be down for fear of choking, being always worse in Hay-fever season. Rev. J. L. Coombs, of Martinsburg, W. Va., wrote to the New York World, July 23d, that Himalya cured him of Asthma of thirty years' standing.

Hundreds of others send similar testimony proving Himalya a truly wonderful remedy. As the Kola Plant is a specific constitutional cure for the disease, Hay-fever sufferers should use it before the season of the attacks when practical, to give it time to act on the system. To prove the power of this new botanical discovery, if you suffer from Hay-fever or Asthma, we will send you one trial case by mail entirely free. It costs you absolutely nothing. Write to-day to The Kola Importing Co., No. 1166 Broadway, New York.

churches which they can use better themselves on proper occasion. The writer firmly believes that close adherence to New Testament teaching will meet all emergencies by a recognized court or jury system, when needed in extreme and important cases. Trial by newspapers with an editor as presiding judge, leads to wider dissensions and religious anarchy.

"Which is Harder?"

In the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST I read a piece from the Universalist Leader, "Which is Harder?" If we have the true spirit of Christ and are his true followers, we can do his commandments and love our enemies and do good to them that spitefully treat us. God is always willing and ready to help us, if we come to him in faith, trusting and believing in him, to help us and bring us out conquerors through him that loved us and gave himself for us. We may, by doing good to our enemies, win them for Christ. They have precious souls to save as well as we. And all these other questions the Leader speaks of we can do with the help of God and his holy spirit to guide us. God speed the day when the gospel will be more plainly preached and God's blessed word will be practiced as well as preached, and especially among the preachers, as they are examples for others. God help us all to study our Bibles more and more.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers, that they offer one Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

Publishers' Notes.

We can furnish a handsomely-bound copy of Cruden's Concordance, sent postpaid for $1.50.

Smith's Bible Dictionary is indispensable in the preacher's library. We can furnish this book in good binding at $1.50. This book contains more than one thousand pages.

Singing evangelists are hereby informed that we publish several different music books and will be glad to have them consider some of our song books when needing a new supply.

Our new Sunday-school paper, "The Round Table," is prepared to interest the boys and girls in the Sunday-school. In clubs the paper is sent an entire year for $.36 per copy. Sample copies are sent free.

"Married by me" is what the preacher says in a marriage certificate. We can furnish marriage certificates in different grades and will be glad to send illustrated circular on receipt of request. Write us.

We send all three of the following books by J. H. Garrison, prepaid for $2:

"Alone With God," "Heavenward Way," "Half Hour Studies at the Cross." Price for any one, $.75 postpaid.

"The Christian Worker," by J. H. Foy, is the book every minister should have. It is a manual for preachers containing forms and ceremonies for marriages, baptisms, ordinations, dedications, funerals and other public occasions.

The book contains 189 pages. Price, cloth binding, $.75.

If you are not prepared to answer the arguments of the Mormon elder send to us for a copy of "Mormonism Examined and Refuted," by D. H. Bays. The author has gained the information found in the book by association for a long period with prominent members of the Mormon faith. The book contains 450 pages, cloth binding, price $1.50.

The books composing the Bethany Reading Course should be read by the young people in our Endeavor societies, Sunday-schools and church members. The nine books were prepared by the following: B. B. Tyler, F. D. Power, J. W. McGarvey, H. L. Willett, A. McLean and W. J. Lhamon. Price of each book 35 cents. Write us for full description.

Life of Alexander Campbell, by T. W. Grafton, is a short biography of Mr. Campbell, which the busy man can spare time to read. This book contains the more important events in the life of Alexander Campbell. The present membership of our churches is not as well acquainted with the history of Alexander Campbell and his associates as they might be. If you desire to learn the early history of the reformation read "Life of Alexander Campbell," by T. W. Grafton. Price, postpaid, $1.

Don't you need one or more of the following books, all of which are late publications?

Opinions of the Christian-Evangelist.

To my mind your paper is the best among us in that it is up-to-date, liberal and unselfish. Count me your supporter from this on.

Hartford, O. I. R. LINES.

I enjoy the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST greatly. Its sweetness of spirit, breadth of vision and soundness of conviction make it an ideal religious journal. Long may it continue!

S. JNO. DUNCAN CLARK.
Throopsville, N. Y.

It is a constant source of wonder to me how you keep improving the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST when it always has seemed as near perfect as a religious journal could be. Aylesworth's articles on "Faith" are peerless, as are all his writings. Congratulations.

Carthage, O. CHAS. M. FILLMORE.

I have been a reader of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST since 1886 and have always been pleased with the kindly spirit it has shown. It has attained a literary and scholarly character which ranks it with the first of all religious periodicals. I see a great future for the EVANGELIST.

Des Moines, Ia. I. N. McCASH.

Permit me to say that the paper you put out is an ever-increasing source of delight and satisfaction. It comes as near the ideal religious journal in both matter and topography as we are apt to find in this part of the twentieth century. With Bros. Powers and Durbar associated with the already strong office force, the cream of religious journalism is provided. I congratulate you upon the splendid service you are rendering the brotherhood.

RALPH C. SARGENT.

Mason City, Ia.

I consider the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST as the best paper in our brotherhood to-day. The matter to be found is modern and stimulating; while true to the essentials of the faith, it assumes the true disciple attitude in willingness to receive light upon the unsolved problems. Such a paper is the great need of our people to-day. The spirit of charity and liberality pervading its pages is a delightful contrast to some other publications among us. I consider it a part of my religious privilege to assist in the circulation of such a Christian paper.

St. Louis, Mo. HOWARD T. CREE.

THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST more nearly satisfies my ideal of what a religious newspaper should be than any paper known to me. It is sweet and beautiful in spirit, but vigorous and strong in its advocacy of the principles of our movement. It is a leader and moulder of thought as a great religious paper should be. Its deliverances upon controverted questions are sane and wise, maintaining the equipoise of truth, and its reflection of the life of the church is true and faithful. May it be more than ever the one organ of the church which gives character, strength, momentum to a movement of which it is the best exponent.

Family Circle

In the Lane.

By Madison Cawein.

When the hornet hangs in the hollyhock,
And the brown bee drones i' the rose,
And the west is a red-streaked four-o'clock,
And summer is near its close—
It's—Oh, for the gate and the locust lane,
And dusk and the dew and home again!

When the katydid sings and the cricket cries,
And the ghosts of the mists ascend,
And the evening star is a lamp i' the skies,
And summer is near its end—
It's—Oh, for the fence and the leafy lane,
And the twilight peace and the tryst again!

When the owl hoots in the dogwood tree,
That leans to the rippling run,
And the wind is a wildwood melody,
And summer is almost done—
It's—Oh, for the bridge and the bramble lane,
And the fragrant hush and her hands again!

When fields smell moist with the dewy hay,
And woods are cool and wan,
And a path for dreams in the Milky Way,
And summer is nearly gone—
It's—Oh, for the rock and the woodland lane,
And the silence and stars and her lips again!

When the weight of the apples breaks down the limbs,
And the musk-melons split with sweet,
And the moon's white bloom through the heaven swims,
And summer has spent its heat—
It's—Oh, for the lane, for the trysting lane,
And the deep mooned night and her love again!

How Best to Get Acquainted With the Wild Wood Folk.

If I were asked what thing, above all others, one must know how to do in order to get acquainted with the wild wood folk, I should answer, Learn to stand still. One night last summer I got home rather late from a drive. I had left several cocks of hay spread out in the little meadow, and after supper, though it was already pretty damp, I took the fork, went down, and cocked it up. Returning, I climbed by a narrow path through some pines, and came out into my pasture. It was a bright moonlight night, and leaning back upon the short-handled fork, I stopped in the shadows of the pines to look out over the softly lighted field.

Off in the woods, a mile away, I heard the deep but mellow tones of two fox-hounds. Day and night all summer long I had heard them, and all summer long I had hurried, now here, now there, hoping for a glimpse of the fox. But he always heard me and turned aside. The sound of the dogs was really musical. They were now crossing an open stretch leading down to the meadow behind me. As I leaned listening, I heard a low, uneasy murmuring from a covey of quail sleeping in the brush beside the path, and before I had time to ask what it meant, a fox trotted up the path behind me, and stopped in the edge of the shadows directly at my feet.

I did not move a muscle. He sniffed at my dew-wet boots, backed away, and looked me over curiously. I could have touched him. Then he sat down, with just his silver-tipped brush in the silver moonlight, to study me in earnest.

The deep baying of the hounds was coming near. How often I had heard it, and how often exclaimed, "Poor little fox!" But here sat poor little fox, calmly wondering what kind of a stump he had run up against this time.

I could only dimly see his eyes, but his whole body said: "I can't make it out, for it doesn't move. But if it doesn't move I'm not afraid." Then he trotted to this side and to that for a better wind, half afraid, yet very curious.

But his time was up. The dogs were yelping across the meadow on his warm trail. Giving me a last unsatisfied look, he dropped down the path directly toward the hounds, and sprang lightly off into the brush.

The din of their own voices must have deafened the dogs, or they would have heard him. Round and round they circled, giving the fox ample time for the study of another "stump" before they discovered that he had doubled down the path, and still longer time before they got across the wide, scentless space of his side jump, and once more fastened upon his trail.

"Grandma Pays the Bill."

Before the busy merchant Stood pretty little Bess.
"I want some cloff for dollie,
Enough to make a dwess.

"What color, little lady?"
The pleasant dealer said.
"Why, don't you know?" she answered,
"I want it awful red."

He smiled and cut the fabric
For the delighted little miss.
"What does it cost?" she questioned.
He answered, "Just one kiss."

And then the clerks who heard her
Went roaring up and down.
"My dran'ma said she'd pay you Next time she comes to town."

"Pat," said a manager to one of his workmen, "you must be an early riser. I always find you at work the first thing in the morning." "Indade, and Oi'm, sor. It's a family trait, Oi'm thinking." "Then your father was an early riser, too?" "Me father, is it? He roises that early that if he went to bed a little later he'd meet himself getting ud in the mornin'."

Doc Stewart's Bees.

Doc Stewart's bees—they knew the town
As well as any boy of us.
They searched the gardens up and down:
They—bee-like—were industrious.
Their honey—O, the tang it had!—
As mellow as the richest wine
Which holds no dream that is not glad—
A soothing sweetness, fair and fine.

The old-time honey! Amber-hued
And syrupy—and how it clung
As though the bees in sleepy mood
Had loitered where the poppies swung!
And how its pungent perfume filled
The air, whenever it was spread,
As if some jocund elf had spilled
The glory of a flower bed!

Why, you could shut your eyes and taste
The wild red roses by the mill.
And mark the way the bees had traced
□ The clover blooms beyond the hill;
And there were hints of violets
And honeysuckles; lilacs, too,
Had paid their lavish honey-debts
And left their fragrance floating through.

The old-time honey! Who has sung
Of sweeter memories than this?
A rarer morsel on the tongue
Has never filled the heart with bliss.
It held the songs of summer days,
And whisperings of scented trees—
Down boyhood's unforgotten ways
There comes the croon of Stewart's bees.

The Result of an Idea.

By Jane L. Ferguson.

In the early spring a clever woman in a northern suburban town sat at her window surveying her back premises. She had always lived in a small town and had been dependent on her own garden. The present prospect was not encouraging.

This suburb had been formerly a park. Every house had an unfenced front yard of grass, and a back yard enclosed either with a hedge or chicken wire. The park-like effect was strictly adhered to, and the residents were proud of their suburb.

The clever woman's back yard was enclosed with wire, and the grass grew almost to the fence. The tiny space suggested an idea. Why not have a garden in that space, down the two sides and across? She acted on the suggestion and with her husband's aid soon had her beds ready.

The sod was taken up three feet from the fence and the ground prepared for the seed. Nasturtiums were planted on the part of the fence nearest the street, beans and squash were put on the opposite side. At the lowest section she put as many healthy tomato plants as were prudent. Cucumber seed was planted in sunken half barrels. When the vines ran out over the grass the effect was very pretty. In the remaining space the small annuals were planted, and there was room enough yet for lettuce, and parsley.

In June the prospect from the clever woman's back window was very pleasing. The fence was covered with healthy vines, through which peeped her saucy nasturtiums. The brilliant poppies had for a background the green leaves of the bean and squash vines. The view from the street was quite artistic.

The fall came, and this clever woman had saved and at the same time had provided herself with fresh, crisp vegetables, and her home and friends with flowers.—The Chauauquan.

A rich man who has joined the multitude in New York since his quick fortune came to him, was entertaining friends at dinner the other night. The service was magnificent, and so was the dinner. The wife, gorgeously clad, reigned over the table. During a lull in conversation the rich man watched a servant who was dexterously removing crumbs from the table. Then he looked down the glistening table at his jeweled wife and remarked: "Sadie, remember when you used to shake the tablecloth out of the back door to the hens?"—New York Sun.

At a Maine educational convention Dr. Nathaniel Butler was down for an address. As he was about to speak, Hon. W. W. Stetson, state superintendent of schools, said to him, "Doctor, is your address like a cat's tail?" "How is that?" asked Dr. Butler. "Why, fur to the end," replied Mr. Stetson. Dr. Butler smiled appreciatively, but kept silence. He opened his address by saying: "Your superintendent just asked me if my address was to be like a cat's tail—fur to the end. I assure him that it is like a dog's tail—bound to occur."

The Difference.

When Robert J. Burdette, America's genial humorist, said that in traveling from one end of the country to the other all the year round he discovered or heard very few new stories that were good or good stories that were new, he added that he had only recently come across one that had interested him very much. Some one had asked the late Thomas B. Reed if it were possible for him to describe in one sentence the difference between President Roosevelt and Ex-President Grover Cleveland. Mr. Reed replied: "Cleveland is too lazy to hunt, and Roosevelt is too nervous to fish."

The Little Diplomat.

Alice, who was five years old, was often asked to run errands for her mother. She went very willingly, if she could pronounce the name of the article, but she dreaded the laughter which greeted her attempts to pronounce certain words. "Vinegar" was one of the hardest for her. She never would go for it if she could help it, but one morning her mother found it necessary to send her.

On entering the store she handed the jug to the clerk and said:

"Smell the jug and give me a quart."

With the Children

By J. Breckenridge Ellis

Nettie Garmer, Kansas City, Kan., and Mrs. Ed. Mark, Lexington, Mo.: "We desire to join the Advance Society, and wish to enroll at once. We will begin our reading course Monday, July 20." (We are proud of the new names that continue to pour into the Av. S. Now that there are 3,000 members, it is a pleasure to look back and remember the days when the success of the society was doubtful. When I first thought of it, I knew there was one drawback that would make it unpopular with a great many people. The Advance Society is for one's improvement and most people do not want to improve themselves; they want to have a good time. I could have thought of some rules that lots of children would have enjoyed. When I said 5 pages of history and 30 lines of poetry every week, I knew I was excluding many who dislike the best kind of literature, and won't take the trouble to cultivate a taste for it. And yet I felt if I could get a small number to read the best, it would pay better than to have crowds whose object was simply pastime. A person who joins the Av. S. and gets his name on the Honor List, has something in him. You would be surprised at the number who join and do nothing else! They haven't the steadfastness that overcomes difficulties. What the world needs in boys and girls is steadfastness; and the reason so many men and women are nothing particular, is because they didn't acquire steadfastness when they were young. It isn't beginning a good work that does you good, it's keeping on. For instance, what could be easier than the requirements of the Av. S.? To read a verse of the Bible each day—who can't? And the other rules—how simple! It's because they are easy and maybe not always just what one wants to do, that causes hundreds to fail. The other day I was looking over the old roll of the Av. S. It was a pleasant afternoon, with shade on the back porch and a hen somewhere singing comfortably, and Felix purring in the sun, and the sweetpeas laughing up against the side of the fence because they hadn't been cut that morning. The Advance Society started November, 1898; 106 names reached me in the first month, and at the end of the second month I had 232. I sat there (on the porch—I had nothing else to do, I had already practiced my music lesson) looking at the old names. I knew hardly any of them! The fourth name was Florence Belle Beattie, Dover, Mo.; she stood by us a good while. I wonder what has become of her? She was eight years old; her birthday came on Dec. 25; I suppose it does yet. I came to the fifteenth name before I recognized an old friend, Gerald Dever, Hume, Ill. He has moved west, you remember, and thinks he hasn't time for the Av. S. The twenty-first name is Alvin Burleigh Cash, Pennville, Ind. He is still with us, and gets his name on the Honor List whenever he wants to. Hurrah for him! He was 10 years old then, and had a niece 6 years younger. He is our oldest member who has come and stuck. Twenty-eighth name, Elizabeth Valpey, Warm Springs, Calif. She was 10. I suppose she is too old now for such as us. I pass to the 74th name before finding another familiar; it is Mrs. Dever, who was not going to let her son outdo her. I come after her to a list of well-known names, but you don't know them, for with shame I must say they never reached the Honor List. The reason I know them is because they live here in Plattsburg; 94 is Madge Masters, Ozark, Ark.; she is a standby; 103 and 104 are Julia and Lola Cox—you all know them; 110 is Helen Ross, of Independence, Mo., who had an interesting letter in our very last paper; 229, Bertha Beesley, Moselle, Mo., who had the measles, concerning which the society was so much excited; 237 and 239, Florence and Olive Leavitt, Frankfort, S. D.; 243 and 244 are two sisters who have so faithfully represented Kentucky on our Honor List, Jean and Nannie D. Chambers; 253 is Nora Taylor, whom we know so well, of Mantion, Cal.; 256 is a well-known comrade, Harry Leland Cash, who was 8 in 1898. He was not going to let his brother get ahead of him. You have all read how he and Burleigh are now picking strawberries on the Columbia river; 333, Melvin Ledden, Osprey, Ill. He was only 7 when he joined, yet think how he has stood by us! Yet I have letters from boys and girls even older than 7, saying they will begin the Av. S. when they are old enough. I come to 355 before I reach another name I know, Dottie Standish, Meteetse, Wyo. She also was 7; 393 started in as if she meant business, but she got lost long ago, Donnie Swift, Billings, Mo. So there are all the names that grew familiar to us, out of the first 400. I might have gone on hunting up old friends if Felix had not insisted on rubbing against me, and his hair is coming out dreadfully, and I have all the hair I need now without borrowing.)

Here is our new Honor List: Clarence Per Lee, Grand Rapids, Mich. (2nd quarter); Carl Per Lee, Grand Rapids (2nd); M. J. O'Dell, Lebanon, Mo. (3rd); Helen Ross (4th); Melvin Ledden (10th); Ruth Sampsel, Warrensburg, Mo. (age 11, 4th quarter); Lucy Sampsel, Warrensburg (2nd); Uva Wall, Nebo, Ill.; Jennie Hollandsworth, Bismarck, Ill. (3rd); Edna Shriver, Nebo, Ill.; Ethel L. Harpole, Nebo, Ill.

Edna Shriver: "The Christian Church is going to paper the church. My father went off and got it for them. Our preacher, Brother Bolman, went home to-day; he lives in Roodhouse. I read 93 chapters in the Bible." (Remember, always name the history you read, and the name of the poetry, and the authors of the quotations, or I can't put you on the Honor List.)

James White, Rockland, Minn.: "I know 'Captain Cuttle,' he is in Dickens's 'Dombey and Son.' I like Carl Per Lee, because when you printed him on the Honor List for 7th quarter, he wrote that it was only his first. I guess there is one girl in Osprey, Ill., who likes beans more than I do! I wish Lizzie McLain or Mollie Turner would tell us about those Mammoth Springs. Maud Gorman, how do you plant peanuts? They won't grow here because the frost always get them. At

DEAFNESS CURED

By No Means Until "ACTINA" Was Discovered.

Ninety-five per cent of all cases of deafness brought to our attention is the result of chronic catarrh of the throat and middle ear. The inner ear cannot be reached by probing or spraying, hence the inability of aurists or physicians to cure. That there is a scientific cure for deafness and catarrh is demonstrated every day by the use of Actina. Actina also cures asthma, bronchitis, sore throat, weak lungs, colds and headache; all of which are directly or indirectly due to catarrh. Actina is sent on trial, postpaid. least they got mine the year I tried. I celebrated the 4th of July by shooting myself with a fire-cracker. I held it till it went off. Some of it didn't go off, though it went on! I think it most fun for fire-crackers to be held when they shoot. After this I will let other people hold them. There were five bands in town. Our home band let me beat on the drum. I can play the tenor drum pretty well. I marched at the head. There was a grand dinner in the grove. A boy threw a torpedo and hit my drum just when the music was soft and the drum oughtn't to play. They thought it was me beating one beat out of time, and I didn't like that, because the bandmaster looked around and frowned, and the boy nearly died laughing, because the music was so low and easy and that old torpedo sounded like a canon. But I know who the boy is, and if he's in town the next Fourth of July, I'll try to amuse him and myself at the same time. When other people are laughing, I like to laugh too, don't you?"

What We Stand For.

For the Christ of Galilee,
 For the truth which makes men free,
 For the bond of unity
 Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
 For the life which this world needs,
 For the church whose triumph speeds
 The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
 For the weak against the strong,
 For the poor who've waited long
 For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
 For the truth 'gainst superstition,
 For the hope whose glad fruition
 Our waiting eyes shall see.

Ivory Soap is one of the comforts a traveler can carry with him. It will save him much discomfort and annoyance. It is a source of great satisfaction to have a pure soap always ready at hand when it is needed. Ivory Soap is a quick cleanser.

Current Events

Cardinal Guiseppi Sarto, patriarch of Venice, was elected Bishop of Rome and Pope of the Roman Catholic church on the seventh ballot, and immediately took the name of Pius X. The new pope is sixty-eight years old, which was exactly the age of Leo XIII at the time of his election. Unlike Leo, who was so feeble when elected that he was not expected to live long, Pius X is in vigorous health and appears younger than he really is. In appearance he greatly resembles the late Phillips Brooks. His countenance is frank and open, without a suggestion of the Italian subtlety which has characterized most of his predecessors. He was born at Riese, in northern Italy, and reached the age of forty without rising above the rank of parish priest. Since then his advancement has been rapid. Whether from indifference or from prudence, he has kept aloof from politics. He is on good terms with the Italian government, and never shows a disposition to harbor resentment against the state on account of the absorption of the states of the church into the united kingdom of Italy. According to all accounts, Sarto was one of the least aggressive of the cardinals in pressing his claim to the papacy. It is said that he bought a round trip ticket from Venice when he came to Rome to attend the conclave, but the return coupon will probably go unused. It certainly will if he follows the precedent of the last two popes in confining himself within the Vatican. It would, however, be an excellent opportunity to establish a new custom. There is no real limitation placed upon the pope's movements. He can go where he pleases, and with the pomp and circumstance of visiting royalty if he pleases. Of course the pope can invest himself with a certain atmosphere of mystery and awe by withdrawing from the world and professing to be a prisoner. But thinking people, even among Catholics, are not seriously impressed by that pretense. It is greatly to be desired that the new pope shall see as much of the world as possible, and that he shall occasionally go to places where his progress will not be accompanied by a wave of bowing heads and bending knees. A tour through the United States or great Britain incognito would do wonders for him. But of course he will not take it.

It has been recalled, since the election of Cardinal Sarto, that Pope Leo predicted that he would be his successor. The Election. But in spite of this prediction, which strangely enough seems not to have been remembered until after the election, Sarto won as a dark horse. He was nobody's favorite, but everybody's second choice. By keeping out of the whirl of ecclesiastical politics, he was without a faction devoted to his interest. For the same reason, he escaped the enmity of all the factions. So when it became evident to the partisans of Rampolla, Gotti, Vannutelli and the other prominent candidates that none of these could be elected, there was little difficulty in settling on Sarto as a compromise candidate. He was acceptable as a compromise also because of his attitude toward the government. If the reports are to be trusted, his past course justifies the hope that, while upholding the dignity of the church and standing for every concession which can reasonably be expected, he is not disposed to insist that the present dynasty shall commit suicide and that united Italy shall resolve itself into its original independent atoms so that the pope may again become the sovereign of an independent kingdom. Something like that was the program to which Leo rigidly adhered. Sarto has acquired great fame as an eloquent preacher and as a practical man of affairs. He has never committed himself to Leo's policy, and the Christian world will watch with the keenest interest to see what sort of policy he will mark out for himself. He has at least the advantage of entering upon his office freer than almost any other man would have been from bondage to any party or faction within the church.

The patronage of what are known as "policy shops" is not confined to the colored race, as is sometimes supposed. Nor are they to be neglected in any campaign of reform for the mere reason that the individual transactions represent very small amounts. A crusade which is now being carried on in Chicago against this form of gambling has resulted in twenty-six indictments up to date and has revealed some surprising statistics. There are 1,200 policy shops in the city where negroes and whites in about equal numbers invest on an average $18,000 a day in lottery tickets—mostly in pennies, nickels and dimes. These hundreds of shops are controlled by a coterie of gamblers with political influence who form what is known as the "policy syndicate." They are the organizers and managers of the system and divide among themselves most of the profits, which amount to something like $6,000 a day or $1,860,000 a year. The agents of this syndicate are so numerous and their influence over their patrons is so potent that they have become a recognizable power in politics. Before elections the syndicate orders its agents, the policy-writers who represent the retail dealers in the system, to report for orders to the managers of one party or the other. It is known that this was done in several wards of Chicago in the last municipal campaign. The dangers of the policy game are two: first, it cultivates the gambling habit in persons who can least afford to lose their money and destroys the spirit of industry and thrift in those who have most need of it; second, by the organization above mentioned, it exercises a direct influence for the corrupt control of city government. The success which has attended the war on the policy shops in New York should be an encouragement to Chicago. The system has been completely broken up in New York, where it was entrenched as strongly as it could possibly be, and "policy king Adams" is now doing time in the penitentiary.

From time immemorial it has been customary to exempt from taxation property used for religious or educational purposes and, with relatively few dissenting voices, it has been generally agreed that this is just and proper. If it be objected that this practically amounts to giving a subsidy to sectarian institutions out of state funds, it may be replied that it is at least a subsidy which is automatically and rigidly limited to comparatively small amounts, and that this is only a just recognition of the service which the church renders to the state in spite of the most rigid separation of state and church. Churches and colleges reduce the percentage of crime and foster a spirit of loyal obedience to law, and so reduce the cost of government by an amount which more than equals the amount of taxes remitted. But other considerations are involved in the question of taxing income-producing property owned by religious and educational corporations, and in this matter the usage varies in different states. At present there is a rather vigorous movement on foot in several places for the taxation of such property. Suppose, for example, a church owns a tenement house, or a college owns an office building? Why should not these be taxed without regard to the question of ownership. To make them exempt, places an unwarranted burden upon the tax-payers; it favors an unwholesome aggregation of wealth in the hands of perpetual organizations; and it gives the owners of this untaxed property an undue advantage in competing with the owners of similar property which is taxed.

One Murphy, former treasurer of the stone-cutters' union of New York, has been convicted of embezzlement and sentenced to the penitentiary. The charge was that he received $12,000 for calling off a strike, and that this amount was not turned into the treasury of the union, but was appropriated to his own uses. The negotiations were carried on secretly by Murphy and a few of his associates. At first they demanded $50,000 to call off the strike. The employers offered $5,000. Then there were mutual concessions and they agreed on $12,000. This transaction was one of two things: either it was a case of blackmail, in which the union was used as a tool in the hands of its unscrupulous leaders; or else it was a treacherous selling out of the union and a surrender of the rights which it was striking to maintain. In reality it was both blackmail from the standpoint of the employers and treachery from the standpoint of the union. And we are glad to note that it was embezzlement and a penitentiary offense from the standpoint of the court. The incident is painful, but instructive. We have no disposition to make any general charges or insinuations against labor-leaders, but it is worth while to remember that they are but human, and that they have extraordinary opportunities for doing just what Murphy did. Just how many times the thing has been done and how many strikes have been called on and called off as a means of private gain to the leaders, no one will ever know. But the sooner the laboring men, both union and non-union, learn that everyone who can fulminate against capital is not necessarily a true friend of labor, and that those who talk the loudest about their devotion to the dear "pee-pul" sometimes need to have their accounts audited, the better it will be for all concerned. The meanest kind of demagoguery and treachery is the kind that plays on the simplicity and confidence of workingmen and sells them out for private gain.

The walking delegate who goes about looking for trouble and making it where he cannot find it ready-made, is never an admirable person.

A Walking Delegate of Capital.

The spirit of that individual is never less admirable, however, than when embodied in one who, by reason of social and financial standing, ought to know better. Mr. D. M. Parry, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, has come into some prominence during the past year as an uncompromising enemy of organized labor—at least to the present organizations. Last week in an address in New York he took occasion to denounce what he termed the present "socialistic and anarchistic impulse" in labor unions and urged the organization of employers' unions to fight them. Now we have no objection to the formation of employers' unions. In fact, they seem a natural step in the evolution of industrial organization. But that labor unions are essentially either socialistic or anarchistic (they could not possibly be both at the same time) or that there is need of any organization whose sole function shall be to fight them, we do not for a moment believe. There are enough combatants in the industrial fight as it is. What is needed is not a new set of weapons, but a workable peace program. And peace between capital and labor is not to be secured by a fight to the finish. The president of the National Association of Manufacturers ought to know this. If such an elementary fact of economics has escaped his notice, how can we be surprised if laboring men and their leaders sometimes fall short of that degree of wisdom and forbearance which we could wish them to exhibit.

The following paragraph from "Christendom" expresses a sentiment to which we wish to give our hearty approval:

Liquor Advertising.

The persistent and widespread advertising of different brands of drink is something to be universally deplored. A generation that sees upon every billboard and in almost every magazine striking advertisements of whisky, beer, and champagne, is hardly likely to grow sensitive to the perils which lie in alcohol. It would be very desirable if legislation could be enacted which would enable a community to restrict or prohibit not only the sale but the advertising of spirituous liquors. Such legislation might seem at first too much in the nature of blue laws, but it seems that the community which determines upon prohibition should be permitted to keep out from its limits the public and obtrusive advertisement of the sale of that which it has forbidden.

Even a more flagrant abuse is seen in some cases where the cities have become particeps criminis in liquor advertising. In Indianapolis, for example, large metal receptacles have been placed on many of the street corners for waste paper. The result has been a gratifying improvement in the cleanliness of the streets. But to make a profit out of this virtue the sides of these boxes have been covered with advertisements of a certain whisky. The city is paid for this space. What does it profit a city to keep its streets clear of waste paper and litter them up with drunkards.

On August 8, General Nelson A. Miles will celebrate his sixty-fourth birthday and will be retired from active service. For nearly eight years he has held the anomalous position of commanding general of the army—an office which appears to carry with it a great deal of authority and responsibility, but which may involve very little of either under some circumstances. The strained relations which have existed between General Miles and the war department during most of his term of service as commanding general, reduced the authority of his position to a minimum, and showed clearly the need of a clearer definition of the relations between the civil and military commanders of the army. It is hoped that the recent legislation establishing a general staff will remove the embarrassments incident to this two-headed organization. General S. M. B. Young succeeds General Miles as the ranking officer in the army, but he will be chief of the general staff rather than commanding general. General Miles has, in our opinion, made a good many mistakes during the past few years, some of them perhaps under stress of strong provocation, others which a man of wisdom and experience certainly ought to have avoided. But his military career has been a long and honorable one and he deserves to be gratefully remembered. The promotion of General Leonard Wood to the rank of major-general was an incident among the promotions caused by General Miles' retirement. It was one of those surprising events which every one expected. The President's fondness for General Wood is well-known and most people are willing to take the President's word for it that General Wood is all right. His record in Cuba supports that belief. But General Wood is only forty-three, has seen very little active service and has had more experience as an army surgeon than as a commander. In military circles, where promotion in order of seniority is considered a matter of divine right, General Wood's rapid advancement is much criticised. Especially is it pointed out that now, in the natural course of events he will reach the highest rank within a few years and, because he is so much younger than all the other officers of his grade, will entirely block the road for all the rest for a great many years. This promotion does not, however, necessarily involve a term of fifteen or twenty years for him as chief of the general staff. Since the rule of seniority has been broken in his favor, it may again be broken to lift some one else over his head to the highest command when his turn comes.

The Call to the Ministry.

The question of how we shall recruit the ranks of our ministry with suitable men properly equipped, is vastly more important than the names by which the different classes of ministers may be designated. Nothing is more evident than that the degree of our success in the future will depend upon our ability to secure a sufficient number of able and consecrated men to give themselves "to prayer and to the ministry of the word." Experience shows that wherever we have the right kind of a man to publicly represent the cause we plead, it wins the respect and confidence of the people, and increases in strength. Wherever it fails it fails for the lack of such a man. This makes the question of the call to the ministry a very vital one.

To what source are we to look for the men who are to be the pastors and evangelists among us in the future? They are the "gifts" of our ascended Lord.

When he "ascended on high" Paul declares that "he led captivity captive and gave gifts unto men." Among these "gifts" are mentioned "Apostles, prophets, evangelists and teachers." The first two classes mentioned, in so far as they were miraculously endowed and qualified, or in so far as the very nature of their work made their office temporary, have no successors, but "evangelists, pastors and teachers," are still needed and we still expect them to come as gifts from Christ, in an important sense. Unless they are led by his spirit to give themselves to his service, they are certain not to meet the needs of the church. This calls to mind the Savior's words, "The harvest truly is great, but the laborers are few; pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest that he would send forth laborers into his harvest."

These two passages we have quoted, both to the same import, suggest the reasonable question whether we have given as much attention to this phase of the subject as we should. How often does the local church pray that the young people in its membership may be "sent forth" into the great harvest field as laborers, by the authority of Christ? What is the call to the ministry but the conviction of duty coming to the mind of the young man, that he ought to become a preacher of Christ's gospel? Does not prayer have a very important relation to this conviction of duty? The very atmosphere of a church or a Christian home, where prayer is continually made that Christ may send forth more laborers into his harvest, is that in which the young are likely to feel the greatness of the work of the ministry and aspire to have a part in it.

But there remains one other element of a divine call to the ministry, to supplement the deep and abiding conviction of duty, superinduced by a praying church and a co-operating Lord.

It is the call of the church itself, ratifying the conviction of duty on the part of the young candidate for the ministry, and setting him apart to the sacred work. We would not say that no call is valid where this last element is lacking, for there are special cases, no doubt where churches may and do refuse to endorse those whom God has really called. But these are exceptional cases. So close is a living church in sympathy with its living Head, that it may be relied upon to approve one whom he approves for the work of the ministry. The church cannot escape responsibility for the kind of men whom it recognizes as its ministers. It owes it to itself and to Christ, to exercise its best wisdom in the matter of selecting the men who are to carry its banner to the front and represent it before the public. To have "all sorts of men preaching all sorts of gospel," is a sure mark of an imperfect stage of organization, and of a defective method of religious statesmanship.

Why should not a religious movement like that which is represented by the Disciples of Christ, which has suffered so much from a popular misconception of its purposes and principles, be exceedingly cautious as to the kind and qualifications of its preachers—its evangelists, pastors and teachers?

But no one will affirm that we have exercised due care in this respect, or that we have formulated any clearly-defined plan by which the churches may have a voice in this matter. It is not our purpose to suggest such a plan, now, but simply to indicate the need of some more systematic co-operation in the vital matter of choosing and ordaining suitable men for the ministry of the word by which the standard of efficiency might be raised, and unworthy men more speedily silenced, if not wholly kept out of the ministry. This is as sure to come as we are to grow in orderliness, and in effectiveness of administration of the affairs of the kingdom of God. It will be done, too, in a way that will recognize and emphasize the autonomy of the local churches, while guarding the rights and prerogatives of the individual conscience and the general welfare.

To College or to Business—Which?

During these summer months there is one question that is being thought over seriously both by young men and women and by their parents. It is the old question which has confronted young men and women from time immemorial, as to whether they should make ampler preparation in the way of education before entering upon their chosen calling, or plunge at once into the duties of such calling to make the best of such preparation as they have. We have no doubt that this question is now upon the minds of many of our readers, pressing for decision. We often receive letters asking our advice upon this question, especially from young men. We purpose here to state some facts which will help both parents and their sons and daughters to decide this question.

We are not unaware of the circumstances in many cases which make this a real problem. There is the question of finances, which is sometimes a very difficult one. And this is often the case with young men and women who are hungering and thirsting after knowledge, and longing to quench their thirst at the fountains opened in our institutions of learning. It will require a real sacrifice for many young men to go to college, or for their parents to send them. It often happens, too, that there is a very promising opening for employment, just now, which may not be open later, and the young man feels that he can hardly afford to miss this opportunity for entering into business. Sometimes, too, there is an affair of the heart with young men and women, which makes them pause at the parting of the ways, to decide whether they will deny themselves the pleasure and happiness of married life, for a season, in order to enter upon the more strenuous and earnest search after knowledge and intellectual discipline. All of these considerations have their weight and often make the problem of going to college a very serious one.

And yet there are considerations on the other side which outweigh, in most cases at least, the reasons we have suggested for turning away from college life to enter business, or one's chosen profession. Every one is under the most solemn obligation to make the most of himself and to develop to the utmost of his ability the powers and capacities with which God has endowed him. One who duly considers this fact will not be easily turned away from the pursuit of learning in an institution designed for the very purpose of assisting young people in their mental and moral development. This is an age of the general diffusion of knowledge, when it is more difficult for one to succeed without thorough preparation than in former times. Why should a young man or young woman consent to enter upon their life-work handicapped for all time by the lack of that preparation which it is possible for them to receive?

If one studies statistics of college men he will see how large a proportion of those holding public and official positions of responsibility, both in the church and state, are men of college training. We cite this fact to show that there is an accession of power and influence that comes with education, and only comes with it, except in rare and exceptional cases. But against the commercial view of life, which considers only what education is necessary in order to succeed in acquiring property, or position, we would plead for a larger and truer view of education which will fit men for getting the most good out of this world, of doing the most good for the world, and of giving the most to the world. The highest enjoyments of this life do not come from the possession of wealth, but from a knowledge of the world in which we live, of the peoples who inhabit it, of its history from earliest dawn of historic knowledge, of God who made it and governs it, and the fulfillment of our relations to God and our fellowmen. True education enables one to do this and is, hence, beyond all commercial consideration.

Many a young man and woman is to-day at the turning point of life, pondering this very question—To college or to business? Their whole future may be wrapped up in it. We heard Professor Hinsdale say, in what was perhaps his last public address, what an intense and eager moment it was in his life, and how full of destiny it was, when, sitting around the fire-side one winter evening, in his father's old home, paring apples, his father looked up and said: "Burke, how would you like to go to Hiram?" The boy's eager soul was on fire at once with a desire to enter that institution of learning and make something of himself. He did so, and we know the result. Without that decision made on the part of the father and the son in that humble Ohio home, where would have been the learned professor, the profound thinker, the able author, the wise teacher of teachers, the philosophic writer and historian, whose name and fame are part of our enduring heritage?

But this is only one instance out of thousands that could be cited where, from obscure homes, have come, through the emancipating power of education, men and women of genius, of commanding power, who have become great leaders of human thought and mighty actors in the drama of life. In view of these facts the simple question, we should say, is one of possibility. No consideration of temporary gain, of pleasure, of ease, of matrimonial enjoyment, should weigh against the mighty motives which urge the young men and women of to-day to give themselves the most thorough and adequate preparation for their life-work. We can but urge upon our young readers, and upon their parents in their behalf, to weigh the higher motives at their full value and to decide this question in a way that will bring no regrets in after years. How often have we heard the lament over the neglect of wasted opportunities for education in early life! But whoever yet heard one lament the acquisition of useful knowledge, or the mental and moral discipline acquired in a college course? Wealth, pleasure, pleasant relationships, ease, personal comfort—these are but temporary phases of life. Only character abides, and whatever helps in the development and formation of character should outweigh all other considerations.

Another Mare's Nest.

Our Cincinnati contemporary grows almost hysterical in a lengthy editorial of last week over the suggestion of the Pacific Christian, seconded by the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, that it would be better to refer some of our church troubles to arbitration than to fight them out through the papers, or go to law. The Pacific Christian urged the importance of such a method of settling troubles not coming within the range of the jurisdiction of the local church, and the plan of selecting the arbitrators, which it suggested, was that each state convention "appoint a committee of three whose business it should be to take cognizance of all such cases." Commenting on this the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST said:

"The method of arranging for arbitration is a matter about which brethren may differ, and concerning which there might be exchange of thought in order to secure the best results, but there does not seem to be any doubt as to the wisdom of applying the principle of arbitration to differences in the church as well as to those which exist between labor and capital. It is a principle that is in entire harmony with the spirit of the New Testament, and is far preferable, in every way, to the sensational method of going to law before civil tribunals."

Of course the "differences" referred to are not doctrinal differences, but cases of schism and alienation between brethren, where charges are made involving matters of faith and fellowship. The Standard lays chief stress upon the manner of appointing this committee of arbitration, and obscures, by its voluminous and irrelevant comments, the real issue. Is it in favor of applying the principle of arbitration between brethren in the church as well as between men out of the church and between nations? If not, why not? If it is, then the subordinate question of how such arbitrators should be appointed may be discussed. We think there is a better plan of appointing arbitrators, perhaps, than that indicated by the Pacific Christian, as our comments clearly indicated, though that plan has been adopted in a number of cases. Our object was, however, to call special attention to the principle of arbitration itself, as one that should be used more frequently in the religious as well as in the industrial world and in international politics. We should be glad to know if we have the approval of the Christian Standard in this position.

All the Standard's talk about the surrender of our liberty and the establishment of an ecclesiastical despotism through the appointment of arbitrators to settle disputes between brethren, is so much dust thrown in the air. Our contemporary knows as well as any of our readers that no one would oppose more persistently than we any iron-wheel of ecclesiastical machinery for crushing the liberty of the churches or of individual members. There is no possibility of any such danger among us. The condition, and not the theory, which confronts us is the assumption of such authority by some individual who, by some chance or circumstance, has been elevated to the editorial chair, and who, by virtue of his position, claims the right to set aside the verdict of the trustees of an institution and the sentiment and judgment of the brotherhood of a whole state. Has arbitration any relation to such a state of things as this?

Editor's Easy Chair.

Or

Macatawa Musings.

The experiences of the Easy Chair, and the Macatawa Muser have been varied and kaleidoscopic during the past week. They began with two sermons on Lord's day at Grand Rapids, one at the First or Lyon Street Christian Church in the morning, and the other at the Fifth Avenue Christian Church in the evening. Brother Arthur, of the First Church, was on his vacation, and Brother Green of the Second, though present, prevailed on us to speak for him in the evening. Both churches are prospering. We enjoyed the privilege, which we always appreciate, of sharing the hospitality of Bro. Lathrop C. Stow and family, while in the city. Brother Arthur, whom we did not meet, has greatly endeared himself to the church and people of Grand Rapids, by his pure life and his whole-hearted devotion to the cause. Brother Green is a young man, a graduate of Bethany College, who has not been with the young mission church very long, but he is gaining the confidence and love of the people to whom he ministers. He, too, is about to lay aside his shepherd's crook for a brief vacation.

Early Monday morning we—the editor and his wife—were joined by a party of friends from Macatawa for an exploration of some of the resorts around Traverse Bay. One is impressed as he rides northward along the shore line of Lake Michigan that it is one of the greatest if not the greatest summer resort state in the Union. Aside from the main shore line along which the principal resorts are located, there are a great many inland lakes, bays and inlets that afford scenery, boating, fishing and cool breezes—some of the most important conditions for a popular summer resort. Traverse City, Sutton's Bay, "Fountain House" on Carp Lake, "The Clovers," Omena, Northport and Cedar Point on Traverse Bay, are some of the places we glanced at, and one or two of which we somewhat carefully examined. Some of these excelled in one feature and some in another, but it is difficult to find one that combines so many of the conditions mentioned above as our own Macatawa, including the additional element of accessibility. But each resort has its advocates and friends, and it is fortunate that tastes differ. It is wonderful how the resort habit has grown within our own memory. It has not been long since a few watering places in the East monopolized the business. A handful of wealthy people were their patrons. Now the common people, by thousands manage to find a cool spot somewhere, where, with little expense and no ostentation, they may enjoy a pleasant outing and a needed change. Michigan offers unexcelled opportunities for this class of resorters.

One of the spots visited in our cruise among the coves and inlets of Traverse Bay, makes a pleasant picture which abides in one's memory. It is in one of the graceful curves which the Bay makes, affording shelter from the winds and waves which would otherwise sweep in from Lake Michigan through its northern outlet. A green, grass-carpeted shore rises gracefully on the west side, covered with fruit trees, and a few peaceful cottages nestling among them. A neat hotel is the central feature of the few buildings that crown the hillside overlooking the Bay. The water is clear as crystal. It is seven or eight miles across the Bay to the mainland on a point of which "Old Mission" is located. The harvest fields are only just ripe for the reaper, and give their golden color to add beauty to the scene. A little steamer plies back and forth from one end of the Bay to the other, touching at all the points along the way, from Traverse City on the south to Charlevoix. The whole scene is one of quiet, restful, pastoral beauty. The Indian farmers, riding on their loads of hay, remind us that the missionary has been before us, converting the savage red man into a peaceful, industrious husbandman. One day, on this green, grassy slope, overlooking the Bay, will rise hundreds of handsome cottages owned and inhabited by people from the cities and towns of the sultry regions further south, who will find here respite from the heat, tumult and hurry of city life, and increase their hold on life and its deeper meanings.

Speaking of varied experiences, let one day illustrate. The night was spent in a frame cottage close to the bank of Carp Lake, so called, perhaps, because it abounds in black bass and there are no carp there. A little after four, when the early morning light had dispelled the darkness from the narrow strip of the lake, we are out for some fish before breakfast, which was ordered at seven. The frogs, boats and boys to row, had been secured the evening before. A four pound black bass was the first capture, and the largest, but he was followed by others, until our ambition was satisfied. Breakfast over, our party drove five miles in a carriage to Sutton's Bay. Thence by rail we went to Northport, being joined on the way at "The Clovers" by Mr. and Mrs. Keys, proprietors of that hostelry. At Northport, we took a steam launch across an arm of the Bay to Cedar Point, a peninsula extending out into the lake and a fine resort for those who enjoy lake breezes. About noon, we take the little steamer "Columbia" for Omena, lunching on board. From Omena we walk to "The Clovers," the ladies being taken in a carriage. Thence at 3:30 we take the train for Grand Rapids and Macatawa Park, where we are ferried across the channel in a row-boat at 11 p. m., and 12 o'clock, after a day of twenty hours, finds us in bed—our part of the party—in "Edgewood-on-the-lake." And now these lines are jotted down out of sight of land in the middle of the lake, en-route for Chicago, St. Louis, and Blue Spring Lodge on the Meramec, where we preach Sunday. Is this "the strenuous life" of which we hear so much?

Notes and Comments.

A religious paper protests against President Roosevelt's message of regret at the death of Leo XIII in which he expressed respect for the late pope's exalted character, and says: "It breaks the traditions of this country against government intermeddling in matters of religion, and creates a precedent which will be a plague hereafter." Yet that same paper took pride in printing in facsimile, less than four months ago, a letter from President Roosevelt to the home missionary secretary of the religious body which it represents, in which the President said: "I wish you all success in your effort for home missions." No complaint was made at that time about "government intermeddling in matters of religion."

The Outlook for July 4, in an article on the Fair of St. Louis, presents this feature of the great Exposition which the public ought to understand:

"Distinctively, too, this Fair is designed to be a work of education. What that signifies may be learned from the fact that in every department of the Fair the conscious object of the director is to teach the people who shall come to see it how the leaders in the branch of knowledge which that department represents have attained their measure of progress. But the highest possible significance of the Fair will be lost unless it can be shown that its effect will be to turn the minds of men from things to ideals, from the visible body to the invisible mind, from matter to spirit. The chief question that concerns thoughtful men as they think of the Exposition at St. Louis is, What will it tell concerning the character of America? What will it reveal of the soul of the nation?"

That is a fine ideal of a university which Dr. George A. Gordon gives in an article on Charles W. Eliot, President of Harvard University, in The Congregationalist and Christian World when he says:

The university is the organ of the world's best intelligence and character; it is the organ of humanity in its highest achievement and hope. It must not be dominated, embarrassed, or belittled by any sect. It must be free as the sightless couriers of the air, free as the servant of truth in the reverent sense of the Infinite. And the whole reference of its existence must be the well-being of society, the elevation of the nation, the progress of mankind.

The Missouri Bible-school Convention, at Joplin, recommended the employment, by our general board of home missions, of a national superintendent of Sunday-school work among us, whose duty it would be to keep in touch with the very best methods of Sunday-school work, and also with all our Sunday-schools through our state organizations to stimulate them with higher ideals and better methods; also to gather and publish statistics bearing on the work and to do whatever a live, wide-awake man, giving his whole time to this work, can do to raise the standard of efficiency in our Bible-schools. It was recommended that such a man, if appointed, be supported by the Bible-schools of the several states acting through their state organizations, and our corresponding secretary, aided by a committee, was authorized to communicate with the official representatives of this work in other states to solicit their co-operation with the Missouri representatives in securing such an appointment and in sustaining such superintendent. So far as we have heard this action seems to meet with the approval of the brethren, for the feeling is wide-spread that there should be an advance step taken in our Sunday-school work to bring it up to the dignity and pedagogical efficiency of the day schools. Much, of course, depends upon securing the right kind of man for the place. He should, if possible, be widely known, that he may command the confidence of the brethren from the beginning; but that is less important than his qualifications. It requires a practical student of the Sunday-school problem, who keeps in touch with all the real advancement that is being made in Sunday-school work and who is able to impart it to others. It goes without saying that he should be broad enough to be a representative of the entire brotherhood, not specially allied with any section or school or publishing house, but standing for the best thought, the best method and the highest aims in the department of Bible school instruction. If no such man is available, let us have no one; but if such an one can be secured, there is a field of widest usefulness for him. The responsibility of electing or nominating such superintendent should be in the hands of a representative body of men like our general board, who can give time and care to his selection.

Churches About the Bay

By W. B. Berry.

A number of Disciples met for worship in San Francisco as early as 1852, but no church was organized till ten years later. W. W. Stevenson was the first pastor. Many strong men ministered to the church in later years, but space will not permit such mention as they deserve. For thirty years or more, there was no permanent place of worship. In 1878, a house on Minna Street was bought for $8,500, but was sold in 1879. The present commodious house of worship was first occupied in 1887. It is located on Twelfth Street, between Howard and Mission.

Among many faithful men whose names are worthy of special mention, Prof. Selden Sturges and the late H. H. Luse were perhaps first and foremost. Brother Luse was a man of means and a liberal giver to every good cause. Professor Sturges has been superintendent of a splendid Sunday-school for many years, and he has few equals and perhaps no superiors in that capacity.

Since September, 1896, Frank S. Ford has been pastor of the church. He is a California boy, and one of which his native state has no reason to be ashamed. He is industrious, studious and methodical. He is one of our best preachers. And the First Church, since the beginning of his ministry, has grown steadily in numbers and in spirituality. The membership at this time numbers 385. There is no known reason why the church and minister which God hath joined together should not remain together and become a great power in the great city of San Francisco.

The West Side Church of San Francisco was organized in 1892 by the lamented W. A. Gardner, than whom we have never had a more lovable and successful man among us. He served the church as minister from the time of its organization till he was forced to resign by failing health in 1898. After that time, Mark Wayne Williams ministered to the church most satisfactorily till the present pastor, W. M. White, was installed in November, 1899. Brother White has served the church with marked ability in every department of the work. No other man, so far as the writer can remember, has gained so wide and favorable a reputation among our own people and also among other religious bodies, in so short a time after coming west.

In his work at the West Side, Brother White has struggled heroically with a church debt which has been almost or entirely liquidated. The congregation is now worshipping in a rented hall while work on a new house of worship proceeds. The contract for this new building was let for $32,250, and the furnishings will cost $6,000. A large part of this building fund comes from the estate of the late Sister Douglass, whose heart was in the work of the West Side Church from the time of its organization. It is expected that the building will be dedicated free from debt some time next spring.

Brother White reports a present membership of 331, and a large number of them are such members as a preacher may rely upon in any legiti-mate plan of enlargement and progress. Sister Proctor, of Santa Clara, has just been employed as pastoral helper, and it is expected that several others will be employed within the next year.

Within the last three years the missionary spirit has grown very perceptibly in both our San Francisco churches. Within that time, or less, two missions have been established—one in the Sunset District and one in the Richmond District. Bro. George Greenwell preaches the word at each of these missions, and the work is very hopeful. The old West Side house of worship was torn down and is now in process of reconstruction at the Sunset mission.

The first effort to introduce the plea of the Disciples to the people of Oakland was made in 1876, by a brother who withdrew from the San Francisco church because an organ had been used in the worship. The first organization was effected in 1879, while Alexander Johnson was employed as minister. The church in Oakland from that time on has made a great deal of history, much of which would not make good reading. Suffice it to say that one feature of the kingdom of heaven was made very prominent, especially in respect to its ministers—it was like a net cast into the sea, catching of every kind.

But at the present time the Oakland church is united and active and hopeful. Thomas A. Boyer has been pastor for about six months. Bro. L. B. Wilkes once said to the writer that Brother Boyer was the best regular preacher he ever listened to. Many of the Oakland people seem to agree with Brother Wilkes in this estimate of Brother Boyer's ability.

At the beginning of his ministry in Oakland six months ago, the church moved from a small rented house on West Street to Hamilton Hall in the center of the city. The congregations have been large, and forty have been received to membership in that time. The church in Oakland seems to have entered upon a new era of peace, prosperity and progress.

In 1887, ten Disciples met in Alameda and organized a Sunday-school. In 1890, Bro. J. H. McCollough held a short series of meetings and organized church. In 1896, a neat chapel was erected by the church, assisted by the Church Extension Board. The debt is being gradually reduced. The church has had some misfortunes, but is now doing well. It is partly supported by the home board and our state board. Bro. P. C. Macfarlane is the minister. It is his first charge, but already he has taken high rank in the ministry of the state, both as pastor and preacher. There are at present ninety active members—united, consecrated, hopeful. And they are thoroughly in love with their pastor.

The first meeting of Disciples in Berkeley was in September, 1893. The church was organized a year later. There has been steady but not rapid progress since that time, and the number of members has grown from 18 to 135.

Bro. E. W. Darst is the pastor. He is a very strong man in the pulpit and has had large experience in city work. The church has no house of worship, but has some funds and plans for one which will be erected at an early date.

The presence of Prof. A. M. Elston, Dean Jefferson and Dean Van Kirk, has been a great inspiration and strength to the Berkeley church. The interest of the school and the church is one and the California Disciples look forward to the time when both shall be might factors in moulding the thought of the thousands of young men and women who shall attend the great university from year to year.

Richmond is a town of 4,000 inhabitants, a little way up the bay from Berkeley. Our indefatigable state evangelist, J. P. Dargitz, secured four lots there and lumber for a cheap tabernacle in which a meeting was held by Brother Ogburn. A church of 21 members was organized and a chapel will take the place of the tabernacle in the fall.

We are thinking now of these eight churches and missions about the bay as only a beginning. We are thinking now of a future work—here where the nations meet—that will justify the claim we make of a non-sectarian plea, and that will place us before the multitudes that are here and coming, as a people true to the high standard of our profession.

My California Retrospect.

By J. Durham.
Irvington, Cal.

In 1871 from Abingdon, Ill., we cast our anchor among the flowers of California. We came to help carry California for Christ. In school and church work we have stood in front of the firing line, and it is a great pleasure to retrospect every phase of advancement of this great state during this time. We have been as long at continuous work in California as any other, and during this period her school system has developed to the first in the nation, other interests in proportion.

The morals of the state have made great progress. The growth of the church has been so marked that it is a delight to note its footsteps. When we came to California, Brother Pendegast, with the Woodland Church, was the only minister giving all his time. We had a number of preachers at work, but it was more or less itinerant. We had no church at San Jose or Oakland, a little band at Sacramento, while a few saints met in an upper room in San Francisco with an occasional preacher. At scores of places there were none where now we have flourishing churches. Thousands have been added and an army of consecrated men and women are kept busy. We started a "young people's meeting" in our own hired house in 1875, and were the first in any church to introduce the International Sunday-school series on the first day of publication. They were Brother Dowling's, of the Christian Publishing Company.

I have carefully studied the hindrances to Christian work on our coast. Some of these have been overcome, particularly where our commercial relations to the trans-Rocky people have brought us in touch with the church in the east, thus getting a stronger and more permanent class of representative men to preach the word. For a long time we were in need of a permanent paper. Every effort helped. Good men undertook it, but, like our ocean, there was an ebb and flow in the enterprise, mostly an ebb, till the Lord called Brother Berry as our editor. His ability in every direction from the first has been marked with success.

Another difficulty is the annual large output of gold and other treasures, which has kept a contagious gold-seeking fever that has affected every branch of business. This will probably never be overcome. The last I mention, while it is local, can never be overcome. That is our peculiar climate which makes our church work hard and much of a disappointment, at first, to preachers entering our field from the east. There is such a luxury of fruit and outdoor life that they are often discouraged and return, as they think, to more promising fields. A very large part of the year is sunshine, with no rain, but continuous refreshing climate; it is about as near heaven as many want or ever will get. This makes outdoor life a delight and luxury.

Then the abundance of sanitary springs, sea-side parks and moun-

Conditions and Prospects of the Cause in California.

By W. H. Martin.

In the seventies when I was in Australia, I met a Presbyterian minister who once had occupied a pulpit of his denomination in San Francisco.

In reply to an inquiry regarding the religious condition of that city he said that it contained the best and the most wicked people of any city of his acquaintance. The characterization aptly represents California in general. The good are among the best, and the bad are among the most hardened in the world. This condition makes California a difficult field for evangelization. On the other hand, a comparison of the gifts of our churches for missions with those from our older fields in the east will, I am sure, justify the statement that the devotion of the Disciples of Christ in this state is not one whit less than that of those east of the Rocky Mountains. As indicating the progress that has been made as well as the outlook for the future, I may mention the fact that when I came to California in 1878 we estimated the number of Disciples in the whole state at about 2,500, while but two or three churches had preaching every Sunday, and a large number of the pulpits were entirely vacant. The year book for 1902 gives our total membership at 21,000, with nearly every pulpit supplied. Thus it may be seen that in the last quarter of a century we have increased about 800 per cent. A like ratio of increase for the next 25 years would bring our numbers to about 150,000. While this can scarcely be expected, yet I think the history of past achievements in California furnishes good ground to take a hopeful view of the future.

One discouraging feature may be noticed which may somewhat retard the work in the immediate future. I refer to the spirit of suspicion which has been engendered by the unwarranted attack of one of our papers upon Berkeley Bible Seminary. Although Professor Van Kirk has been completely vindicated from the charges of heresy preferred against him, and that by men of tried and known fidelity to the scriptures, yet

I was surprised to see an article from the pen of one of our best known men in which he, having heard Brother Van Kirk, expressed himself as fully satisfied with his loyalty to the scriptures and to our plea, but in which he took occasion to say that he was not prepared to find the dean so staunch in his defense of the faith.

Now, it goes without saying, that this attitude toward one another in which suspicion cannot be allayed by the vindication of men of known fidelity to the word of God, but must wait on personal examination for its removal, is one calculated to retard the best efforts of our churches to extend the cause in California. This condition, however, is only temporary, and will be entirely replaced by confidence, after the meeting of our conventions in July and August.

On the whole, the outlook for our work in California is quite promising. Our work both in northern and southern California was never so well organized as now, and, what is even more to the point, the necessity of personal communion with God in order to do his work effectually was never so deeply felt.

The art of getting a good effect out of an evil cause is assiduously but unsuccessfully cultivated by many people who enjoy the practice of vice, but appreciate the wholesome results of virtue. Tolstoy recently delivered this utterance: "Modern education is really the science of how, living badly, one might have good influence on children, exactly as medicine is a science teaching how to be well in spite of a mode of living contrary to nature and the laws of health. Both are cunning and empty sciences, which fail of their respective aims."

The Pacific Northwest.

By J. F. Ghormley.

Every part of our great country presents splendid opportunities for missionary effort. The far east where old philosophers have taken on new forms and seek to mould the millions; the new south where the race problem is becoming a menace; the north where the foreign population predominates; are calling for means and men to aid in the establishment of the church of Christ. These lines are not written to place one part of the home field above another in importance, but to call attention to a few things worthy of consideration. Look on the map of the Pacific northwest, which includes Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Montana, Utah, Wyoming, British Columbia and Alaska. The rich soil, the healthful climate, the vast resources in fisheries, timber and minerals of this great territory furnish the conditions for homes for the millions; and they are coming. Among the migrating multitudes are many of our own people. They are found in every community, village and city, from Oregon's fruitful fields to Alaska's golden hills. In these northwestern states the scattered Disciples are becoming organized and aggressive. The timely aid of the American Christian Missionary Convention and the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, has made possible the splendid results thus far attained. Yonder, however, are British Columbia and Alaska—what of these? New cities are springing up along the coast and by the boundless wheat fields of the interior. If we have any churches in these territories they are few and far between. That we ought to have many is evident. For the missionary boards to send men like Bro. W. F. Cowden to spy out the country and start the work at strategic points would be money well spent and would have a telling effect on the future of our work in these regions. The fact is that the Pacific northwest is the greatest and most fruitful home missionary field in America; not that there are as many people here as in some other parts of the country, but there are enough to begin on and others are coming. That this country has a great future commercially is recognized by the capitalist as he invests his hundreds of millions. The future of this country religiously will depend largely upon what we do now. Our religious neighbors are awake to this fact and are taking advantage of being early on the ground. Here they have held their national conventions and are planning to hold others.

The Lewis and Clark Centennial Exposition which will be held in Portland, Oregon, in 1905, will bring tens of thousands of visitors to this country and also the national convention of the Baptist church. As we are nearing the centennial of "our movement" this great northwest ought to have the mighty spiritual uplift, which the coming of the general convention would give it; 1905 is the time, and Portland, Oregon, is the place.

Under the Turquoise Sky

By F. D. Power

One gets very near to heaven in the Rockies. Fourteen thousand feet above Washington City is no little climb. The shaft erected to the father of his country towers 555 feet above the Potomac, but what is that to Pike's Peak! The skies are bluer, the stars closer, and earth and all earthly things seem far below us when on these great heights. The Lord had a good deal of Colorado on his hands and he had to set some of it up on end, and one must climb and climb to see it all.

Thomas Jefferson knew much when he made the Louisiana Purchase in 1803 for sixteen millions, but he had no idea what he was buying. He thought it was the town of New Orleans and the right to navigate the Mississippi; he never dreamed of this great unknown country which it involved. As late as 1854 when the territory of Nebraska was formed which included with the present state the Dakotas, Montana, Wyoming and a part of Colorado, a government report described it as "a desert country, totally unfit for agriculture." Old General Bridger, the veteran pioneer, in 1847 told the Mormons he would give them a thousand dollars for every bushel of corn they would raise in their new Zion.

Now there are great empires carved out of this territory, with thriving cities and towns, and millions of acres that blossom as the rose, and one may travel for miles and see great fields of corn that will yield from eighty to one hundred bushels to the acre. Denver is an answer to all the old-time talk about "the Great American Desert."

"The Queen City of the Plains" is almost a miracle. One travels over miles and miles of bare, brown prairies given over to sage brush and cactus, ant heaps and prairie dog villages with scarcely a ranch in sight, and even if things grow, it is, as the old lady said, "You can't even raise alpaca unless you irritate it!" and then suddenly there rises before you as if by magic this magnificent city, a mile above the nation's capital, with 175,000 people, splendid public buildings, palatial houses, and all the latest and most advanced things that belong to our civilization. Here is a capitol that cost $2,000,000, with both men and women making laws; an opera house that required $850,000 to build it; the Brown Palace Hotel that represents a million and a quarter; magnificent office buildings furnished in onyx, rich as a dream, costing way up in the hundreds of thousands, great school buildings and costly dwellings as fine as anything we have in Washington—beautiful churches and parks, and the sun shining 357 days in the year! Here they even boast of the tallest chimney in America, 352 feet high which has in it 2,000,000 bricks and cost $50,000, the chimney of the great smelter.

One cannot begin to realize the marvelous progress of this region. In 1858 the Pike's Peak gold excitement caused a rush to Colorado and a camp was pitched where Denver now stands. Beautiful for situation, with illimitable plains stretching to the Missouri on the east and the gleaming serrated line of Rockies on the west, it is a charming spot. As far back as 1841 the Spaniards knew it. In 1859 it had twenty cabins, and the first overland coach came in ten days from Leavenworth, bringing letters at twenty-five cents a piece. In 1872 came the first railroad train. In 1876, statehood.

Now in the midst of this treeless, trackless, Indian-ridden, buffalo-roamed wilderness and out of ranchmen's huts and miner's camps has grown one of the finest farms of American society, a great center of attraction here on the backbone of the continent, not only for cattlemen and cowboys, adventurers and prospectors, but for cultivated people of the east, travelers from every clime, health seekers, students and retired people of wealth who seek an ideal resting place. Eighty per cent of the population is native American.

Woman's position is one of deliberate and open recognition as human beings. Women came slowly at first. In proportion to their scarcity they were more highly prized and have gained a prominence they have received no where else. No longer are they classed with the idiot, Indian and Chinaman, but they vote and make laws. In the meantime men have not lost their respect for women because they have a part in politics. On the contrary their respect is heightened. Women have not lost their love for home and domestic avocations, they have been invested with power to shield their homes and loved ones. Women of immoral character have not been active in politics; they declined to register; the most cultivated and intelligent have been the ones most deeply interested in the issues of the day. A member of the state senate, himself a Kentuckian and reared with altogether different ideas, said to me: "It works perfectly. If the states in the east knew its advantages they would adopt it without question." In all matters moral and educational this influence is felt for good. For ten years it has worked and worked well. Only the hoodlum element is against it. The present superintendent of public instruction is a woman, and woman is a power here on the school question.

Another interesting thing to the eastern visitor is the system of agriculture. The United States has 500,000,000 acres of arid lands. Vast regions in these Rocky mountain states need only water to make them abundantly fruitful. Practically thirty-five years ago there was no farming in Colorado. Now there are thousands of miles of irrigating ditches, and millions of acres under water, thousands of smiling farms are seen and the farming and stock products of the state reached in 1902, sixty millions in value. Water is stored in reservoirs and then carried by means of canals and distributed through ditches and laterals. It costs eight dollars per acre for the first year, and then one dollar a year, and the farm yields four times as much with irrigation as when the farmer trusts to the rainfall. Congress could spend money here to greater advantage than in warships and big guns.

Going south from Denver we have found a happy resting place for two weeks at Manitou. Pike's Peak, the historic beacon summit which guided the early explorers across the great plains, rears its snowy crest in the midst of a veritable wonderland. Nature is seen here in her grandest and most fantastic moods. Mountain peaks, massive, gigantic, sublime, lift themselves into a region of perpetual snow. Stupendous canons, miles in length, where the granite mountains have been cleft asunder, stretch their red rock walls perpendicularly thousands of feet toward the sky. Medicinal springs for the healing and refreshment of millions gush cold and sparkling from their hidden depths. Marvelous climate, whose charms and remedial virtues have given to this region world-wide fame, attracts thousands of health-seekers from every part of the globe.

Manitou, at the foot of Pike's Peak, is the Baden-Baden, the Saratoga of the west. Here are marvels of canon and gorge, dizzy heights and awful depths, gigantic rock forms and weird caverns, gushing streams and sylvan dells.

The snowy peak, 14,147 feet above the sea, where we found ourselves in a snowstorm and tossing snow balls at each other on July 14, is conquered by the meek-eyed, sure-footed, patient burro, shank's mare, or cogwheel railroad, where a panorama of surpassing grandeur is unfolded to the vision. The world is before us. Spread out on every hand is a picture with 40,000 square miles of canvas. To the east a glorious confusion of buffalo plains, streams and flowering fields, dotted with cities and villages, Colorado Springs and Manitou looking like flower beds at our feet. To the south, seven lakes, the mountain of New Mexico, and the Spanish Peaks, Pueblo, Canon City and the Arkansas Valley, Cripple Creek, mines, settlements and railroads. To the west, with its crests rising above the clouds from 60 to 150

The Outlook.

By J. H. McCollough.

Some facts in the history of the Pacific Coast give peculiar interest to the cause of Christ just now, and ought to stir the Disciples to great activity. The laying of the cable to Manila, thus bringing the Philippine archipelago, into close relations with us as to business. The rapid development of the resources of those islands, and through them, the increase of trade with the Orient. The prospect of the Isthmian Canal soon to be built, and the great increase of travel and commerce it will create. The government enterprise in putting water on vast areas of arid lands, known to be the richest in the world for agricultural purposes when well supplied with water; and the vast increase of population destined to follow. The harnessing of the immense water power created by the flow from melting snow on the Sierra range extending from south to north across the entire coast, by electricity, with the large valleys, cities and towns, thus developing agriculture and manufacturing, giving work to the coming millions of people. The constant new discovery of petroleum and the unfailing supply in oil fields, opening up many kinds of business, and starting thousands of automobiles, propelled by gasoline, over the comparatively level valleys. The value of alfalfa, and the vast area of rich land where five and six crops can be raised in a single season by the aid of irrigation. All these new resources, together with fruit interest still enlarging, and the mining interests still extending in all these coast states and Alaska, is destined in the immediate future to bring an increase of population such as we have never known. With this rising tide of immigration, many of our people are coming from the middle states, and the stimulus is being felt. A decided spirit of hopefulness is observable, and we are expecting one of the largest and most enthusiastic state meetings this year that we have ever held.

Bridal Veil Falls, Yosemite Valley.

Our indefatigable state evangelist or secretary, Bro. J. P. Dargitz, will show in his report better work done by our state board of California than for many years past. Many of us have been feeling for years that we must bring out and educate our own young men for preachers, and to this end we have at great sacrifice of time and money established a Bible Seminary at Berkeley. Just as we were beginning to rejoice in our success, we have been saddened and greatly pained by an unexpected attack upon our dean, Brother Van Kirk, by one of our leading papers. A periodical established nearly forty years ago for the express purpose of cultivating and lifting up to a higher standard the character and graces of our people. A paper for which so many of us have labored so hard and so long to build up into a great power, never dreaming that it would ever be turned with all its influence, to crush our rising young men of brilliant minds and fine educational attainments; and in so doing greatly injure such an enterprise as our Berkeley Bible Seminary.

But our work must go on. This is no time to falter with such grand opportunities opening before us. We trust that the editor of the Christian Standard will yet see the injury his course is doing, and do all he can to repair it. Or, failing to do this, the good sense of the mighty hosts who have gathered around the Standard, will lead them to demand and the stockholders to act and put a man in the editorial chair who shall combine the soundness in doctrine, the intellectual grasp, the general information and literary attainments, together with the wisdom and spirit of Christ so beautifully combined and exhibited in the late beloved Errett.

In the hope that time, which with good people is a great healer, together with the providence and blessings of God, will rectify these wrongs, there is a rapidly increasing host of earnest brethren who will press on. Men and women, let us arise and gird on the whole armor of God and go forward.

Irvington, Calif.

The Aims of the Disciples of Christ.

By H. T. Morrison.

Christ, in the beginning, founded but one church. For centuries, denominationalism was unknown. It is of modern origin. Until Christianity became corrupted by designing men, the church was a unit, keeping the unity of the faith in the bonds of peace; and, under its head, the Christ moving forward to the conquest of the world. When Constantine ascended the throne of the Cæsars, the church and Christianity had been so far corrupted that the Christian world was ready to plunge headlong into the superstitions that were then beginning to cast their gloomy and deadly shadows over the entire religious world. Up to the time of Luther's reformation in the sixteenth century, a period of more than a thousand years, what remained of the church was well-nigh buried out of sight. The church, represented by the woman of the apocalypse, clothed with the sun, had been driven into the wilderness, and during that long period, the powers of darkness seemed to hold complete sway over the world. The scriptures were unknown except in the dead languages, and the people were so sunk in ignorance that many of the professed teachers of religion could not even read. A copy of the Bible cost more than a good house.

But Luther's reformation was the dawn of a new and better era. His work consisted largely in digging the Bible up out of the errors and superstitions of Romanism, and restoring it to the people. In giving the people free access to the Bible, Luther struck a blow at the apostasy which will eventually prove its complete overthrow.

Luther's reformation was an effort to get away from the errors of Romanism back to the teaching of the New Testament. But after his departure, the work so well begun by this master workman, was to a large extent neutralized by building around a human creed a party which took the reformer's name. A grave mistake was made in assuming that Luther had discovered all necessary truth, and that his reformation was a finality. And what was true of Luther's reformation has been true of nearly all other efforts of the same kind in modern times. Some of the principal results of Protestantism are a great number of conflicting creeds, and as many warring parties built upon these creeds, which in many cases are more zealous for the traditions of the fathers of these parties than for the salvation of perishing souls.

The people known as Christians, or Disciples of Christ, who have had a separate existence for upwards of three quarters of a century, may be said to have three distinct objects in view: 1. A complete return to the teaching and practice of the apostolic church. 2. A complete overthrow of denominationalism, and the union of God's people in the true New Testament sense. 3. The conversion of the whole world to Christ.

They believe the greatest thing to be desired is the salvation of the world; but that this end can never be realized without a united church, and that a united church is only possible through a complete return to the simple teaching and practice of the primitive church.

They believe the modern divisions of Christendom are contrary to the spirit and teaching of the gospel, and that the errors of the dark ages will never be fully undone until the teaching and practice of the primitive church are fully restored. What they therefore propose, in order to reach this much to be desired end, is not to try to reform parties, as such, but to go back beyond all parties and party names; beyond all human creeds and confessions of faith and commandments of men; beyond synods and councils and popes and party leaders; beyond Romanism and the dark ages—back to the order of things that existed before Christianity was corrupted. They believe this is the way, and the only way out of this modern confusion—the only way God's people can ever again see eye to eye and be united in one body as they were in the beginning.

They believe that Christian union is not only desirable, but possible. To doubt its possibility would be not only to doubt the teaching of Christ and his apostles on this subject, but to deny what was true of the church in the beginning of the Christian era. They believe that all who are praying and laboring for the oneness of God's scattered people, are in line with the teaching of Christ and his holy apostles, and are doing a work that has for its ultimate object the salvation of the world.

In conclusion, this people, while they have, in this age of parties, to stand in the attitude of a party among parties, are less ambitious to build up a great party than to reach the end for which Christ died—the salvation of a lost world.

WAITED 30 YEARS

For the Proper Food.

A man who was a semi-invalid for 30 years got well in about a month when he found the right food. He says: "When I was 19 years of age I had a severe attack of typhoid fever and after almost starving to death I was left in a pitiable condition.

"My nervous system was so shattered that I had to walk with a cane for 6 months after I got on my feet, and my stomach was terribly distended. This was thirty years ago and since that time I have never known health, although I had tried doctor after doctor, until 6 months ago I saw an article about Grape-Nuts that impressed me so I thought I would try it.

"So I gave Grape-Nuts a trial, more as something to eat than with any idea it would help me. My improvement commenced immediately and has kept right up until now I have used 7 packages and I feel like another person. I am in better health than I have been since boyhood and am strong and contented. Grape-Nuts food helped me after everything else failed, and I look on this as an evidence of the great power of proper food." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

News From Many Fields

Nebraska.

E. M. Johnson reports two baptisms and one added by statement at Pleasant Hill Church on the 19th.

Six confessions at Avoca, where J. B. White preaches.

W. B. Harter is now on the field at Nebraska City. Began his work on July 19. This is a mission of the state society. We hope to establish it firmly.

Table Rock held its annual meeting in a grove near that place, on the 26th. C. C. Atwood has been laboring there as pastor for some months. The church has been repaired at an expense of $250. Sixty have been added to the church during his ministry, and he has added 40 at other places. It is a great pleasure to see the advance this church is making. Among other things, they have contributed liberally to missions, especially remembering the state work. There is a good field of work there.

W. W. Divine visited ten days in Nebraska at North Bend, Kearney and Lexington. We

*West Side Christian Church, San Francisco,

expect that as a result he will be located at Kearney. At Kearney there were fourteen added while he was there, six of them by confession and baptism. Brother Divine comes from a fine work at Rochester, Minn., and will be the representative of our state board at Kearney and vicinity.

The corresponding secretary met with the secretaries of Kansas, Missouri and Iowa at St. Joseph, Mo., on the 28th. This was a conference having under discussion the Detroit convention, and the various other matters relating to our several states. The day was profitably spent in the work, and it was agreed that such meetings should be held oftener, as our work lies so near together and is of the same general character. B. S. Denny, of Iowa; T. A. Abbot, of Missouri, and W. S. Lowe, of Kansas, with this secretary, made up the party. It was agreed, practically, to make the Wabash the official route from Chicago to Detroit, and to arrange to arrive there from the different states so as to get a special train from there. Apparently this can be done. The route from Nebraska to Chicago has not been determined. Announcement will be made as soon as possible.

The fact that the American Christian Missionary Society has only to make a gain of $5,000 during the time from now to the end of the financial year to make the receipts $100,000, stirs our blood. Let Nebraska churches make a special move at this time to rally the offerings. Some have not taken up this work. We have been beneficiaries of this great work, but in any event, we of Nebraska want to be in the front rank of supporters of our great missionary enterprises.

At this writing, all the signs are out for a great state convention. When this is read, we will know the value of the signs.

Washington.

The state convention chose J. T. Eshelman, of Tacoma, president, and J. M. Morris, of Walla Walla, corresponding secretary. Brother Morris was employed as state evangelist, and it is believed that the state work will accomplish something creditable this year. The board has employed L. F. Stephens and wife to evangelize in eastern Washington. Brother McConnell is continued in the field by the Whitman County co-operation, and besides, there will be some evangelistic work done by pastors.

The beloved A. McLean led his hearers out into the larger understanding of God's word on the subjects of missions and giving in the church of Christ.

W. M. Forrest interested the people of the convention in the Calcutta work. The entire convention program was good. The Seattle churches entertained in a royal manner. The time is fast approaching when our convention in Washington should entertain itself. It becomes a burden for the churches to entertain and we should fall in line with the states that are pushing to the front.

Mrs. Minnie G. Himes, state organizer for the C. W. B. M., is a woman of great ability, and is doing splendid work. Sister Himes was a member of the First Church, Tacoma, for some time, and was greatly loved by the church for her excellent work in every department of the church. She is well-known to the writer and cheerfully commended to the churches.

Elma Church has secured Brother Stair as pastor. He is well-liked and it is hoped that he may lead them into large success.

Some of the churches in Washington are taking a summer vacation, others are increasing their activities with the summer months. Summer meetings will be held by several of the churches. The writer has been asked to hold evangelistic services this summer, but the First Church keeps him busy.

The faithful little company of Christians at Chehalis are rejoicing over the assurance of missionary help this year. They are deserving and will succeed.

F. Elmo Robinson, who lately came to the coast from Lincoln, Neb., has become pastor of the church at The Dalles, Oregon. His friends in Washington wish him success.

Neal Cheetham, one of the best known men in the state, is now serving the church at Oakesdale and Rosalia, and in evidence of the good work being done a new house of worship will soon grace the town of Oakesdale.

Brother McConnell, evangelist of Whitman county, is proving himself the right man for that field. The work is prospering in that co operation.

A. J. Adams, late of California, has taken the work at Ballard, Washington, and has just closed a meeting with seventeen additions.

State Evangelist Morris has recently held a meeting at Green Lake (Seattle) and strengthened that new work. Brother Allen, pastor of the Freemont Church, will care for this mission.

Brother Peck has resigned at Sumner, and there is an effort being made to secure David Husband for that field. J. T. Eshelman, president of the state board, is supplying Sumner until a pastor is secured.

It is midsummer and we have had but one day that was uncomfortably warm, and that could not be termed hot as compared with weather in the midland. Puget Sound climate is about perfect, and people of the east are learning that there is no better place to visit for rest or recreation as well as for business opportunities than this rapidly developing state of Washington.

MORTON L. ROSE.

Southern Illinois.

Brother Dudley, of the Illinois College of Photography, supplies for Brother Hibner at Mason and Kinmundy during his vacation, which he is spending in Ohio.

Wilfred Fields spent Sunday, July 26, with the church at Ingraham. This church is without a pastor.

Brother Dudley, one of the instructors in the Illinois College of Photography, and E. B. Schooler, county superintendent of union Sunday-school work, were ordained as evangelists by W. T. Gordon and A. A. Hibner at the Christian Church recently.

The new church building at St. Elmo is nearing completion. The brethren are arranging for dedicatory services. Brother Thompson, of Clay City, is soliciting aid for this work, that they may be able to dedicate free from debt.

The writer hopes to spend a few days at Bethany Assembly.

Effingham, Ill.

D. R. BEBOUT.

New England.

Bro. J. H. Hardin, our New England evangelist, recently closed a five weeks' tent meeting for the Highland Street Church, Worcester, Mass. Three weeks of that period it rained almost every day, and at one time in the midst of a storm the tent was blown down, and for a few days the meetings were held in a hall. The number of additions were seven. Had the weather been more favorable, much greater results would have been manifest.

The Highland Street Church expects to pay the first installment, $1,500, upon the price of their lot in a few weeks, and hope to begin to build in the fall.

Dr. J. M. Van Horn, pastor of the First Church, Worcester, upon the unanimous request of the church, has reconsidered his resignation and has decided to remain. We rejoice at this action, for Brother Van Horn is an able preacher and an efficient teacher of the truth. His church is in splendid condition.

Bro. G. H. Brown, pastor at Bridgeport, Conn., a recent graduate of Yale Divinity School, was ordained in his home church, Danbury, Conn., June 25. Bro. J. H. Mohorter, of Boston, preached the ordination sermon; E. J. Teagarden, the pastor at Danbury, the charge; and Elder Cathermole read the statement. This makes the third preacher sent forth from Danbury in the last few years.

Bro. J. McD. Horne, a graduate of Eureka, 1903, has assumed the pastorate of the Brockton Mass., Church, and on July 19 preached his first sermon. A reception was tendered to him and his wife, July 21. A recognition service will be held early in September. Brother Horne has already made a good impression on the church and city.

R. F. Whiston, pastor of the Everett Church, is in New Hampshire on his vacation. E. J. Teagarden, of Danbury, is in camp in Connecticut. The pastor of the Springfield Church will spend August in Vermont. Bro. J. H. Mohorter, of Boston, will be in Nova Scotia during the same month. He is to address the annual meeting to be held at Pictou.

The wife of Bro. D. C. Tremaine, pastor at West Rupert, Vt., has been seriously ill, but is now convalescent.

The Mantion, Rhode Island Church, has called a new pastor from Indiana. He is said to be a strong preacher and the brethren are very hopeful for the future.

G. A. REINL, Cor. Sec. of N. E.

Arkansas.

During the last quarter the employees of the Arkansas Board of Missions reported 150 additions, of whom one-half were by baptism.

The writer has held meetings at DeQueen, Uniontown and other places, baptizing 18 and receiving 6 from other resources. At DeQueen an excellent lot has been purchased and a house costing about $2,500 will be built. This is one of the best towns on the Kansas City Southern railroad, and a very important place.

Uniontown is a very prosperous country village, and has an active church. It is a pleasure to work with them. Bro. J. Q. West, of Rudy, has preached for them for a long time.

The annual camp meeting at Mineral Springs is to begin to-night. It will be under the direction of J. C. Mason, of Texas, formerly of Arkansas, and much loved in this state. It will doubtless be a good meeting.

All reports from missionaries are encouraging. E. C. BROWNING.

Little Rock.

Dedication at New Franklin, Mo.

The new Christian Church at this place was dedicated July 26. Among the notable speakers present were Frank G. Tyrrell, president; J. B. Jones, Dr. D. R. Dungan and Hon. E. M. Richmond. The property including the adjacent parsonage is worth upwards of $10,000. The church numbers only about 180 members, many of whom are poor people, but they have given with remarkable liberality for the erection of this house of worship. The pastor, R. N. Lindsey, says that especial thanks are due to the people of the town who are not members of the church and to the employes of the M. K. & T. railroad for their generous assistance.

St. Louis News.

E. T. McFarland, pastor of the Fourth Church, will return from his vacation and be in his pulpit next Sunday.

Geo. L. Snively, secretary of the Benevolent Association, occupied the pulpit of Central Church Sunday morning, Aug. 2.

The C. W. B. M. auxiliary of Old Orchard church held an open meeting Sunday evening, Aug. 2. Mrs. L. G. Bantz, state secretary, delivered an address. Six new members were added to the auxiliary.

E. B. Redd, superintendent of the Masonic Orphans' Home, preached for the Mt. Cabanne Church Sunday evening, Aug. 2.

Will each reader please notice our offer to send the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for the remainder of the year to a new subscriber for only sixty cents, or to two new subscribers, reported at the same time, for only one dollar, and call the attention of their friends and neighbors to the offer?

The attendance at the newest of our Bible-schools (the Prairie Bible-school of the Hammett Place church) was twenty-five. Regular organized class work begins next Sunday. Prospects for a vigorous, healthy school are fine.

The Bible-school of the Old Orchard church, is in the midst of a contest between the "hustlers" and the "rustlers." The points in the contest are attendance, contribution and new pupils.

The funeral of Wm. J. Austin, an old and highly respected member of the Central church, was held at the residence of W. P. Larew, 1232 N. King's Highway, at 4 P. M., Sunday, Aug. 2.

In the absence from the city of the pastor of Central church, the funeral service was conducted by Samuel B. Moore, pastor of Hammett Place church.

The Junior Christian Endeavor Society of the Fourth Church sent this week $14.60 to Miss Mattie Pounds for the C. W. B. M. treasury, making a total of $41 sent to the C. W. B. M. since Jan. 1. The society has raised for all purposes in the same period, $51.74. Membership thirty-one.

Dedication at Gallagher, Ill.

We have about two dozen members, all sisters but about five, and all poor in this world's goods but rich in faith. They have just accomplished the astonishing feat of building a new church house near Gallagher (formerly called Franson), which will compare favorably with country church houses generally speaking. They first organized in 1855 with ten members. They grew and multiplied until at one time they numbered about 80, but they never could stand together and build a house of worship, but met in schoolhouses, sometimes prospering and sometimes fading entirely away. After awhile some of the old members moved away and some died and the candlestick seemed to be entirely removed for ten years. Not a preacher straggled through the neighborhood to remind them of the religion of their fathers. In 1901 they called for preachers to come to their rescue and a little band was gathered, a Sunday-school was organized and the Lord's day services inaugurated. Through many toils and struggles they completed their house, leaving an indebtedness of about one hundred and fifteen dollars. Last Sunday, July 26, was dedication day. The little band of brethren and sisters had prepared refreshments and everybody seemed happy. The writer did the preaching and pleading until we raised one hundred and twenty dollars in cash. The house was then dedicated free from debt with solemn services followed with the Lord's supper and Christian greeting and rejoicing. G. W. TATE.

Missouri Bible-School Notes.

In taking your summer reading with you, do not neglect some of the good books on methods in Bible-school work; they will keep you in touch with your work and will the better qualify you for it when you return this fall. Try it, and them.

The campaign work goes right along with orders for buttons and cards, though one brother preacher writes, "Do not think much of your button business." Course not, for this button business means work, and only workers will succeed at it.

T. J. Head is one of the men to tackle work like Winona and to succeed in it, so that none are surprised at the good results reported from that work.

The congregation has virtually disorganized, the Bible-school is non est and the house is locked up at Doe Run, but T. J. Head hopes to do such work as will revive all departments of the work and enlist such talent as will again take up the cause of God.

It was a pleasure to be with the London school, though in the absence of J. B. Corwine, called to Montana in the interest of health. The school and church as usual gave me hearty co-operation, while the Juniors, under Mrs. Judge Roy, gave me manifestation of what can be done when one wills. The young people had nearly one hundred dollars of their earnings on hand and gave it to the work of Christ in several departments, Mrs. Roy very wisely advising and the children I judge as readily doing. Few kinder people in Missouri than New London congregation.

While our force does not make money the text, yet, one's giving does somewhat attest our appreciation of that which is done for us, so that W. A. Moore should feel proud that his brethren of the northwest district gave him this last month more than his salary, and rates are made for much of August now. While his address will more than likely be at St. Joseph, yet a letter to him at Clarinda, Ia., where the good wife is with her mother, will catch him quick. Every one living west of the C. B. & K. C., and south of Iowa, and north of the Missouri river, and east of Kansas, wanting his help, write him direct, and the sooner the better.

Six years O. A. Ishmael has been at Drexel, and the school and church have grown steadily every year. They began giving us five dollars then, now they are way beyond that, so of all offerings, taking part as they do in everything. They are always anxious for the best, hence my three visits in four years, and they gladly try to follow as the minister leads, so that if the choir is handled easily, and some of you know what this means. Hot as was last Sunday, we met at 9:30 and closed in the evening at 9:45, with good audiences and attention all day. Drexel is an exception, in that they take the best of literature and plenty of it, have the best of song books and plenty of them, do everything first-class or not at all, hence is one of the growing congregations, schools and endeavors, and O. A. Ishmael should be proud of them and what they do and give for Christ.

The Jackson county meeting was a great success just because a man worked it. Held at Hickman Mills, with a goodly delegation from other congregations, the kindest and cheeriest of hospitality, the fullest co-operation and sweetest of fellowship, it is not surprising that all called for another. L. J. Marshall did the planning, and all called upon sought to faithfully execute, so good was done. H. F. DAVIS.

SAUL TRIES TO KILL DAVID —
1 Sam. 18:5-16.

Study Chapter 18.

Memory Verses: 12-14.

Golden Text: God is our refuge and strength; a very present help in trouble.—Psa. 46:1.

Saul's Inquiry.

Goliath was dead. David had slain him when no champion could be found in all the army of Israel. The Philistines had fled. Israel was rejoicing in a signal victory which delivered them for the time from their most dangerous foe without costing them a single life. Naturally all eyes were turned upon the young hero who had done this deed of valor in such an original way. Even Saul had not taken time to make any inquiry about David before the fight. The account here ignores the previous acquaintance between Saul and David, reported in 16:21-23. Or perhaps those verses indicate a less intimate relationship than a casual reading of the narrative would suggest. Or perhaps there had been an interval of two or three years during which David had ceased to be an attendant and had been forgotten by Saul, whose mental derangement might the more easily account for this lapse of memory. It is definitely stated, however, (17:15), that at the time of the Philistine invasion David was still spending part of his time at Saul's court. At any rate it was after the fight with Goliath that Saul comes to know David as a man of war and a rival in the esteem of the people.

A Young Man's Friendship.

Jonathan's love for David dated from the same time as Saul's hatred. Jonathan saw in him the hero, the man of courage and strength and faith in God; he was touched by that winsomeness of nature which must have been characteristic of the young poet-warrior and which so promptly won the affection of the people. Saul saw the same qualities, but to him they were odious. David's courage made him a dangerous enemy; his growing popularity suggested only the possibility of a popular uprising in his favor; his faith in God was in striking contrast with that departure of the Spirit from Saul, of which Saul himself must have been keenly and regretfully conscious in his saner moments. So do men reveal themselves in their judgments upon their contemporaries. Saul showed himself base, suspicious, treacherous, self-centered, at last even cowardly, in his attitude toward David. But that same David gave Jonathan occasion to exhibit the qualities of fidelity, unselfishness and nobility of character and to immortalize himself in the annals of the master-passion of Friendship.

A Young Man's Advancement.

To David, as to most men, promotion came as the sequel to achievement—not simply the victory over Goliath, but the prudence and wisdom of his subsequent conduct (18:5 first part of the verse.) To kill a giant is only half a proof of manhood. The other half is in a wise and modest demeanor afterward. Not every man who has won a great victory on the field of battle or in the conflicts of business or even in the arena of moral and spiritual struggle, deserves to have it said of him that after his triumph he "behaved himself wisely." But David did. No wonder he was promoted and set over the men of war and that his advancement was approved by all the people. He had won it both by his victory in the battle and by his still greater victory after the battle.

The Seeds of Jealousy.

Now follows the story of a little episode which took place as the army was returning from pursuing the Philistines. They passed, as in a triumphal procession, through the cities of Israel, and the women came out to dance and sing in joy as Miriam had danced before Jehovah when Pharaoh's host was overthrown in the Red Sea. Only now the praise was given not to Jehovah, but to the men of war. Perhaps this was one of the evil effects which Samuel feared from the establishment of the monarchy. Compare Miriam's song (Ex. 15:21):

"Sing ye to Jehovah,
He hath triumphed gloriously;
The horse and his rider
Hath he thrown into the sea," with this song of the daughters of Israel in the days of Saul (1 Sam. 18:7):

"Saul hath slain his thousands And David his tens of thousands."

It is always the case that the seeds of discord are sown when people forget God's part in the success of any enterprise and begin to apportion out all the credit among the men who were instrumental in it. There would have been no trouble if the women of Israel (and the men, too) had ascribed the honor to Jehovah, but when they gave it to David, Saul's wrath was stirred, his vanity was touched and his jealousy aroused. He forgot Israel's deliverance. That was of little consequence to him now compared with the threatened weakening of his own prestige. The kingship had become to him not a means of serving God and the nation, but a prize and a prerogative to be clutched and kept for his own sake.

A Murderous Attempt.

From jealousy to hatred and from hatred to murder are short steps. First Saul "eyed David" sullenly and jealously. Then the evil spirit came upon Saul; he had prepared himself for its coming and opened the door to it by his demeanor. And under the influence of this spirit, which he himself had unconsciously invoked, Saul raved. But he was not so mad but that he could plan for the accomplishment of his desires. He was responsible for what he did, just as we are responsible for what we do when we allow the spirit of evil to have dominion over us. Even while he raved he was deliberately planning the murder of David.

"An evil spirit from God"—does God then send evil spirits to trouble men and to corrupt them? No. But the moral universe is God's universe and its laws are his laws, just as the laws of the physical world are his laws. When the operation of one of these physical laws brings calamity we may in a sense say that it is a visitation from God, but this will not relieve the individual of responsibility if he invited the calamity by disregarding the physical law. It is so in the sphere of moral law. Saul had invited evil influence to come into his heart. He had allowed hatred and selfishness and jealousy to be at home in his soul. It is God's law that a man who wants these for his companions shall have them. In this sense Saul's evil spirit was sent from God. In addition to this, it should be noted that at that period there was a tendency to regard the phenomena of insanity and all forms of mental aberration as direct results of divine or demoniacal influence. Thus when it is said that Saul "raved," the word will also bear the translation "prophesied."

A King's Cowardice.

Saul, with all his faults, had been a brave man. But hatred and jealousy undermined his courage. He feared the man he hated. It is almost impossible not to do so. It is quite impossible not to fear a man of whom one is jealous. So Saul, by indulging these weak and wicked passions, sacrificed his last kingly quality. A king without courage is ripe for his fall. What a transformation of character, what a loss of the old force and confidence, is indicated by these words, "And Saul was afraid of David." He had no reason to expect personal violence, but he could not endure the presence of David's stronger and purer personality. So he sent David on active service with the army. But this had the result which Saul least desired; it brought David much before the public eye and increased his popularity. And through all these delicate and embarrassing circumstances David still "behaved himself very wisely."

Copper Cures Consumption.

When Doctoring and Travel Fail, There is Still Hope In That Greatest Remedy of Modern Times, Antidotum Tuberculose—The Home Cure for Consumption. Large Trial Treatment FREE. Write NOW.

One-sixth of the people who die every year, die of Consumption. This fact has furnished the problem with which medical men have been wrestling for ages.

O. K. BUCKHOUT,
Chairman Kalamazoo Tuberculosis Remedy Co., Ltd.,
Member of National Association for the Prevention of Consumption.
Great physicians have been forced to stand idly by, powerless to save their own loved ones. From every side has come the pitiful cry from the afflicted and those about to be bereft: "Is there no cure?" National societies have been formed for the study of this vital question. Most important among these is the National Association for the Prevention of Consumption, of which H.R.H., the Prince of Wales, is President, Lord Leicester, Vice-president, and His Majesty, King Edward, of England, Honorary President. And when O. K. Buckhout, a member of this honorable body, announces to the world in general that an actual cure for Consumption has at last been found in Antidotum Tuberculose, and when he further shows his faith by becoming identified with the company as its Chairman, it would seem proof indeed of its merits. Antidotum Tuberculose, the new and marvelous treatment is different from all others—cures where others fail. It exterminates the deadly Consumption germ, gives new life and strength. If you suffer from Consumption or fear that the disease is gaining a hold on you, write at once to the Kalamazoo Tuberculosis Remedy Co., Ltd., 1221 Main St., Kalamazoo, Mich., for the large free trial treatment. Sent prepaid.

The Last Resort.

The lowest and meanest project which Saul ever adopted to rid himself of David was the treacherous offer of his daughter in marriage. First he promised his eldest daughter on condition that he would be valiant in battle, hoping to entice him into certain death on the field. But David came through all his battles untouched, and the king broke his promise and gave his daughter to another man. Then again he promised David his younger daughter, Michal, if he would kill a hundred Philistines. Surely he would never return from this perilous expedition! But back he came, and the king was compelled to make good his promise.

David was now the king's son-in-law as well as his anointed successor, but Saul's hatred waxed fat on its failures, and the more his plots against David went wrong the more he hated and feared him. But in the midst of all these thickening complications, the historian tells us again a third time that "David behaved himself more wisely than all the servants of Saul."

LESSONS FROM PAUL. III.

1 Cor. 9:19,23.

Paul's whole life was a series of illustrations of the adaption of methods to work. There were literalists and legalists in Paul's time who thought it more important that the ceremonies of religion should be performed in their way, than that sinners should be converted, saints comforted and all built up in Christian character. In the eyes of these who laid more emphasis upon ecclesiastical precedents and established orders and methods of working than upon the accomplishment of the work, Paul's conduct was a constant scandal. The flexibility of his methods and the adaptability of his message were looked upon as dangerous compromises. But he was proud of them for they were the means by which he was able to get close to men and save them.

"I am become all things to all men," said Paul. To say that meant, first, that he had surrendered all opinionated conceits which would require all men to become like him in temperament and point of view. We lose much time and strength in trying to bring men to agreement with us on a thousand inconsequential points before undertaking to give them the real and essential truth which we have for them. No impenitent and impertinent sinner, I fancy, would have been able to draw Paul into a controversy on points of ritual or casuistry or fine-spun theology. Paul would have said: "Have your own way about that; whatever you say suits me; but let me tell you about Jesus Christ."

Let us learn from Paul to attend to the first things first, and while we are doing that many of the minor difficulties will vanish before we get to them. Paul became as under the law to those under the law, and as without law to those without law. We would have said, "No, no, that is an issue which must be squarely faced." And we would have prided ourselves on our boldness in alienating half of our hearers while siding with the other half. But that question about the law simply vanished. It was not so much settled as outgrown. That is the way most of the great disputes in the church have issued, and the application of this principle will go far toward preparing the churches for re-union.

But Paul's "all things to all men" meant also a sacrifice of personal comfort, taste and safety. It meant a supreme devotion to the gospel or—what amounts to the same thing—a supreme devotion to men and a conviction that the great need of men is the gospel. Everything that could interfere with that devotion was set aside. He wanted results. He was not looking for excuses. It would have afforded him no satisfaction to say: "Such-and-such a man is lost, but I am not responsible for it." The overwhelming fact was that the man was LOST. Love never stops to talk about responsibility. A mother who sees her child drowning does not halt to consider whether she will be guilty of murder if she lets it drown. She plunges in at any hazard.

And so, says Paul, "though I was free, I brought myself under bondage to all." That is, he surrenders the liberty of doing as he pleases and voluntarily binds himself to do whatever will be most effective in saving men.

Such devotion is what the church needs today. If Christian people will cease to seek excuses for inaction and will begin to hunt opportunities for action, if they will yield their opinions while holding firm to Christ, if they will fling themselves into the work with the ardent devotion and the calm wisdom of the great apostle, there will be a quick and glorious victory.

THE GREAT TEACHER.—HIS FRESHNESS.

—LUKE 4:16-22. MATT. 18:1-4 13:1-9.

The place of the teacher is an honored one. To teach is to cause to know. No higher task can be performed for the race than to cause it to know the truth respecting life, death and immortality. But the various topics of religion had been taught long before Jesus came into the world. The Jews especially had listened for many years to their prophets and teachers. How is it, that Jesus' coming marks a new departure?

He came, to be sure, speaking with authority. But he spoke also with great acceptance, and with marvelous power. No one can study the teachings of Jesus, and not be impressed with their remarkable freshness. He did not repeat the wise saws of the ancients. Whenever he touched a familiar truth, he vitalized it. The scribes taught, as if they were handling mummies; Jesus taught as one who deals with living souls.

No doubt the power of his teaching lies in its originality. There was nothing stale, flat, and unprofitable. The incidents referred to in our lesson illustrate the genius of this great Teacher. In what does his remarkable freshness lie?

1. Simplicity. In the first place, there was an illuminating simplicity about all his utterances. His countrymen had heard teachers who exhausted time and patience in elaborate speculations. They spoke of things trivial and insignificant, in terms at once recondite and obscure. Jesus abandoned the methods of the schoolmen; he never dealt in circumlocutions; he never spoke as if the truth were something far removed from human comprehension.

2. Courage. His courage contributed as much to the strength and freshness of his teaching as the simplicity with which he uttered it. He was outspoken. He would not tolerate shams and hypocrisies. He did not stand weak and apologetic, before existing evils. He denounced them and unmasked the evil doers. He was, in the estimation of the Pharisees, a dangerous iconoclast. The man of courage, if he is wise, will be a disturber. In a country in which fraud and charlatanry had been long triumphant, the teachings of Jesus, boldly challenging and grappling all insincerity and pretense, were singularly fresh and sweet and life-giving.

3. Directness. There was a directness about the sayings of Jesus which had all the charm of novelty. The people felt that when he spoke, he addressed them. He presented truth as something tangible, specific. It had vitality; it seized hold of Zaccheus the publican and Nicodemus the Pharisee, and Mary Magdalene. There could be no successful dodging when Jesus spoke.

4. Use of Illustration. He made abundant use of all natural objects. He understood perfectly the value of object lessons, before the first pedagogue had ever used the phrase. The sparrow, the fox, the reed, salt, light, heat, bread, water—the most familiar objects are grouped in his teachings, and made to impart or enforce the truth he wished to impart. Again, in the use of parables he introduced an element of novelty and energy. His parables caught the attention of the crowds, and sent them away thinking. The world never tires of the story-teller. Jesus used incident and allegory to convey the deepest truths of the kingdom. Doubtless there were times when the parable was a safer method of imparting the truth than direct statement would have been. And we may well believe that in every instance it was stronger.

The freshness of Jesus' teaching would never have been remarked, had he not himself perceived the truth with extraordinary clearness. His knowledge was intuitive. He saw into the depths of the human heart, and into the wisdom of the ages.

Prayer.

Open our eyes, O God, to see truth as Jesus saw it; to feel its power; to obey it. Make us teachers of the doctrine which enlightens and saves, for his name's sake. Amen.

A Fascinating Book

By a California Endeavorer

"A Christian Endeavorer's Working Journey Around the World," by J. F. Anderson, is a unique contribution to the literature of travel. I had the good fortune to make this journey with Mr. Anderson, though I remained in my home in California. He started from my home and returned to my home, and all through the five years he wrote to me frequently. Nevertheless his book is a surprise to me. He saw the world with eyes peculiarly his own. He mingled with people not often seen by tourists. The book is fascinating. It is full of information and inspiration. Mr. Anderson is a Christian Endeavorer with the emphasis on both words. I know of no better book to put into the hands of a boy, or any one, who needs to have the word impossible taken from his vocabulary.

Very sincerely,

FRANK M. DOWLING.

This is the book which Congressman Champ Clark, of Missouri, calls "the most interesting book of travels published since Mark Twain wrote 'Innocents Abroad.'"

It's a good book to carry with you on a journey, and a good book to read at home if you can't go on a journey just now.

Our Budget

—Greetings to our brethren on the Pacific Coast.

—In this, our Pacific Coast number, will be found much that relates to the progress of our cause on the coast which will be of interest to the entire brotherhood.

—The Pacific Coast is destined to hold a most important place in the commercial development of the nation, owing to our new influence on the Pacific, and there is no reason why it should not also be regarded as of great strategic value in the missionary conquest of the world.

—We have just learned from a letter received from one of the brethren in California that the state convention at Santa Cruz has "unanimously endorsed" the report of the board of trustees of Berkeley Bible Seminary and its findings, and have thus disposed of the case. This was to have been expected, of course. The brethren of California may be relied upon to follow the lead of such men as those who signed the report of the investigation of certain charges against the dean of that institution.

—De Loss Smith is assisting W. B. Taylor in a meeting at Belding, Mich.

—Last week the foreign society received a gift of $1,050 on the annuity plan.

—Brother Baxter Waters and wife, of Hia-watha, Kans., are spending a month's vacation at Canton, Mo.

—B. F. Goslin, of Hinton, Mo., has organized a Bible-school at Old Perche church, near Rucker, Mo., with fifty pupils.

—Thos. Martin has accepted a call to the church at Sandy Lake, Pa., and changes his address to that place from Roseville, Ohio.

—G. A. Hess, of Charles City, Ia., reports Sunday-school growing under the red and blue contest. Two additions by statement recently.

—Cephas Shelburne and family, of Huntington, Ind., are spending the month of August at Bass Lake, Indiana. This will no doubt be hard on the bass.

—Geo. A. Ragan, state evangelist, is holding a tent meeting at Byesville, O., which will result in the organization of a church with from sixty to one hundred members.

—The receipts for foreign missions for the first ten months of the current missionary year amounted to $169,186.42, or a gain over the corresponding time last year of $20,759.24.

—A successful county meeting at Ashland, Mo., closed July 31. Crayton Brooks, of Jefferson City, A. W. Kokendoffer, of Mexico, and H. F. Davis, of St. Louis, assisted in the meeting.

—J. Murray Taylor, of Madison, Ind., preached Lord's day, July 19, for Bro. S. M. Barnard at Boulder, Col., who, he says, "has a fine work in that beautiful city and is deservedly popular."

—Our pastors should not fail to promptly order their supplies for the church extension offering so that they can be promptly mailed to your church. Write to G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec. Kansas City, Mo.

—Bro. J. M. Rudy and wife were made the recipients of a beautiful piece of Roycroft furniture, a handsome magazine holder, at a recent meeting of the Jefferson St. Church, Buffalo, which they very much appreciate.

—A. Lyle De Jarnette has resigned his pastorate of three years at Stuart, Iowa. During the three years there have been 156 additions to the church. Last year from Sept. 1, 1902, $400 has been raised on church indebtedness.

—Homer T. Wilson has charge of the Chautauqua of that place and is making it quite a success. Brother Taylor writes that the church at Madison continues to prosper, the audiences holding up well during the summer season.

IF there is an impression in the minds of any that Mixtures of White Lead and Zinc are better than Pure White Lead, it has been created by the manufacturers of the Mixtures, because a much larger profit can be made from the sale of these than by grinding and selling either White Lead or Zinc pure.

If interested in paint or painting, address

National Lead Co., Clark Ave. and Tenth Street, St. Louis.

—D. F. Fillmore, pastor of the church at Gillespie, Ill., reports the burning of the mortgage there July 26, which entirely obliterated the church debt. We are glad to learn of these destructive fires. Let the good work go on.

—A preachers' number of Business in Christianity was mailed to all our preachers on the 1st of August, full of material for church extension sermons. It should be well read and thoroughly digested and kept warm until the first Sunday of September.

—W. B. Crewdson has just closed a three years' pastorate with the church at Council Bluffs, Ia., to accept the work at Atlantic. On last Lord's day there were three confessions and one by letter. He asks the prayers of the brethren in his new field.

—R. H. Crossfield, the popular pastor of the church at Owensboro, Ky., gave this office a pleasant call recently on his return from a Chautauqua at Clinton, Mo., where he was on duty. The church at Owensboro is erecting one of the handsomest churches of the place.

—P. C. McFarlane, pastor of the church at Alameda, Cal., writes that he is "home for the Sunday from Santa Cruz, where we are having one of the greatest conventions as regards attendance and merit of program in our history. A beautiful spirit of harmony prevails."

—Wanted at once, a home for a pair of twin boys, 18 months old, blue eyes and light hair; would rather not separate them. Also an unusually pretty and nice baby girl, about six months old. Apply to Mothers' and Babies' Home of the Christian Church, 2825 Lawton Ave., St. Louis, Mo.

—We notice that the treasury of Religious Thought contains a picture of Bro. M. E. Harland, of Brooklyn, together with a sermon by him on "The Authority for and the Significance of the Communion Service," together with editorial mention of "First Church of Christ, Brooklyn, N. Y."

—Guy Hoover has accepted the pastorate of the First Christian Church at Chicago, and is entering upon his work there with vigor and earnestness. The assistant editor had the privilege of attending service there last Sunday, and was pleased to note the evidences of increasing interest.

—In June and July the Board of Church Extension paid out $28,000 to help 19 churches complete their first church home or buy the ground on which to put their first chapel. Nearly $16,000 was paid out in the month of July. Besides this, in July, there are appeals for $19,000 already in. Churches that hope to get housed before the winter, are putting in their appeals now because of their hope in the September offering.

—The new churchhouse at Marlin was dedicated July 26 by Chalmers McPherson. Four hundred dollars was asked for to seat the house, and more than this was raised. This is another needy and important field which now has the cause well started.

CALBY D. HALL, minister.

Marlin, Tex.

—G. L. Applegate, Marion, Ia., has changed his address from Red Cloud, Neb., to the former place, and solicits correspondence with the churches desiring a regular pastor or supply or someone to hold a protracted meeting, in which he has had much experience. Weak churches and destitute places can be accommodated by addressing him as above.

—Miss Hester Bowman, of Perry, Ia., desires a place with some church as choir leader and soloist, or with an evangelist as singer. Brother Chas. Blanchard, of Wapello, Ia., writes, "She is a most charming soloist naturally, with a winning smile and a gracious manner. She is truly gifted, gracious, winsome and worthy."

—The fifteenth annual convention of the churches in southern California and Arizona at Long Beach, Aug. 6-16, is well announced and advertised and illustrated in a pamphlet program which has been issued. It promises to be a great occasion of interest to the brotherhood on that part of the coast, and we wish it the greatest success.

—Geo. E. Gilmore, of Hennessey, Okla., writes that Mrs. Clara H. Hazelrigg, of Topeka, Kan., and her daughter have been down through the territory on a lecture tour, and that the Hennessey church secured them for one evening for the lecture recital, "The Seven Ages of Man," which proved to be a fine evening's entertainment.

—Will the preachers please give attention to filling out the postal card which was mailed to them early in July by the Board of Church Extension? Encourage the board by promising to take the collection, even if you do not order supplies. After all, what we mean by encouraging the board is, encourage the mission churches that are applying for loans.

—Many gifts should go to the board of church extension now on the annuity plan. This is their season of gathering money. Annuity money in the church extension fund is loaned out to help churches that cannot be aided with the regular four per cent fund, and congregations that cannot get money elsewhere, or except at a high rate, are glad to get annuity money at six per cent. Write to G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., Kansas City, Mo., concerning that fund or send money directly to him, and you will at once receive the annuity bond.

—Walter Cline, of Canon City, Colo., asks us to announce that H. C. Patterson is down with the typhoid fever at that place, and that all correspondence will be answered as soon as possible. Brother Patterson conducted a tent meeting there one week and had eighty additions before becoming ill. His many friends will pray for his speedy recovery.

—"The child is the hope of the church. Do your best to bring him to Christ and train him for service," was the message of the morning sermon of Fred Kline, pastor in Ravenna, Ohio, July 26. That was the first Lord's day after the supper celebrating the close of the Red and the Blue contest in the Ravenna Sunday-school.—MRS. NEIL McLEOD.

—Every consideration demands that the preachers and churches give immediate and ample preparation to the forthcoming September offering for church extension. The month of August is warm, but the plea of the newly organized mission church, that wants to house itself before the winter, and needs the help of the Church Extension Society, is still warmer.

—The Belton (Texas) Evening News announces that the Christian church of that place has employed the services of Elder G. W. Lee for his whole time. He has been serving the church for several months past very acceptably and successfully for half of his time. The News congratulates the congregation upon "securing the services of so able and zealous a pastor."

—Jas. W. Zachary writes that his work as supply minister of the Walnut St. Church of Christ, Chattanooga, Tenn., has just closed on the return of Bro. Frank L. Adams, the regular minister. He writes, "This is an interesting church and a lovely city made up of kind, generous-hearted people. There is need of two more faithful preachers in this town, a 'middle of the road man' will suit the field best."

—H. O. Breeden, Jno. B. White and Joel Brown have been appointed a committee to devise ways and means for increasing the endowment of Drake University; $1,000,000 for 1909. The committee has sent out a circular making a strong appeal to the friends of Christian education, asking their co-operation in this work. All communications should be addressed to Joel Brown, Drake University, Des Moines, Ia.

—The secretary of church extension writes us that from 25 to 50 postal cards are coming to the office in Kansas City each day, promising to take the offering and ordering supplies. If this rate is kept up for another month, there will be two thousand contributing churches in September. This is an encouraging indication. Over five hundred churches have agreed to take the offering, and have ordered their supplies during the first two weeks.

—To show how well the church extension plan is succeeding, the board at Kansas City sends us the word that during the first ten months of the missionary year, to July 31, nearly $53,000 of loans and interest has been paid back by the mission churches who have had money from this fund to complete their buildings. The idea of the church in founding this fund was that the money should repeatedly do its work. Surely our founder's hopes are being realized.

—Last week the Board of Church Extension received its 86th gift on the annuity plan from a friend in Nebraska. The amount was $200. This makes $2,700 that this friend has put into the annuity fund of the Board of Church Extension. Remember that the mission churches that the board cannot help with the four per cent money, are glad to get annuity money at six per cent. Inquire of G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., Kansas City, Mo., concerning the annuity plan.

—The following announcement will be of interest to many of our readers: "The basement story of the new building of Christian University is now about completed, and the corner-stone will be laid on Aug. 10, at 10 o'clock in the morning. The ceremony will be in charge of the Grand Lodge of Masons, and the principal address will be delivered by the grand master of the state of Missouri.

"All interested in our educational enterprises are invited to be with us on that occasion.

"With kindest regards, I am,

"Yours respectfully,

"CARL JOHANN."

—The Missouri Bible College of Columbia has issued its annual announcement and catalogue for 1903-4 in which the courses of study are outlined and all necessary information given. Those who wish the information should address Dean W. J. Lhamon, Columbia. Among other statements the dean announces that the Missouri Bible College is not an "annex" of the University of Missouri, having no official connection with it, nor is it a "Bible Chair," as the Bible chair work is only incidental. The institution has for its object to give thorough training to young men who are preparing themselves for the ministry, as well as to impart Bible instructions to others engaged in other callings, but who desire a practical knowledge of the Bible.

—Brother Meade E. Dutt, pastor of the Christian church, Girard, Ill., writes that Bro. Ashley S. Johnson, of Kimberlin Heights, Tenn., has been with them a week and that his coming has been a blessing to the church. Brother Dutt has been granted a vacation which he will spend at Macatawa, and with parents further up in Michigan. He writes: "We have contracted for a splendid lyceum course to be given in the church. F. M. Rains will be with us all day Sunday, Oct. 3. The Macoupin-Montgomery county co-operation holds its annual convention with us Oct. 2."

—The convention of Montgomery county churches will be held at Price's Branch, Aug. 10-12. An unusually attractive program is prepared and includes lectures and sermons by Dr. W. T. Moore, A. W. Kokendoffer and W. J. Lhamon, M. A. Usitor, who are offered free entertainment, are informed that transportation from New Florence will be provided on receipt of postal to ELDER G. F. ASSITER.

Wellsville, Mo. July 29.

—Writing from Santa Cruz, Cal., under date of July 26, Judge Derham says: "The convention is at high tide sure enough. The crowd the largest we have ever had, every building in the park is full. The tented field has filled the eucalyptus grove, which perfumes the sweet scented air of the ocean. And the soldiers of the cross are not in camp for drill especially, nor do they sleep on duty. Songs of praise, joy and gladness fill the air, and the grand old Pacific joins in the echo with the refrain. The best of harmony and sweetest of spirit prevail. Borselly's comet has not effected the California spirit nor the tide in the affairs of the Christian workers, who say another grand year for Christ and the church. We see the comet, but it seems to be going for the 'great bear.' It may effect things in the upper air, but it is too distant and has too much tail to affect the spirit of 'go' that pervades the hearts, lives and pushing spirit of the Christians of California. Brother McLean feels like this is the Mount of Transfiguration and wants to build a booth and stay. Brother Mathews, formerly editor of our paper, now of the high schools of Washington, D. C., is thrice happy among his old brethren for his ticket limit. Sister Hopson is filled with enjoyment. Sister Till, just from the Garrison home in St. Louis, gave the Durhams a happy greeting; so delightful."

Santa Cruz, Cal.

Reception to Brother and Sister Frank Garrett.

Sunday, August 2, has been a great day for the Church of Christ at De Soto, Ia. On July 27, Bro. Frank Garrett and family arrived at this, their old home, after seven years of missionary work in China.

Bro. W. W. Williamson, pastor of the church here, arranged for the services of to day to be in their honor. The impressive communion service at 11 A. M. was conducted by Bro. A.

De Soto, Ia., Aug. 2, 1903.

A Pioneer in California.

Among the most useful and able of our pioneers on the Pacific coast was G. O. Burnett, whose picture appears on another page. He was born near Nashville, Tennessee, Nov. 16, 1809, and died at Santa Rosa, California, July 7, 1886. He was married January 6, 1830 to Sarah M., the daughter of Col. Peter Rogers, of Hardeman county, Tennessee. He and his wife lived together in happy companionship for more than 56 years. His early married life was spent in Missouri whence he emigrated to Oregon in 1846. He came to California in 1853 where he lived until his death with the exception of a few years spent in Oregon. A short time after his arrival there in 1846 he preached his first sermon, probably the first ever preached in that territory by a minister of the Christian church. This was but the beginning of a service in the spiritual interests of the settlers upon this coast that went on with unabated zeal until he received the summons "to lay down the cross to take up the crown."

"Uncle Glenn," as he was familiarly called was a faithful friend, a public spirited citizen, a kind hearted man, an earnest and forceful preacher and a devoted, consecrated follower of our divine Lord and Master.

Correspondence

The First Graduating Class of Bethany College.

Brother Power's account of "the sixty-second annual commencement of Bethany College" in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of July 2nd, inst., has evoked from my misty past many precious memories, both sweet and sad. Prominent in that wierd procession is the dramatis personae of the first graduating class of that noble institution, and it occurred to me that it would be well to put on record a few notes concerning that batch of its first fruits ere the gathering twilight gloom thickens into night about its only living representative.

After several years of preliminary study at Houston Seminary, situated about one mile from Paris, Kentucky, on the turnpike leading to Lexington, and conducted by Mr. Luther Smith, it was thought that my step-brother and I were prepared to enter the freshman grade of college. That was in the far-away fall of 1841. In the latter part of October of that year, my step-father, W. S. Bryan, escorted his own son, Robert, and me by stage to Maysville, on the Ohio river. That was the first stage of our journey toward Bethany College, to begin with its beginning our college career. On reaching Maysville we went aboard an up river steamboat, and were booked for Wellsburg, Va.

Just here I must record an incident which most important and tragic events in the after history of our country make eminently worthy of record. On going aboard that boat, my step-father was agreeably surprised at finding an acquaintance—a man in the prime of young manhood—tall, handsome, and a model of grace and courtesy. He was a native of Kentucky, but his home was then in Mississippi. He had Kentucky relatives in Bourbon county whom he sometimes visited in the summer season. It was on the occasion of some one of those visits that my step-father made his acquaintance. That young man was also bound for Bethany, and had in charge a nephew, Jedidiah (Jed) Smith, whom he intended to place in Bethany College. Jed was a diminutive, dressy, fiery youth with raven black, curly hair, and withal, jovial and generous, but not made of hard study stuff. My step-brother and I were placed under the guardianship of the young Mississippian. Who, do you guess, was that graceful young southern planter? Mention the name of the man who was the chief head and front of southern offending in our late civil war. Jefferson Davis, you say. Yes, Jefferson Davis it was on that steamboat. How little did that young man then dream of the tragic career that awaited him "in the course of human events!" I remember very little about that "child of destiny" on the boat, and, as a boy on his first legs away from home and passing through novel scenes, I suppose I cared less. I know that we all reached Bethany in due time, and that Jed and Bob and John, with many others, were as duly matriculated—a word of ponderous meaning to my imagination. I remember, too, that Jefferson Davis remained at Bethany for several days, and that he was said to be a warm admirer of Mr. Campbell and sympathized with the grand religious enterprise that Mr. Campbell had in charge. The news of General Lee's surrender found him on the other side of the sea of blood and seated in St. Paul's Episcopal Church, corner of Ninth and Grace Streets, Richmond, Va. His remains lie entombed in Richmond's beautiful Hollywood Cemetery, there to await the last roll call when the Son of God shall summon on dress parade before his judgment seat the innumerable armies that lie encamped on the field of death.

But, back to Bethany, you say. Back to Bethany we will go; back on the wings of that something that we call thought, so swift, so viewless, so noiseless, so mysterious, and withal, so mighty—back to those halcyon days of tip-toe youth.

The faculty at that opening session of Bethany College consisted of the following persons: A. Campbell, president and biblical lecturer; A. Ross, professor of Latin and Greek; R. Richardson, professor of chemistry; W. K. Pendleton, professor of natural philosophy; Charles Stuart, professor of mathematics. The first business of that board of learned inquisitors was the inspection of the mass of crude material there gathered, and that with a view to its proper classification—a jagged task. It was finally done, after a fashion, our several text books procured, opened and looked at, and the college machinery set in motion.

It is not my purpose to deal with the rough and tumble task that the faculty had in hand in dealing with that undisciplined, mischief-making, toe-pulling, bomb-exploding mass of young America. Nor do I propose to deal with the antics, individually or collectively, of that first graduating class. What I wish specially to say now is that when sufficient time had elapsed to enable us to see the adjustment of things and for "birds of a feather to flock together," it was found by four boys from the blessed blue grass region of Kentucky that they were classed together in all the college departments, and that they were decidedly inclined to be chummy. Of course, there were many others in our classes, but they were not admitted fully to the sanctum sanctorum of "our set."

As the months and years went on, the ranks of our classes were gradually thinned out by the failure of one and another and another to return, so that, on the home stretch, only we four Kentucky boys were left to run the race to a finish. After three years of hard work, we did, on that, to us, most notable 4th of July, 1844, reach the goal of our ambition, were dubbed A. B's. and waved our sheepskins in triumph.

The names of that quartette of fledgling Kentucky scholars are as follows: James C. Stone, of Richmond, Madison county; James S. Fall, of Frankfort; Robert T. Bryan, of Paris, Bourbon county, and John A. Dearborn, also of Paris.

There was a fifth member of that class whose name I have not yet mentioned, simply because he did not begin with us—William Ferrell. He was from Missouri, had attended school elsewhere, was a most diligent student and very reserved in manner and habit. He entered our class at the opening of our graduating year and graduated with us.

Thus closed that peculiar chapter of human experience—our college life—with all its care and carelessness, its joys and sorrows, its sacred memories, its life-long friendships and its stock of stories to be repeated over and over in after years. Only one pang marred the joy of that graduating occasion—the pain of parting and of leaving behind us persons and scenes that had become dear to our hearts. But the dividing hand of the inevitable was upon us. We had reached the point on life's journey where our paths diverged from that of college life, and led out into the wide, wide world, and the moment for farewells had come. James Stone chose the profession of law, and after a few years spent at home, gathered up his patrimony and located at Leavenworth, Kansas Territory, where he became prominent as a business man, banker and capitalist, rather than as a lawyer. James Fall, like his father, Philip S. Fall, one of the most highly cultivated Christian gentlemen of all my acquaintance, and who honored me with his friendship from my youth up—chose the double calling of teaching and preaching. Robert Bryan became a skilled practitioner of medicine. John Dearborn spent a post-graduate year at Bethany, engaged in a course of reading under the direction of Mr. Campbell, as preparatory to his engaging in the calling of his choice—the proclamation of the gospel of Christ, to which high ministry he was duly set apart by Aylett Raines and the elders of his home church at Paris, in the year 1846. To that work he is still addicted on all suitable occasions. And, last, but not least, William Ferrell devoted himself to scientific pursuits, especially the science of numbers and magnitude, and more specially to that branch which is technically called geodesy. He achieved distinction. He was a man of even painful modesty, diffidence. Had his self-assertiveness been commensurate with his merit, the scientific world would have rung with his praise. Even as it was, he stood high with his co-scientists and was chosen a member of several scientific societies at home and of several in foreign countries. He was in service of the United States government for about thirty years. He resigned his position then because of impaired health, and came to his bachelor home in Kansas City, Mo. Thinking that country surroundings would be more conducive to his health than those of the city, he went to the home of a relative near Maywood, Kansas, where, in a short time, he died. I had the melancholy pleasure of preaching his funeral and of seeing him put to rest on the pulseless bosom of our common mother earth.

All save one, of that first graduating class of Bethany College, are now sleeping man's last sleep—sleeping and waiting, it may be, for the dawn of the everlasting day. When I look for them and see them not, and call to them and they answer not, I feel lonely. Yes, and both those who wrought so nobly and those who were wrought upon, have, with that one exception, laid down the tools of their crafts and are at rest from their labors and their works do follow them.

Do you ask me what about my living self? Well, encouraged by that question, I will indulge somewhat in the luxury of talking about myself by telling you some things in confidence. If I live to see the 5th day of August next, I will touch the 78th mile stone on my road of life—eighty years beyond the Psalmist's long term. My hearing is unimpaired by all the din of loud and discordant noises that have been beating on my ear drums for all the past years of my sojourn in this hubbub world. By a midday manhood indiscretion of use and excess of light stimulus, my eyes require the aid of glasses in reading, but for far off and around about seeing they are good enough. My voice, to my ear at least, seems as solid as it was thirty years ago. Except from emotion (and to the touch of that I am aware that it is more sensitive than formerly), it has no tremor—not even that double demisiquaver that the countryman said was attached, like a fine silk cracker to a whip, to the trilling voice of a lady concert singer whom he heard in St. Louis. The reported microbic home guard in my animal organism are very prompt in slaying without challenging all intruders, so that if I have any vestige of any disease known to the delightful medical cornucopia lurking anywhere in my system, I do not know what it is nor where it is. As at present advised, I see no good reason why I should die at all, and I feel quite sure that if I continue on and on, indefinitely, as I am now, I will get my immortality on this side of the grave, and I agree with the Greek philosophers and Shakespeare in thinking that not "a consummation most devoutly to be desired," although there is a great deal of enjoyment in this life if only one has sense enough to find it. And yet, although I have no objection to telling my age, and not withstanding the long stretch of years that I have left behind me, I do not allow any man, woman or child to speak to me or to speak of me as an old man, and if, after fair warning, any he, she or it does that thing, I protest against it, publicly and privately, as rude—bad manners—and, possibly, prompted by a mischievous or malicious disposition to shock my tender sensibilities.

But let all men know, in conclusion, that I am not deluded by my flattering present and prospective, for I know full well that, right now and while I am mocking at death, the grim monster, with a cast iron expression on his face of absolute certainty of his victim, is creeping, creeping stealthily and noiselessly as a moving shadow, upon me and watching his chance to let fly his fatal dart. And he will be sure to find his opportunity "one of these days." But let him do his work. His worst will be my best, if only, by the grace of God, like Paul, I am ready to sleep that sleep, "From which none ever wakes to weep."

Facing A Crisis In Missions.

(AN APPEAL TO EDUCATED YOUNG MEN.)

A few years ago a young lad of sixteen said to his father, "Father, I am very anxious to have a better education, but how to obtain the necessary means to go through college as yet, I do not know." After talking with his son the father finally said, "George, I will make it possible for you to take a college course, but the responsibility of putting into practical use the education you will receive, must rest entirely with you."

The latter clause of that father's words have a deep, sweet lesson for the young men in our colleges to-day. Students, those of you who have graduated and are graduating from our Christian colleges, standing upon the threshold of a world of action, what use are you going to make of the education you have received and are receiving? With the privileges of a college education there has come to you the enrichment of knowledge, culture of heart and mind. The atmosphere of a Christian faculty and community in which you have mingled, has given you higher ideals in life. With the crying need of the world and the opportunity afforded of putting into practical use your Christian education, there descends upon you a tremendous responsibility.

In the strength of your manhood, young men, face the issue nobly. Be not hasty in the choice of your life's work. Do not make your plans and expect God to carry them out. Lift up your eyes. There's a vision for you. Let it be clear. Tarry with the Lord until convinced of the course you should pursue and let nothing turn you aside.

Young men, the world needs your service, but under whose agency will you give it? The Church, the blood-bought possession of Jesus has first claim to your service. Will you give it? This is the burning question of the hour for every educated young man.

Is it true that the young men in the church to-day are unacquainted with the words of Jesus as given in the greatest commission? Surely not, and yet the number who have offered themselves for service on the foreign field, proves beyond a doubt that the "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature," has yet to find a vital and important place in their heart and life. Just this week I heard a letter read from Bro. McLean, of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, in which he said, "Of all the young men graduating from our colleges not one has offered himself for service on the foreign field. Not one." Sad and shameful.

Are the young men in the Church of Christ o-day cowards? Any soldier who would fail to obey the worthy command of a general on the battlefield would be a coward and disloyal to his country. To hear the marching orders of the Lord of hosts and stand still or refuse to go because father, mother, brothers or sisters don't want you to, or with the thought, deceiving as it is, that the homeland holds for you sweeter fellowships, less of trial and more of comfort. To fail for these reasons is cowardly and disloyal.

When young Isaiah heard the voice of the Lord saying, "Whom shall I send and who will go for us?" upon the altar of service he throws himself with these words, "Here am I, send me."

With holy admiration do we look on the young man who had the manly, moral courage to give such an answer. God's call to service is as real to-day as in Isaiah's time. True, under different circumstances the call comes, but, nevertheless, real. Oh, for a legion of young men who will say manfully, prayerfully, sincerely and faithfully in answer to God's call, "Here am I, send me." God wants you, young men. Christ calls you. The Church waits to send you forth in answer to the trust committed to her charge. To falter is to fail. To halt is to stay the final triumph of Christ's kingdom. If you could but taste the fellowship of one hour's service in ministering to the people of this dark land, the mission secretaries would not be looking for you. Your service would be forthcoming.

Are you willing to lay your life upon the altar of service to be directed and used by God?

Such surrender, such consecration will bring untold blessings to the waste places in this world's desert. It will bring many a young man to India. It will lead many to China, Japan, Tibet and Africa. God does not intend every educated young man to come to the foreign field, nor does He intend that every educated young man should stay in the homeland.

It is for you, young men, to know where God wants you to be. Oh, that, Paul-like, you would bow at the "throne of grace" and in the same spirit of inquiry, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" or in the spirit of consecration expressed so beautifully in these words, "I'll go where you want me to go, dear Lord." To all such heart petitions, God has His answer. "For thine ears shall hear a word behind thee saying, 'This is the way, walk ye in it.'" The greatest need for the work in India is young men to act as evangelists in going from village to village, gathering the people together in the cool of the morning or in the bright moonlight to tell them of Him "who went about doing good." Do you possess the spirit of leadership? Here in India are a people to be led forth out of the wilderness of idolatry and superstition into the Canaan life of freedom, joy and peace.

Are you blest with something of Joshua's untiring and steadfast zeal? Bring it with you. The daily march onward, the blowing of the gospel trumpet, with "line upon line and precept upon precept" must continue, this ceaseless, holy warfare must be kept up until the Jericho walls of hethenism fall and the land become filled "with the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the deep."

Bungalows, orphanage, school, church and hospital buildings are not the only structures to be built in India or any other mission field. Spiritual temples for the living God are the most important part in the missionary's building duties. Out of the rubbish and wastes of heathenism material you will find and when changed by the gospel of Christ and beautified by the spirit of Christ, you will have built up a spiritual temple so sure as Solomon built the temple at Jerusalem. At times you will find the wisdom of Solomon unable to answer clearly the perplexing situations under which your work will bring you, but the wisdom of God sufficient will be.

Have you the spirit of undying love and passion for souls? Here is a field that needs such sympathetic and loving service. In looking at the multitudes who are dying without God, without hope, who have never had a kind word spoken to them, such conditions and scenes offer the greatest opportunity for the development of your loving and sympathetic nature. Do these words come to any young man who a few years ago offered himself as a student volunteer for service on the foreign field, but has allowed some paltry circumstance to keep him from its fulfillment? Do you feel called of God to service on the foreign field? If so, let nothing keep you from answering that call.

The crisis that we face to-day in mission work is this: Will the young men who are graduating from our Christian colleges fail in responding to the message of authority that comes from the Son of God, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature?"

Young men, will you fail to respond? Will you disappoint Heaven and the Church on earth? To do so is to allow millions to fall into a Christless and hopeless grave.

The Church and the Saloon.

We regret to read that a church in the neighborhood of New York has thought it necessary, in order to raise money to build an extension, to ask each saloonkeeper in the parish to give one day's receipts each month for four months to the building fund. The case affords, perhaps, an extreme illustration of the absurd and harmful expedients resorted to by churches to swell their financial receipts, expedients which tend to bring religion into disrepute and directly to swell the number of non-churchgoers, of which we hear so much complaint in these days. The fault lies here partly, of course, in the meagre and insufficient contributions to church maintenance made by the regular members of the churches themselves, but even this neglect cannot excuse the imposition of a tax upon the drink shops. The churches and the saloons stand too far apart in their character and purposes to make it expedient to yoke them together for any purpose. The saloon may profit by the arrangement, but the churches never.—Leslie's Weekly.

An Incident in Medical Mission Work.

One of the pleasant things about the woman's dispensary in Damoh, India, was a little baby boy, the grandson of the woman from whom the building is rented. His little sister, a child of six, came every day with Gokal astride her hip. She was so little and he such a big baby, that it was quite a task to get him up stairs, but once accomplished he rolled about on the floor in the sunshine and crowded so happily. His big black eyes answered one's smile. His good time on the ground was fatal to our appearance—white dresses and dirty little babies—but we couldn't help taking him up every day.

One day after I left India, Gokal became very sick. Miss Clarke went to see him, and for six hours worked with him. It was the pneumonic form of plague, and she hoped to be able to relieve him as she had so many little ones with lung trouble, but all in vain. The native doctor went to see him, and they did all they could for him. The next day he died.

There is a "smallpox" scare in a town near here, and people will not even go to the town. Miss Clarke cared for that little child. She sees smallpox and cholera whenever there is any about. Leprosy and other diseases of the kind, any and everything and yet she cares not for her own danger, is only glad to be used, and would give her life as willingly as her service, if need be.

There was mourning in little Gokal's home. He was the only son, his brother having died a short time before. There is mourning in many a home in Damoh for those who fell victims to the plague. During the warm season the disease becomes less active, only a case now and then. What the coming cold season holds for it cannot be foretold, but it is almost sure to be another time of death and sorrow.

I trust the auxiliary sisters are doing all in their power to send their apportionments to Burgess Memorial. Let Missouri stand before the other states in national convention as faithful, devoted and liberal as any. Wealth there is in plenty. Let those of us who have it, consecrate it to him. One successful president, recently, in appealing for gifts for our work, advised the audience to give their substance now, while they live, adding, "You can't take it with you when you die; if you try to, it will melt, you know."

Sister E. M. Millard, of Houston, sends $5 to Burgess Memorial. The programs for Grand River district convention, to be held at Princeton, Aug. 25-27, are ready for distribution. A splendid convention is expected. Will you help to make it good by attending?

BYNON.

On the eve of June 30, after an illness of only a few short hours, the gentle spirit of our beloved sister in Christ, Aline Clardy Bynon, youngest daughter of Brother and Sister Clardy, of this city, took its flight to that higher and better life prepared for the children of God, aged 26 years. A gifted child, she used her gifts to the glory of God, giving her life to her Savior when quite young. Her married life was of short duration, her husband having preceded her some six or seven years. Though frail in body, she was strong in spirit, brave, noble and true, a loving, dutiful daughter, a gentle, confiding sister. Her home going was a great shock to her large circle of friends, over whom her lovable character, sunny disposition and cheery smile ever won their hearts. May those who mourn the absence of this precious life, look beyond this vale of tears to a happy reunion in that higher clime where partings are known no more.

Publishers' Notes.

A list of our tracts and pamphlets is printed in a small folder. We will be glad to send this on receipt of request.

Baptismal certificates are quite often given to those who have lately been baptized. We have them printed on heavy card board, size 11x14 inches, price $.15 each, postpaid.

The commandments and Lord's Prayer would be well to have in the Sunday-school room. We can supply both of these printed in large type on cloth. The price of the Commandments is $1, and the Lord's Prayer $1.25, sent postpaid.

Maps are very necessary in the Sunday-school. We will be glad to send full description and prices. The maps which we sell are published by a company that deals almost exclusively in Bible maps. Inquiries in regard to maps will be given prompt attention.

Gospel Call Combined makes a splendid book for use in church services. This book contains 400 pieces of music, and in addition has 48 pages of responsive Bible readings. The book is composed of many spirited songs and inspiring church hymns.

Write for prices.

We can furnish church letters put up in books containing fifty letters and one hundred letters. These books of church letters are perforated so they can be torn off and leave a stub on which a record is kept, showing to whom the letter is granted.

The price is $.50 for the book of fifty letters, and $1 for the book of one hundred letters.

It is certainly written in a splendid literary style. We mean the new book by Geo. H. Combs, of Kansas City, Mo. The title of this book is "Christ in English Literature." This book is just from the press, and is in the best style of the bookmaker's art. It is bound in beautiful colored cloth, and the title is in pure white letters. Price postpaid, $1.

Were you ever a student at Bethany? If you were, you know something of the late W. K. Pendleton. You should read the late publication entitled "Life of W. K. Pendleton," written by F. D. Power, of Washington, D. C. This is a recent publication from the press of the Christian Publishing Company. It is a handsome cloth bound book containing 494 pages, price $1.50.

If you are just organizing a Sunday-school and need some Sunday-school supplies, write us for samples of our Sunday-School literature.

Our Sunday-school supplies are now used in schools all over the United States and are giving general satisfaction. We will be glad to send free samples on receipt of request.

A LETTER TO OUR READERS.

NEW HAVEN, Addison Co., Vt.
Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y.

Gentlemen:—About a year ago I was suffering from what I supposed was rheumatism. I became so bad that I could hardly get on my feet from a sitting position. I run down in weight from one hundred and ninety-five to a hundred and forty-five pounds. I tried different kinds of medicine, but received little or no help. I saw Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root highly recommended for kidney trouble, but I never had any idea that my kidneys were affected. I thought I would try a fifty-cent bottle of Swamp-Root and see what the effect would be. I commenced taking it according to directions and in a few days I saw that it was helping me. I used the fifty-cent bottle and then bought two more dollar bottles, and they completely cured me. I have got back to my original weight, one hundred and ninety-five pounds, and I am a thorough advocate of Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root.

Very Truly,

Feb. 17, 1903. Wm. M. PARTCH.

The books composing the Bethany Reading Course should be read by the young people in our Endeavor societies, Sunday-schools and church members. The nine books were prepared by the following: B. B. Tyler, F. D. Power, J. W. McGarvey, H. L. Willett, A. McLean and W. J. Lhamon. Price of each book 35 cents. Write us for full description.

Life of Alexander Campbell, by T. W. Grafton, is a short biography of Mr. Campbell, which the busy man can spare time to read. This book contains the more important events in the life of Alexander Campbell. The present membership of our churches is not as well acquainted with the history of Alexander Campbell and his associates as they might be. If you desire to learn the early history of the reformation read "Life of Alexander Campbell," by T. W. Grafton. Price, postpaid, $1.

Harrison, O., July 29, 1903.

ILLINOIS.—Girard, July 28.—Harold E. Monser begins a meeting here Oct. 15. Two additions not before reported.—MEADE E. DUTT, minister.

Watseka, Aug. 3.—A husband and wife for many years members of the Baptist church, presented themselves for membership here at the morning service of yesterday.—B. S. FERRALL.

Eureka, Aug. 2.—Four baptisms to-day; ten since last report. State meeting here Aug. 31-Sept. 4.—ALVA W. TAYLOR.

IOWA.—Glenwood, July 29.—Two added by letter July 26, and one by statement the 19th. Also three by letter and two confessions not previously reported.—WALTER L. MARTIN.

INDIANA.—Waynetown, Aug. 3.—Meeting here one week old yesterday. Twelve added thus far: ten by confession and two by letter. Crowded houses at each of the services and people were turned away last evening. Preaching is done by the pastor. Roy L. Handley is singing evangelist.—H. O. PRITCHARD, pastor.

State Line, Aug. 3.—One yesterday by baptism.—CHAS. E. SHULTZ, minister.

KANSAS.—Atchison, July 27.—We have recently received four into the fellowship of the First Church, two of whom were baptized. Our Bible-school had 297 present yesterday morning, with the mercury at 95 degrees in the shade; an attendance never before reached in midsummer. Audiences fine for the hot weather.—W. S. PRIEST.

South Haven, July 27.—Four additions here yesterday; two from the United Brethren by baptism, one from the Methodists, who had been immersed, and one by letter. The work here is still improving.

Girard, Aug. 1.—I am just home from a three weeks' vacation, which was spent in preaching for the congregation at Deer Creek in Kay Co., O. T., with the following results: Sixteen by confession and baptism, four from Christian connection, one from Baptist, one by statement. This gives them a membership of 53 members, and makes them strong enough to have preaching half time, which they will have when a suitable man can be found.—W. H. SCRIVNER.

KENTUCKY.—South Elkhorn, Aug. 1.—Burriss A. Jenkins is in a meeting at South Elkhorn, Ky. The meeting is seven days old and twenty-three additions. Mrs. J. J. Taylor, of Indiana, singing evangelist, is assisting him. Burriss A. Jenkins will begin a meeting at Newtown, Ky., August 10.

MISSOURI.—Springfield, July 29.—Six additions here last Lord's day. Baptism Wednesday evening. Our work prospers; good audiences at morning services.—D. W. MOORE.

Lamar, Aug. 8.—Two young men confessed Christ this morning, one a great grandson of the honored Samuel Rogers, that grand old pioneer who preached in St. Louis, before the town was named St. Louis. Our union evening services on the square are very largely attended.—S. W. CRUTCHER.

Lilly, July 31.—I attended the Davis county convention this week and gave my illustrated song lecture Wednesday night to a large house. We begun a meeting here last night with Brother Keer, of Gallatin. Churches and evangelists address me here.—C. M. HUGHES, gospel singer.

St. Louis, Aug. 3.—Additions yesterday as follows: First Church, two by letter; Fourth Church, one by letter; Carondelet, one by letter.

Moberly, Aug. 3.—Three added at yesterday's services. Our work starts off pleasantly.—JAMES N. CRUTCHER.

OHIO.—Athens, July 27.—Three added here yesterday; two by letter and one confession. Twenty-one have been received into the church at regular services since May 1. We are "federating" with the Methodists and Presbyterians during July and August.—T. L. LOWE.

OKLAHOMA.—Kaw City, July 27.—Have just closed a short meeting at this place. Baptized the first persons ever baptized in the town. Organized with 18 members. They will build soon. Bro. F. D. Wharton, of Newkirk, led the song and will preach for the little band Monday and Tuesday evening of each week until they can secure a pastor. We are in need of more pastors in Oklahoma. If you are a hustler and want to come to Oklahoma, don't wait to correspond, but pack your trunk and come on; not for your wife's (?) health, but because you want to be an Oklahoman. "The harvest is white, but the laborers are few."—J. A. TABOR, state evangelist, Oklahoma City.

OREGON.—Eugene, July 27.—At our regular services yesterday at Santa Clara school-house one by confession and baptism, who will take membership with the church at Eugene.—A. F. LINN.

Salem, July 25.—Additions every Lord's day in July thus far. Total additions, seven.—GEO. C. RITCHEY.

TENNESSEE.—Chattanooga, July 29.—To-night I preached in Sherman Heights, eight miles from the city, and 1 man made the good confession.—ZAS. W. ZACHARY.

TEXAS.—Houston, July 29.—I am closing a short meeting at Frost, Texas. The Baptists and Methodists possess the land here, but have treated us most kindly. We have had a number of accessions, and two weeks longer would have brought a greater harvest. In the past 19 months of pastoral work there have been 310 accessions under my ministry, and in 31 months, 631. Surely the Lord is good. Because of a shifting of circumstances, I have the month of September in which I can hold a meeting for some church, beginning as early as the last week of August or any time in September.—E. W. BRICKERT, evangelist.

Denison, Aug. 1.—Fourteen additions since last report; 32 in two months. Church strengthened and encouraged. Hope to have a meeting by one of our leading evangelists soon.—J. A. SHOPTAUGH.

Cleburne, July 28.—We have just closed a meeting here with Bro. G. Lyle Smith, our pastor at Paris, Texas, aiding us. We have been much strengthened by the labors of our brother. Twenty-seven were added to our roll—17 by primary obedience and the others by statement or letter. We are encouraged to look forward hopefully. May our Father give us wisdom to use our opportunities for the best.—A. J. BUSH.

My California Retrospect.

tain delights are thronged with campers, which place a large per cent of population out-of-doors for enjoyment.

Then the bicycle and auto come in with the Sunday excursions to wheel away the Sundays. These keep large numbers out of the Lord's house and Sunday-school. These changes have influence on every one who settles in California, so that even a Missourian may change his spots. Notwithstanding these obstacles, the cause of Christ in California is making rapid progress and will make greater as the days go by.

There are as many Endeavorers keeping the quiet hour as in any other state. There are thousands of devoted Christians in our mountains, valleys, cities and marts of business. The Sunday-school work is on the highest grade even in out-of-the-way school-houses, and the gospel call comes from good people away up among the whispering pines. Thus great advancement has been made and a high plane of excellence attained. The prospects are bright and promising. We need more consecrated workers. The population is rapidly increasing. We must be on deck, at the guns, banner high, open book, glistening swords, ready for action. See the "star of hope and triumph nigh." "Happy sunset land."

Under the Turquoise Sky.

miles away, the famous Sangre de Cristo, or Snowy Range, crowned with everlasting snow. To the north a great abyss, Gray's and Long's Peaks and Denver. Here is sublimity, immensity incredible! Pike's Peak is a nation's monument. It is the unofficial designation of the great west, and thousands of pioneers, moving toward the mysteries of this fascinating region, chose this mountain as their goal. "Pike's Peak or bust!" was the cry of multitudes. It was on Nov. 13, 1806, that Major Zebulon Pike saw a light blue cloud which he concluded to be a mountain, and in his report to the war department he tells how on Nov. 17, they "marched with an idea of arriving at the mountains, but at night found no visible difference in their appearance." For ten days he traveled before arriving at its base, and on Nov. 27, attempted its ascent. After prolonged effort to climb the mountain he declares his belief that "no human being could have ascended to its pinnacle." The first ascent was made by Major Long in July, 1819. The first woman to reach its top was a Mrs. Holmes, Aug. 5, 1858. For ten years now the cogwheel railroad has taken thousands to the Peak, an easy, comfortable ride of nine miles which to the commonplace mortal is like living a chapter of one of Jules Verne's romances.

The average grade is 844 feet to the mile. One goes up in an hour and a half and takes the same time in making the descent. The top of the peak consists of several level acres strewn with big rocks principally in cubes and other rectangular shapes as if the Titans had assembled material for some great structure on the summit and then abandoned it. As one stands and views this mighty heap upon the face of the continent he is called to wonder at the greatness of God's handiwork in raising it, and at the genius of man's handiwork in conquering it.

A singular grave is seen on the peak with this inscription: "In Memoriam. O'Keefe. Daughter of John and Nora O'Keefe, who was eaten by mountain rats in the year 1876." This was the child of Sergeant O'Keefe, of the signal service. On the mountain I saw no living creature but a porcupine and a few chipmunks and lizards.

Near Manitou is the so-called "Garden of the Gods." This is simply a collection of strangely formed rocks that by stretch of imagination on the part of hack drivers and tenderfeet assume all manner of grotesque shapes of beast and birds, cathedrals and sphinxes, freaks of sculpture and architecture, types of men and products of the garden. It is something of a fake.

The Springs here are very wonderful. Long ago it was a famous camping ground for the red men who knew the value of its medicinal waters and called it after the name of their great spirit. It is an ideal resting place—wild, beautiful and healthful. The heraldic animal of Manitou is the burro. They worship burros here as the people of Berne worship bears; the Venetians, pigeons and the Egyptians, cats. These little beasts are burden bearers and winners of many an honest penny for the people who live upon tourists. Troops of them pass every hour, mounting Pike's Peak by the perilous trails or taking visitors to the canons and falls and other points of interest. Women ride them like men—astride—and men often mount them who are bigger than the burro and would suggest that the position of the two animals fairly should be reversed, but most of all the children enjoy them. They are interesting little fellows—faithful and long suffering, with a rather musical note—a sort of a rocky mountain canary—and bear such names as Trilby, Rags, Satan, Shorty, Electric, Uncle Tom, English Bob, Jumbo, Cracker Jack and Fire Cracker.

Manitou is a little mountain town given over to landlords, tourists, hack drivers and curio shops. One can buy Navajo blankets, minerals, Indian work, Turkish rugs and jewelry, salt water taffy and buttered popcorn and everything else that makes Atlantic City noted and at Pike's Peak prices. The principal springs are the Navajo, Cheyenne, Shoshone and Ute Iron, and are claimed to be useful for most of the ills that flesh is heir to. Over 2,000,000 bottles of the water are put up and sent out annually. They are bottled just as they flow from the earth and charged with their own gas. One feels as if standing before a perpetually flowing soda fountain, and grieves over the many gallons going to waste and thinks, "O, if this spring were only at Pennsylvania Avenue and Seventh street in Washington, what a blessing it would be!"

One of the greatest trips we have taken was "O'er Canon and Crag to the Land of Gold." It is a one day trip which bankrupts the English language. Its scenic wonders equal anything one sees in Switzerland. Fifteen miles on the other side of the Peak lies this golden wonder. Twelve years ago the rounded hills were untrodden save by a few cattle—to-day there are over 60,000 people, a city which has been built twice within that period; first in wood and now in brick and stone. Gold, with which these hills are veined and seamed, is the all-sufficient cause of this transformation. In a thousand shafts, drifts and tunnels leads are being followed and their riches brought to light. The hills all around look as if pock-marked with smallpox, broken out where prospectors and miners have been at work. The golden stream flowing from these hills is adding two millions a month to the world's wealth and they have only scratched the surface. In a dozen years three and a half million tons of ore worth $136,000,000 have been taken out of the earth in an area six miles square. It is a wonderfully fascinating spot, 10,000 feet above the sea, in full view of the Sangre de Cristo range. We saw the Portland mine which yields $2,500,000 a year; the Independence which Stratton sold for $11,000,000; the Ajax, the Last Dollar, the Mary McKinney and the rest.

Returning by way of "the Short Line" to Colorado Springs we beheld the most stupendous and overwhelming scenery on the continent. This road completed in 1901, is a marvel of engineering skill. It is the one trip in America that combines in a three hours' run the glories of the grandest prospects of Norway—surpassing even the Alps. Alexander Campbell used to say he had seen men drunk in the pulpit—drunk with passion or with error. One here is intoxicated with Colorado scenery. But this centennial state of gorgeous views, glorious climate and great treasure vaults has nothing underground or overground like its masterpiece—Pike's Peak:

A Chance to Make Money.

I have berries, grapes and peaches a year old, fresh as when picked. I used the California Cold Process. Do not heat or seal the fruit, just put it up cold, keeps perfectly fresh, and costs almost nothing; can put up a bushel in 10 minutes. Last year I sold directions to over 120 families in one week; anyone will pay a dollar for directions when they see the beautiful samples of fruit. As there are many people poor like myself, I consider it my duty to give my experience to such and feel confident anyone can make one or two hundred dollars round home in a few days. I will mail sample of fruit and full directions to any of your readers for nineteen (19) 2-cent stamps, which is only the actual cost of the samples, postage, etc. FRANCIS CASEY, St. Louis Mo.

The Passive Resistance League

By William Durban.

Two cross currents are perplexing the British people. These are also mystifying foreign students of English affairs, as I perceive by my reading of American and continental papers. The education conflict and the Chamberlain protection sensation are competing for the attention and interest of the British public.

The Chamberlain Red Herring.

I am one of the many people in England who, to a certain extent, admire Joseph Chamberlain while profoundly distrusting him. It is a deep conviction of many keen English people that this statesman's protection scheme, if so tentative and so crude a program can be called a scheme, is simply an acute attempt to save the government and to rescue Mr. Balfour. The position of the government will before long be utterly hopeless in consequence of the approaching complications rendered inevitable by the reckless education enactment. Many things are concurring to create a stupendous liberal reaction. So acute a tactician as Chamberlain knows that the storm cannot be averted by any ordinary party strategy. It is believed by many competent judges that he does not for a moment expect to overturn free trade and to inaugurate a recrudescence of protection. But he is trailing a red herring across the scent. And without doubt the new scare is effectually diverting the general public from the previous agitation. For, like every other human community, the British nation is only capable of enduring one absorbing sensation at a time.

A Proof.

Lest this idea should seem to be a shadowy conjecture, I may remind readers of a very important antecedent. Mr. Chamberlain is very often challenged to bring forward his long-promised old age pension bill. He solemnly and eloquently undertook to construct such a measure, and there is no doubt that he won for the Tory party an immense number of workingmen's votes by that fascinating overture. But he has never shown the slightest inclination to redeem his promise, and can never be induced to reply to even the most pressing reminders. If he ever seriously intended to introduce such a measure, he has been unfaithful to his own purposes, for he has had splendid opportunities of vindicating his reputation. It seems to many critics that he was willing to impose on the credulity of the simple voter exactly as Lord Beaconsfield loved to do. Tories when in power are the Jesuits of politics. Political Machiavellianism is now in full vogue. We are going through a period of almost inconceivable sophistry in statesmanship. The high church ritualists are at the helm, and are steering the nation straight for the rocks of Ultramontanism. The bishops are playing with the lords as pretty puppets. This is the reply of the prelates to the radicals who threatened to turn them out of the House of Lords and to set up a free church in a free state, according to the famous formula of Cavour.

Passive Resistance.

Now I revert to the famous passive resistance scheme. The league formed under the auspices of the federation of free churches has been joined by nearly four thousand Methodist, Baptist, Congregational and Presbyterian ministers. The chief leaders are Dr. Clifford, Sylvester Horne, Dr. Monro Gibson, Dr. Townsend and Dr. Fairbairn. What is the object of this league? Simply to call into compact rank the forces of the mutineers against the iniquitous education bill. That bill has become law, but it is a law which tramples on the conscience of the Christian citizen by enforcing him to support schools in which sectarian religious instruction, subversive of the reformation, will be administered in thousands of the elementary schools, especially in the rural parishes, where clerical influence is omnipotent.

The Prospect.

It is probable that in a very few months the actual conflict will have begun. These ministers of religion are not to be amused, beguiled, bewitched and diverted from a serious and solemn obligation by Mr. Chamberlain's sensational vagaries and parliamentary antics. He has captured some in each party by parading an affected nationalism which others detect as a sham patriotism. The cry of favoring the colonies is a truly hollow one. The colonies will do nothing at all to reciprocate the policy outlined by Mr. Chamberlain, excepting so far as it may suit their own selfish interests. There is no sentiment in trade. It is brutally and barbarously selfish. At any rate, Mr. Chamberlain is a wrecker. He it was who was chiefly responsible for the fall of Gladstone's government. He shattered Liberalism and became the architect of Unionism, which he is now engaged also in smashing, for a considerable number of distinguished Tory statesmen are up in arms against the new protection program. All is in confusion, as in one of these letters I predicted all would be. We are in the midst of ed- dies and cross currents, and are near- ing the breakers in which the Tory craft will be shattered. The long regime of Salisburyian Conservatism, often called Cecilianism, is drawing to a humiliating end. The great question on many tongues is, "What does Chamberlain really intend?" It is by many believed that he intends deliberately to appeal to the nation at a time most convenient to himself, and to seek at a general election to bring in a reconstructed party, of which he himself will be the only possible leader. But there are many people who think that the issue will be a terrific crash in which many old institutions, including the Established Church, will topple over, and that a new England will arise out of the ruins. I agree with those who look to Mr. Asquith, Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. John Burns and Mr. Will Crooks as the coming statesmen when a new and better order of things is inaugurated. There is no doubt, however, of one thing, and that is, that for a short time the High Churchmen will revel in a temporary triumph. Their victory, however, will be of the kind which is worse than a defeat, for it ensures the destruction of the victors. Romanizing tactics always fail with the Anglo-Saxon race, for that race is possessed with an indomitable passion for civil and religious liberty. At the same time, there is also implanted in that very same race a religious instinct which renders it easy on certain occasions for pietist pretensionists to bewitch the multitude. Such an era of illusion the nation is passing through. When the air is cleared, the issue will astonish the Romanizers and their Tory tools with a view of their own folly which might constitute a sobering lesson, only the Ritualists, like the Bourbons, never learn.

CHANGE

Quit Coffee and Got Well.

A woman's coffee experience is interesting. "For two weeks at a time I have taken no food but skim milk, for solid food would ferment and cause such a pressure of gas and such distress that I could hardly breathe at times, also excruciating pain and heart palpitation and all the time I was so nervous and restless.

"From childhood up I had been a coffee and tea drinker and for the past 20 years I have been trying different physicians but could get only temporary relief. Then I read an article telling how some one had been cured by leaving off coffee and drinking Postum, and it seemed so pleasant just to read about good health I decided to try Postum in place of coffee.

"I made the change from coffee to Postum and such a change there is in me that I don't feel like the same person. We all found Postum delicious and like it better than coffee. My health now is wonderfully good.

"As soon as I made the shift from coffee to Postum I got better and now all of my troubles are gone. I am fleshy, my food assimilates, the pressure in the chest and palpitation are all gone, my bowels are regular, have no more stomach trouble and my headaches are gone. Remember I did not use medicines at all—just left off coffee and drank Postum steadily." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Current Literature

Turgot and the Six Edicts. By Robert Perry Shepherd, Ph. D. (The Columbia University Press, New York; paper; pp. 213. $1.50.)

This scholarly monograph by Bro. R. P. Shepherd, pastor of the Christian church at East Orange, N. J., was presented as a thesis for the degree of doctor of philosophy at Columbia University, and is now published by the university in its series of "Studies in History, Economics and Public Law." Students of history and advocates of social and economic reform—who are not always, but who always ought to be, students of history—may study with profit the measures put in practice by Louis XVI's great minister of finance, who, almost alone among his contemporaries, saw the impending danger of the Revolution and tried by rational means to prevent it. Dr. Shepherd's study of this prologue to the French Revolution is a genuine piece of historical research. It has a facility of diction which seldom characterizes a thesis, and that patient and detailed scholarship which seldom characterizes anything else.

The Religious Education Association. Proceedings of the first annual convention, Chicago, Feb. 10-12, 1903. (Executive office of the Association, 153-155 La Salle St., Chicago.)

Here, at last, is the complete report of the much-discussed and criticised Religious Education convention which met in Chicago in February last. Now, for the first time, those who had not the privilege or the desire to be present at the convention have the opportunity of knowing its real spirit as manifested in its prayers and its addresses. Those who have looked upon the convention as a ceterie of advanced critics, seeking to introduce revolutionary methods and ideas that would supercede or overthrow existing agencies and methods, will no doubt be much surprised to find what was the real aim of the convention, and what was the character of the men who participated in its proceedings. It is a most valuable book. We know of no publication of equal size that contains so much to quicken the mind and hearts on the great problem of religious education which it discusses. The book is handsomely printed and bound, contains a full account of the proceedings, is well indexed and will be found the most valuable addition to the library of any man who wishes to keep in touch with the best thought of our time upon the most vital questions of the age. In addition to the report of the proceedings, is the organization of the association by departments, with the names of the various committees and the list of the names of the association members enrolled by states. The membership represents forty-two states and territories in the United States, besides British Columbia, Manitoba, Nova Scotia, Ontario, Prince Edward Islands, Quebec, British West Indies, Japan and Turkey.

The Other Room. By Lyman Abbott. (The Outlook Company. $1 net.)

I have just read one of the sweetest books I ever held in my hand. The writer is Lyman Abbott. The name of the little volume is, "The Other Room." The thought with which the book begins is this:

"The universe is God's house. This world is not the only habitat for the living. In this house are many rooms. Death is only pushing aside the portiere and passing from one room to another." The text quoted is the language of Jesus in the fourteenth chapter of John: "Let not your heart be troubled; ye have faith in God, have faith also in me. In my Father's house are many dwelling places; if it were not so, would I have told you that I am going to prepare a place for you?" After this language follow the words first quoted.

Some one wrote to Dr. Abbott saying, "How shall I think of the dead?" He said, "I cannot tell another how he should think of the dead; I can only tell him how I think of them." And this is what he says: "I think of death as a glad awakening from this troubled sleep which we call life; as an emancipation from a world which, beautiful though it be, is still a land of captivity; as a graduation from this primary department into some higher rank in the hierarchy of learning. I think of the dead as possessing a more splendid equipment for a larger life of diviner service than was possible to them on earth—a life in which I shall in due time join them, if I am counted worthy of their fellowship in the life eternal."

This is enough to give you a taste. The book can be read through in an hour. It is full of comfort and hope. Its view of death is Christian, not pagan. The especial attention of bereaved ones is called to it. Pastors are often asked to name a book that contains comfort for the bereaved. Call attention to "The Other Room." It is a prose poem.

Memories of Yale Life and Men, 1845-1899. By Timothy Dwight. (Dodd, Meade & Co. $2.50 net.)

From his entrance to the freshmen class to his retirement from the presidency, Dr. Dwight was connected with Yale for fifty-four years. It was a long and honorable career, honorably crowned by his voluntary retirement at the age of seventy years. He was like old President Walker, of Howard, whose resignation was met with the statement that nobody in the corporation wanted him to resign, and who replied, "Do you wish me to remain in the presidency until everybody in the corporation wants me to resign?" But Dr. Dwight's work is even more fully crowned by this retrospect of half a century of Yale life. It is less self-centered than an autobiography would be, and less formal than a history of the institution during that period. But it tells the story of the development of what was a small college fifty years ago, into what is now a great university. We do not usually appreciate how recent is the magnitude and wealth of the chief among the old eastern universities. In 1845 the Yale faculty consisted of the president, six professors, one assistant professor and seven tutors. There was no graduate school, no departments of divinity, law or medicine.

There was plenty of plain living in those days, but Dr. Dwight thinks the amount of high thinking may easily be overestimated. He frankly asserts that "the new times are better than the old," and that is as convincing evidence of a youthful spirit as any man of seventy-four years can give. His own father did not take quite the same view. Dr. Dwight says:

"My excellent father, as I remember, used to animadvert upon, and in a sort of self-comforting way, to grieve over the degeneracy of the times when I was a young man, as compared with those when he was a youth. But I was wont to try to encourage him with the consolatory thought that, however much things had changed for the worse between his early years and his later ones, they were doubtless much better in his later years than they would be in mine. But somehow he was not consoled."

Every page of the book is full of interest to every Yale man, and very many of its pages will be of a far more general interest.

The American Bible. The Books of the Bible in Modern English. By Frank Schell Ballentine. (Good News Publishing Co., Scranton, Pa.)

Every earnest effort to translate the originals of the Bible into modern English ought to receive the sympathy of Bible students. Mr. Ballentine has given us the New Testament in most convenient form and type, which is a luxury to the eye. The arrangement of the books of the New Testament is also another noteworthy feature. The books of the same author are grouped together. Hence one volume is devoted to the letters of St. Paul, while there are five volumes in all. Nothing could excel the convenience of the

Kola Plant CURES HAY-FEVER AND ASTHMA.

Free. The African Kola Plant is Nature's Positive Cure for Hay-fever and Asthma. Since its recent discovery this remarkable botanical product has come into universal use in the Hospitals of Europe and America as an unfailing specific cure for Hay-Fever and Asthma in every form. Its cures are really marvelous.

Dr. J. R. Duncan, the oldest physician of Crawfordsville, Ind., writes Jan. 29th, I feel it my duty to tell all I can of the great virtue of Himalya. Dr. W. H. Vail, a prominent physician of St. Louis, Mo., writes March 8th, that he used Himalya on six different Hay-fever patients last fall with satisfactory results in every case. Mr. Frederick F. Wyatt, the noted Evangelist of Abilene, Texas, writes Jan. 31st, that Himalya permanently cured him of Hay-Fever and Asthma and strongly recommends it to sufferers. Mrs. M. A. Scott, Crosby, Mich., writes March 6th, that Himalya completely cured her after fifteen years persistent suffering of Hay-Fever and Asthma. Mr. Alfred C. Lewis, editor of the Farmers' Magazine, Washington, D. C., was also cured, although he could not lie down for fear of choking, being always worse in Hay-fever season. Rev. J. L. Coombs, of Martinsburg, W. Va., wrote to the New York World, July 23d, that Himalya cured him of Asthma of thirty years' standing.

Hundreds of others send similar testimony proving Himalya a truly wonderful remedy. As the Kola Plant is a specific constitutional cure for the disease, Hay-fever sufferers should use it before the season of the attacks when practical, to give it time to act on the system. To prove the power of this new botanical discovery, if you suffer from Hay-fever or Asthma, we will send you one trial case by mail entirely free. It costs you absolutely nothing. Write to-day to The Kola Importing Co., No. 1166 Broadway, New York.

plan adopted by the author. The translation itself, though faulty in places, is in the main admirable. The treatment of the aorist tense and the Greek article is far superior to either the authorized or revised versions. The general effect of the translation upon the English reader is very pleasing. He is seldom shocked by unnecessary changes, such as are made in the revised version. However, Mr. Ballentine has not hesitated to make changes where they are needed, but his rendering is apparently so proper and generally so luminous that the change is readily accepted. But there are some serious defects which cannot be overlooked. In order to avoid the controversial aspects of baptism the translator has uniformly rendered baptizo "to purify." This, of course, is absurd, and no scholar will justify it; and I understand that Mr. Ballentine himself is now convinced that this rendering will not do, and in the next edition he will change it. With a few slight exceptions the work is the best that has been presented as an effort to modernize our New Testament. It is free from many of the objections of the "Twentieth Century New Testament," while it is a great improvement in almost every respect upon the Revised Version for the general reader.

Constipation Needs a Cure.

A simple relief only is not sufficient, especially if the relief is brought about by the use of salts, aloes, rhubarb, or some similar purgative or cathartic. They temporarily relieve but they weaken the bowels and make the condition worse. In constipation the bowels require strengthening, toning, and something that will assist them to do their work naturally and healthfully—in short a tonic laxative of the highest order. That is what Vernal Saw Palmetto Berry Wine is. It both relieves and permanently cures by removing the cause of the difficulty. It positively cures dyspepsia, indigestion, kidney and liver troubles, headache and all other diseases which grow out of sick and clogged bowels. One small dose a day will cure any case, light or bad. It is not a patent medicine. The full list of ingredients goes with every package with explanation of their action. It costs nothing to try it. A free sample bottle for the asking. Vernal Remedy Co., 19 Seneca Building, Buffalo, N. Y.

"Countrified."

By James Buckham.

Do they call you "countrified?"
Let it be your joy and pride,
You, who love the birds and bees,
And the whispers of the trees!
Trust me, friend of flowers and grass,
Little brown-faced lad or lass,
Naught in all the world beside Equals being "countrified."

Up of mornings when the light
Reddens on the mountain height;
Hearing how the bird-throats swell
With the joy they can not tell;
Conscious that the morning sings
Like a harp with unseen strings,
Over which the breezes glide;
This is being "countrified."

Roaming far, on summer days,
Or when autumn woodlands blaze;
Learning how to catch and tell
Nature's precious secrets well;
Filled with sunshine, heart and face,
Or, where branches interlace,
Dappled like the shy trout's side;
This is being "countrified."

What though little fit to pose
In the city's ways and clothes?
There is vastly more to love
In the brawn of nature's glove.
Health and happiness and tan
Are best fashions for a man.
All who near to God abide
Are in some way "countrified."

Robert's Regret.

By M. La Fay Gestrue.

"Mamma, Robert did not recite his grammar lesson to-day, and when the teacher asked for an explanation, he told a fib, said he had no book and could not study. Here is a note from the teacher."

Mrs. Cable read the note Minnie gave her, and wondered what she could say in reply to Mr. Walker.

Early in the term a peculiar circumstance occurred in regard to Robert's grammar, perhaps you will say shameful. Robert hated grammar and was often punished on account of his poor recitations. Reciting well in other studies, it was all the more evident to the teacher's mind that it was not inability, but meanness that made Robert a laggard in the class.

Perhaps if Mr. Walker had shown him the pleasant side of the study by arousing a mental interest in the exercises, it would have helped him to overcome his dislike to so essential a study. Unfortunately we have teachers here and there who merely "hear" recitations and who seem to think that is all they are employed to do.

When Robert began the fall term he was given the grammar his older brother formerly used, which disgusted him on the start. If you dislike a thing, every little item of no consequence at all is very apt to influence the mind. By the end of the month Robert was ready to quit grammar, a low grade was reported, and he said to his chum, Fred Green, "What I did answer correctly was only from memory, for I don't understand a thing about it."

The discouraged boy threw his book into a mud hole, saying, "It's an old thing anyway. I can live without grammar."

The scholar who saw this told his sister Minnie, who reported it to her mother and what do you think?

Robert vowed he did no such thing, and Fred, who came home with him to stay all night, would not say a word. Fact is, Fred had thrown his arithmetic into that same mudhole for the same reason.

Robert told his sister privately that Fred Green disliked a girl that tattled. "Now, you are a tattletale, and you just see if the very next time he don't go skating with Nettie Padgett and let you slide." That was playing the coward with his sister.

In the midst of Mrs. Cable's reflections in came Robert with a very bloody face, and following close behind, and very pale, was Fred Green.

"O Mrs. Cable, I'm afraid I've punched Robert's eye out. We got out of school a little early and went rabbit hunting. The snow is so fine. Over at Elliott's stone fence we cornered a jack. I got on one side and Robert on the other. I had a long stick and was pushing it into holes to make the rabbit run out on the other side for Robert to catch. He got up close to peep in to see if he could see just where it was and my stick punched him in the eye."

Robert was in great distress. He could not see with his right eye at all, but that was on account of the blood from the gash on the side of the nose near the corner of his eye. The scar is visible to-day, twenty years later. The boys were so humbled by the accident and from fright that Mrs. Cable thought she would improve the opportunity by talking school affairs. So when quiet was restored after supper, Mrs. Cable asked about Robert's grammar.

The teacher wrote me a note, Robert, stating that you left school this afternoon without permission, because he had scolded you about your grammar lesson. At recess you buried your new book in a snow drift. You know how hard it is for mamma to get along since papa died, and how cold we were when drying the clothes in the house that I had washed in order to get the money to buy your new book. Do you remember there was such a storm we could not hang the clothes out? Fred's father can buy ever so many books where I can hardly buy one. Besides, it is very nearly as bad to intentionally destroy a book as it is to steal one. I promised to give you papa's army field glass which he carried when a soldier and pilot, if you would be a good boy, good enough to not tell a fib, and commit your grammar lesson well, whether you understood it or not, it would be all right in the end. But now you have destroyed another book, deceived me a second time, and you cannot have the prize unless you work Saturdays and buy yourself a grammar and keep your word."

The tears were in Mrs. Cable's eyes as she talked, and the boys had not a word to say.

Robert got work at a cane mill on Saturdays and took such a notion to the work that in a month he went to the cane mill instead of school. If he had to go to school he would not live at home. His mother compromised with him by letting him stay at home. But, O, how her heart ached. She knew he would get very tired driving the horse at the cane mill day after day and that he ought to be in school.

* * *

It would require a book to tell the history intervening. Twenty years is a long time in which to prepare for any work. During the lyceums of winter evenings Robert took a great fancy for debate and politics. Being fond of history and not unwilling to read, possessing a fine voice and excellent memory, he was several times chosen as a leader, but the humiliation he suffered on account of his poor language made him keenly feel his fault and bitterly regret his disobedience. The opposition often mocked him, and the judges would criticize his side of the argument on account of poor language.

Fortunately Robert had a commendable determination now that he saw what he needed, but he would not go to school with the little boys. He sold his pony and went away to a normal school where he took special studies. His embarrassments were cutting sometimes, but bravely borne. He got work in a printing office which was greatly to his advantage, and finally studied law in the office of a well-known Missouri judge. A student and janitor, but he says, "I learned how to live on nothing and do without everything if anybody ever did."

He is now practicing law in a northern state, but he says he shall always feel the effects of his disobedience and invariably tells boys what it cost him.

We were school-mates and I remember it all very well. Just a short time ago we talked with Robert and he said: "I have never forgiven myself for deceiving my mother, sorely punished though I have been. It is the meanest thing a boy can do. When I see a witness perjure himself, the question at once comes to me, Did he begin by deceiving his mother, telling her falsehoods? I find that deceit and falsehood precede all crime and lawsuits of every kind."

Senator Vest's Tribute to the Dog.

One of the most eloquent tributes ever paid to the dog was delivered by Senator Vest, of Missouri, some years ago. He was attending court in a country town, and while waiting for the trial of a case in which he was interested, was urged by the attorneys in a dog case to help them. Voluminous evidence was introduced to show that the defendant had shot the dog in malice, while other evidence went to show that the dog had attacked defendant. Vest took no part in the trial, and was not disposed to speak. The attorneys, however, urged him to speak. Being thus urged, he arose, scanned the face of each jurymen for a moment, and said:

"Gentlemen of the jury: The best friend a man has in the world may turn against him and become his enemy. His son or daughter that he has reared with loving care may prove ungrateful. Those who are nearest and dearest to us, those whom we trust with our happiness and our good name, may become traitors to their faith. The money that a man has he may lose. It flies away from him, perhaps when he needs it most. A man's reputation may be sacrificed in a moment of ill-considered action. The people who are prone to fall on their knees to do us honor when success is with us, may be the first to throw the stone of malice when failure settles its cloud upon our heads. The one absolutely unselfish friend that man can have in this selfish world, the one that never deserts him, the one that never proves ungrateful or treacherous, is his dog. A man's dog stands by him in prosperity and in poverty, in health and in sickness. He will sleep on the cold ground, where the wintry winds blow and the snow drives fiercely, if only he may be near his master's side. He will kiss the hand that has no food to offer; he will lick the wounds and sores that come in encounter with the roughness of the world. He guards the sleep of his pauper master as if he were a prince. When all other friends desert, he remains. When riches take wings and reputation falls to pieces, he is as constant in his love as the sun in its journeys through the heavens. If fortune drives the master forth an outcast in the world, friendless and homeless, the faithful dog asks no higher privilege than that of accompanying him, to guard against danger, to fight against his enemies. And when the last scene of all comes, and death takes the master in its embrace, and his body is laid away in the cold ground, no matter if all other friends pursue their way, there by the graveside will the noble dog be found, his head between his paws, his eyes sad, but open in alert watchfulness, faithful and true even in death."

Then Vest sat down. He had spoken in a low voice, without a gesture. He made no reference to the evidence or the merits of the case. When he finished, judge and jury were wiping their eyes. The jury filed out, but soon returned with a verdict of $500 for the plaintiff, whose dog was shot; and it was said that some of the jurors wanted to hang the defendant.

He Left the Farm.

He went wrong, did he? That strong, well-meaning boy who worked so hard and patiently with you through so many discouraging though sometimes pleasant years? He would not stay by the land—anything, anything but that. "Yes, yes," you answer. "I did all I could to keep him on the old farm and to make him love the country more." Did you? Were the chores made just as few as possible, the work planned so that rainy days and Sundays were resting places, instead of times to be dreaded? Was now and then a day found for all hands to go fishing? Was there a week or two set apart every summer for a genuine outing to some lake, stream or forest, where all that is wild and beautiful in nature could be felt and seen, and the tired brain and muscles relaxed and strengthened for the coming work? Did you see to it that the best boys of the neighborhood were made welcome at your home, now and then, on long winter evenings, and that a few of the best and latest books and magazines were there to interest and please them? Were only kind words spoken in that now deserted home, and did you teach them from the start, and live what you taught, that the farm home is the grandest, the most independent one on earth and can be made the most beautiful one? That farming is a profession of professions—one requiring the very brightest and best of our boys, one to be mastered and one to be proud of? Did you do all this, and still the boy would not stay on the farm?—Dakota Farmer.

Kruger is Interviewed.

Pourtney Bigelow attempted on one occasion to interview "Oom Paul" Kruger, and met with about the same fate that many interviewers have had with the former president of the Boers. He found the old man in a very bad humor, and could get only monosyllables in reply to his questions. He employed every art of the interviewer, but to no avail. Finally, despairing of getting any information of use to him by straight questioning, he determined to be diplomatic and approach Mr. Kruger from his family side. So he said, very nonchalantly: "Is your wife entertaining this season?" Short and sharp came the gruff answer: "Not very." And the interview closed there.

Eaten up by Interest.

Most people know in theory, if not by experience, how rapidly compound interest accumulates; but a phase of the matter which may have escaped their attention is reported from the South.

A colored man complained that another negro owed him two dollars and absolutely refused to pay the debt.

The creditor had dunned and dunned him, but all to no purpose. Finally he went to a lawyer, in the hope that he could give him some good advice.

"What reason does he give for refusing to pay you?" asked the lawyer. "Why, boss," said the colored man, "he said he done owed me dat money for so long dat de interest had et it all up, and he didn't owe me a cent."

Misfit in Names.

You must not think that turkeys first came from Turkey, for they are natives of America. And the Turkish bath originated in Russia. Nor must you think camel's-hair brushes are made from the hair of the hump-backed quadruped. They are mostly of the bushy hair from squirrels' tails. German silver not only is not silver at all, but it was invented in China, centuries ago, and it is an alloy of some of the inferior metals. Porpoise hide is not made from porpoises at all. People get it from the white whale. Jerusalem artichokes are not natives of Jerusalem, but are a kind of sunflower. The French call them "girasole"—flower turned to the sun—and girasole became corrupted into Jerusalem. Cork legs are not made from cork, and they did not come from Cork; the willow tree usually furnishes material for them. Cleopatra's Needle, that wonderful obelisk of Egypt, was made one thousand years before Cleopatra was born, and really had nothing to do with her. Irish stew is an English dish, and turtle soup seldom has any real turtle in it. Prussian blue, the beautiful color, is not a special product of Prussia, but of England. And so you see our names are often "misfits."—Selected.

"Now, boys," said the Sunday-school teacher, "Can any of you name the three great feasts of the Jews?" "Yes'm, I can," replied one little fellow. "Very well, Johnny, what are they?" "Breakfast, dinner, and supper," was the unconsciously logical reply.

A young Spaniard was sent as ambassador to the pope. The supreme pontiff frowned on him, and asked, "Does the king of Spain lack men, that he sends a beardless boy?" "Sire," replied the ambassador, "if the king had supposed his ambassador would be received for his beard he would have sent a goat."—The Barber's Gazette.

"What is the nature of it, if one may ask?"

"Of course I can't tell you any of the details of the thing, but I am constructing a machine with which breakfast food can be made out of old straw hats."

With the Children

By J. Breckenridge Ellis

Gaston McElly; Minnishute, Minn.: "What I liked was Helen Ross telling about the show she got up with the boys and girls. I have tried to get the young people here to go in with me and act something and have a show, but they don't want to do anything except go to parties and walk around. I have been thinking of getting up something with only one part in it, and be that part myself. I was sure Bertha Beesley would pass her examination. I always read her letters, and she writes like the kind that pass. I hope she will tell us something more, soon. I am going to cook some mussels and see how they go. I think it's mighty strange about Mr. Manley going to the top of that mountain after shakes." (I don't see anything strange in that. You would naturally hunt them up the mountain-side.) "Couldn't he get milkshakes in town?" (Milkshakes! Why! What made you think they were milkshakes he went after? Mr. Manley didn't go up any mountain after milkshakes. Ridiculous!) "And if they were not milkshakes, if they were pokers" (pokers, indeed) "I still don't see why he went up for them." (Gaston, don't you know what shakes are? I thought everybody knew that. They are small thin boards, used for shingles. That is what shakes are. They are cut out of pine trees. They are 6 or 8 inches wide, and are called shakes.) "Harriet Dunn asked Jessie Underwood to tell about shakes. She got her name mixed with Mr. Manley's daughter, because it is Jessie Underwood that has made a study of sitting-hens instead of shakes. When you want to know how to make hens sit you ask Jessie Underwood. She said not to give them any dinner, didn't she? I think if you would keep that treatment up long enough, you could make anybody sit. I will tell you how I celebrated July 4. I began the Av. S. I took up 'The Princess' by Tennyson, and while I never liked poetry before, I think 'The Princess' interesting as a novel. I am reading Greene's 'History of the English People.' I read a chapter from the Bible each day."

Zella Manley, Manton, Cal.: "Here I come again, to explain about those shakes. The men go in the woods and saw down a big pine tree in blocks about 3 feet long and that block is rived or split into little thin boards about 6 or 8 inches wide, and are called shakes, not shaps; they have pine-wood flavor." (That is just what I was telling Gaston, and a very good flavor, too; but I prefer pineapple.) "They have a little bailer that they bail them up with; about 50 in a bundle. Then horse-teams come and haul them to the railroad, from 16 to 20 thousand at a load. They are used to put on buildings in place of shingles." (Just what I was telling Gaston.) "I kept my rules 11 weeks, then forgot to get my quotation. Ought I to send in my report when I miss?" (It isn't necessary.) "Oh, you wanted us to tell you about our Fourth!" (Oh, yes!) "The neighbors clubbed together and raised $10, and about 100 of us had a real old-fashioned picnic. We had all the ice cream, lemonade, candy and dinner we could eat and drink. I wish you good morning." (Zella and I know about shakes.)

Sarah Naylor, Waldron, Mo.: "Here I am again. I send my report, which is the most difficult of all the rules. I received my Av. S. gold pin and think it a little beauty. I suppose my letter, and Ethel Searcy's were published, for one number of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, during the flood, didn't reach us. But I judge from the way Lois A. Ely wrote about beating E. Searcy in size, that our letters were in the missing number." (Yes, I remember E. Searcy said she was such a nice little girl.) "Jessie Underwood's information about sitting hens was surely very valuable. George Erskine wondered if my brother came home from college. No, not till 3 months after I expected. He secured a good position for that long, so you can imagine how glad I was to see him after an absence of 6 months. He was sent on a business trip to Washington (state). Now you tell us how you spent the fourth of July, and maybe we'll tell." (I told two weeks ago.) "I didn't get left at home, get burnt or drink too much lemonade. My brother, aunt and I visited my sister, 20 miles away. We drove and got a little lost, but were soon on the right road again. I hope no one had worse luck than we."

Mrs. F. A. Potts, Chattanooga, Tenn.: "Did you receive my last 9th report? It should have been on the Honor List, as I sent it the last of May." (Mrs. Potts' name was published on our Honor List in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of June 18. Her card bears the postmark Cartersville, Ga. I hope she is having a good time down there, and gets all the crackers she wants. I have been told Georgia is a famous place for crackers.)

Helen Ross, Independence, Mo.: "I have just read the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST and see you put all my letter in. I wouldn't doubt but some got tired reading it." (They have now had 2 weeks to rest up, so I thought they could bear another dose.) "I am glad you like the idea of having colors for the Av. S. The ones I shall vote on are blue and old gold. I think those colors suit each other fine. I am glad Bertha Beesley passed the examination. The postman is coming, so I must close." (I hope he brought you a good letter, an interesting magazine and a box of candy. And I might as well add, an invitation to a party, as it will not cost any more.)

I have a delicate little matter to speak of, being almost ashamed to mention it, but after days of meditation I have at last found the courage. I do wish when you send your fat reports, covering ever so many pages, you would either use thin paper, or find out at the post office if they are going to charge more than 2 cents for sending the same. Because they won't tell you, unless you ask; they will be afraid you won't send it at all. They wait till it comes to Plattsburg, then ask me for the other 2 cents. I am very glad to get your fat reports, showing the good work you have done; but I am not so glad that I want to pay for them. Now a stamp is a small thing, but so is a bee; you cannot afford to ignore either. I know a stamp only costs 2 cents, but you can run 2 weeks at Sunday-school on that amount, and at the same time be feeling that you are clothing and feeding savages. I am ashamed to appear so particular, but I would rather be ashamed than to lose my 2 cents, so you will please inquire at the post office, when your letter is so heavy you have to change hands in carrying it down town, if your stamp is enough, or if the authorities mean to lie in wait for the editor at Plattsburg and make him unstamp when he goes up to get his mail. Also please remember to vote on the society colors; the end of August is the limit of voting. You have only about 3 weeks to get in your choice.

What We Stand For.

For the Christ of Galilee,
 For the truth which makes men free,
 For the bond of unity
 Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
 For the life which this world needs,
 For the church whose triumph speeds
 The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
 For the weak against the strong,
 For the poor who've waited long
 For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
 For the truth 'gainst superstition,
 For the hope whose glad fruition
 Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
 For the New Earth now appearing,
 For the heaven above us clearing
 And the song of victory.

Current Events

On the day after his retirement from the post of commanding general of the United States army, A Warrior's Plan for Peace. General Miles is reported to have made some interesting remarks about international peace and disarmament. As is well-known, he believes that one professional soldier to each thousand of population will give a standing army large enough to be effective and small enough to be safe. Our army is at present established on that basis. General Miles thinks that it is not enough for us to put this ratio into practice in our own army, but that we ought to take active and positive steps toward persuading the soldier-ridden nations of Europe to do the same. He appreciates the Czar's efforts, as shown in calling the Peace Conference at the Hague in 1900, but thinks that proposals for disarmament will come most properly and convincingly from a country whose military force is already reduced to a reasonable minimum. In short, the United States should take the initiative in calling an international congress which should be empowered to regulate the size of the armies of the participating powers by reducing them proportionately, so that the people of the several countries would be relieved of an enormous burden of taxation, and yet no power would gain an advantage over another by the reduction.

In a Jersey City boiler shop, union labor was employed, and no man received less than the union scale, $3 a day. A Strike for Lower Wages. But some of the men, for extra skill and efficiency, received $3.75 a day. The union decided that such discrimination was unjust and that the wages of these superior workmen must be reduced to the level scale. The employers refused to reduce the wages, and a general strike was ordered which involved the $3.75 men along with the others. It is hard to say which appeared in the more ridiculous and unenviable light, the $3 men who struck with no desire to better themselves, but only to injure their fellow-workmen, or the $3.75 men who went on a strike to get their own wages reduced. The outcome was that the shop put in non-union men who would be willing to allow each other to get as much as they could earn. The unions do well enough to establish a minimum wage, but the sooner they learn that the equality of men is a political and not an economic truth, the sooner they will escape from the danger of making themselves ridiculous by such tactics as these.

Certain members of the Chinese Reform Association, whom the Chinese government holds Chinese Reformers. guilty of political crimes punishable with death, have sought sanctuary in the foreign reservation at Shanghai. The government is demanding their surrender and the foreign ministers, with the exception of the British, seem disposed to comply. The United States minister has cabled for instructions and it is to be hoped that he has been instructed to stand by the British minister and protect the refugees. That the civilized powers should be participants criminus in the judicial murder of men against whom there is alleged no offense of which a civilized court could take cognizance, is an outrageous proposition. The reformers are not anarchists or revolutionists. They are loyal to the emperor, but are opposed to the reactionary program of the dowager empress. Their most active work is educational and they are raising large funds for the support of schools in which western learning shall be taught instead of the Chinese classics. The Reform Association is reported to have 6,000,000 members, several thousand of whom are in this country.

Wall Street is not the only locality which trades upon watered stock. Watered Stock In Literature. Publishers' Row has the same sin written heavily against it. Fiction offers perhaps the most obvious opportunity for such manipulation, and it is in this department of literature that the opportunity is oftenest embraced, though the realms of essay and of theology and politics are by no means free from the curse. A story which has an intrinsic space value of, say, ten thousand words, can easily be padded and inflated and watered to make a novel of the customary sixty thousand words. It is safely conservative to say that, of the novels published within the past five years, nine out of ten would be artistically improved by being cut to half their length, and probably a clear majority of them would be the better for a still further condensation. The story is lost in a wilderness of words, and if it has any social, religious or political meaning, its obscuration is even more complete. The lowering of artistic quality and the waste of the reader's time are the grievous features of this situation. Literature is suffering from the imaginary necessity of running into the same sized mold every group of ideas which aspires to expression in permanent form. Would it not be a gain to everyone concerned if it could be recognized that, in letters as in painting, acreage is not the criterion of artistic value. If painters were held to a rigid rule that no picture should be less than ten feet by twelve, some of the world's most precious masterpieces would be excluded. The Procrustean bed has no place in any artistic process. Let the canvas fit the picture. Just now the crying need in literature, and especially in fiction, is for a revival of faith in the possibility of doing something of serious value on a small canvas.

In the presence of seventy thousand beholders, the new pope Pius X received the papal tiara The Crowning of the Pope. in the cathedral of St. Peter on Sunday, Aug. 9. The number of spectators as given is large, but it is quite credible to one who knows the edifice. Within its vast spaces the most habitual exaggerator would more easily underestimate than overestimate a crowd. The ceremony was about five hours in duration and was as magnificent and spectacular as the ingenuity and experience of the ecclesiastical master of ceremonies could make it. The royal family and the officials of the government were conspicuous among those who were not present, thus expressing their official disapproval of some of the prerogatives and dignities which the pope would profess to assume at his coronation. The king of Italy had planned a visit to France to return the recent visit of President Loubet to Italy, but owing to Pope Leo's death it was postponed. Some of the Catholic papers have interpreted this as a mark of respect to the memory of the late pontiff. More likely it was because he did not want to be absent from Italy while such important events as the election and induction of a new pope were transpiring.

Just now when Catholic papers and prelates are filling the air with lamentations that the pope is no longer a temporal sovereign ruling over an independent state, it is worth while to look into the arguments by which intelligent Catholics support their contention. Archbishop Ireland has stated the case with the utmost clearness, and his statement must be taken as an authoritative one. The substance of his argument may be stated as follows:

(1) The pope is the absolute head of a world-wide spiritual monarchy, the champion of conscience and the supreme representative of the moral and religious forces in the world.

(2) He must therefore have "absolute freedom of action in the work of governing the church and of teaching faith and morals."

(3) Freedom to do his spiritual work necessitates civil independence, because if the pope is subject to a civil ruler he may be coerced into an abuse of his spiritual functions, as Napoleon tried to coerce Pius VII and as Henry VIII would have tried to coerce Clement VII if Clement had been a British subject. The pope must therefore be "in every respect his own master."

(4) A guarantee of freedom given by a civil ruler to a subject pope is not enough, because such a concession is liable to be revoked.

(5) The pope as a subject would tend to become the head of a merely national church and his title to the headship of the church universal on earth would lose force. For example, a pope owing allegiance to the German emperor would have slight influence in France.

(6) The attitude of protest is the only proper one so long as the pope is deprived of temporal sovereignty; and if any pope should acquiesce in the present status "he would sacrifice a sacred right of the church and would become an unwise and unjust steward."

Archbishop Ireland says in conclusion that, while he can not, of course, expect noncatholic readers to admit his premise in regard to the pope's spiritual functions, he thinks they must admit that, granting this premise, his position regarding the temporal power is the only logical one.

Archbishop Ireland's argument has the merits of ingenuity, plausibility and an entire absence of blinding passion. But for all that it is a singularly flimsy structure. Let us look at it point by point:

(1) The first point touching the primacy of the pope, as the archbishop anticipates, we do not accept. But we are willing to assume it to see whether the argument proceeds logically from this premise.

(2) This would undoubtedly follow from the foregoing, if by "governing the church" is meant only control by moral and religious influences and not the discipline of force and torture as in the inquisition.

(3) Here the argument breaks. A civil tyrant might conceivably imprison a pope and prevent him from performing his spiritual functions, but no compulsion could possibly force him to misuse his spiritual powers in the interest of his sovereign's political projects. A weak pope might yield to pressure, but an equally weak pope would be still more likely to abuse his temporal power if he were an independent sovereign. The very illustrations cited prove the opposite of what was intended. Napoleon's attempt to coerce Pius VII was a notable failure, and where Napoleon failed another ruler would not be likely to succeed. In another connection Archbishop Ireland says: "Napoleon writhed in anger before a captive pope, who held firmly to his spiritual prerogatives." Here is a proof from history that a pope can preserve his spiritual freedom without being "in every respect his own master."

(4) A guarantee of freedom to perform spiritual functions, such as the guarantee which the papacy now enjoys, is no more liable to be revoked than independent sovereignty is to be taken away by force, as it was indeed taken away in the pontificate of Pius IX.

(5) The pope as sovereign of an independent state would be in far greater danger of losing his world-wide influence than he is under the present arrangement. As a sovereign the pope would have his political allies and his political enemies. It was so in the past. In the Middle Ages the prevalent conception of universal monarchy made it possible for the popes to exercise a world-wide spiritual sovereignty in spite of their position as Italian princes, just as the same conception enabled the emperors of the Holy Roman Empire to make good their claim to universal temporal sovereignty in spite of their status as German princes. But the rising tide of modern national feeling made it impossible for either emperor or pope to preserve the combination of local and universal sovereignty. The emperor gave up the universal, the pope gave up the local. And local and universal will never again be united.

(6) Suppose some future pope should declare ex cathedra that the present status of the papacy—which is the same that it occupied for the first seven centuries of its existence, if we begin the count with Peter—is entirely satisfactory and that temporal sovereignty is undesirable. Archbishop Ireland would then be in the awkward position of characterizing an infallible pope as "an unwise and unjust steward." And what about the popes of those seven centuries who never protested against a position which the advocates of temporal sovereignty now define as "slavery"? Were they, too, unwise and unjust stewards?

In reality, Leo XIII had, and Pius X has, a degree of temporal sovereignty which quite meets the requirements, even if one should concede every point of Archbishop Ireland's very unconvincing argument. His kingdom is a small one, but it is large enough to give him perfect freedom within its bounds. The boundaries of that kingdom are the boundaries of the Vatican palace and grounds and St. Peter's cathedral. Within that territory the King of Italy is virtually a foreigner—or would be if he ever came. The pope is supreme. This little kingdom has its own international postal and telegraph service and its own standing army. In proportion to its area, it probably has more wealth than any other spot on the globe, but it pays no taxes. The laws of Italy are not binding there, for there is no means of enforcing them. The soldiers and police officers of the king cannot enter that territory. If local temporal sovereignty is necessary as a basis for universal spiritual dominion, what more could reasonably be asked than this?

Brevities.

The assassination of the French premier, M. Combes, was attempted by an Italian anarchist at Marseilles on Sunday, Aug. 9.

Macedonia is again aflame with revolution. The Russian consul at Monastir has been killed by a Turkish soldier, who, according to one account, had considerable provocation.

President Roosevelt has written a letter to Governor Durbin, of Indiana, thanking him for his action in handling the recent riot at Evansville, and discussing at some length the matter of lynching.

The British House of Lords has been violently debating the Irish Land Bill and has attached some amendments to it. The Irish lords (that is, English lords with Irish estates) are strong against the bill.

Senator Tillman says the Fifteenth Amendment must be repealed. There would be 30,000 more negro voters than white voters in South Carolina if the Constitution were enforced. "That means about 30,000, and as many more as will give the whites a majority, will have to be sent to the land where voting is not among the pleasures. There is only one negro man in a hundred that can stand an education. Somebody has got to pound it into their heads that they were put on earth to pick cotton." We quote this as a sample of what the good people of the south do not think. Senator Tillman ought to emigrate to one of the peonage counties of Alabama.

A Parallel on the Union Question.

One of the very best of our denominational exchanges is the Central Christian Advocate, formerly of St. Louis, but now of Kansas City. We see far more in it to commend than to criticise, but we desire to refer to a recent editorial it contains, entitled, "Epworth League and Christian Endeavor" in order to "point a moral and adorn a tale." The editor is commenting upon the sentiment expressed in the Christian Endeavor Convention in Denver, in favor of bringing the young people of all the churches, including those of the Epworth League, into one great interdenominational organization, and says: "The delegates were magnanimous enough to express the view that everybody should come over and unite with them. Magnanimous, indeed!" Referring to Dr. Clarke's suggestion that there might be union of all the young people in Christian Endeavor, just as in the Sunday-school work, the editor says:

We fail to discern wherein an argument can be built up from the Sunday-school system which is conclusive one way or another, or can even serve as illustrative, as regards the swallowing up of the Epworth League by the Society of Christian Endeavor. So far as that is concerned, it would seem that if it seems wise to have some single omnipresent organization of the young Christians of the world, it would be well to appoint commissioners from the various organizations now existing, to take into consideration the practicability of union, the basis of union, the constitution local and general of the proposed union and the name of the proposed union. So far as unions are concerned, generally they have been brought about by mutual compromise at least on things non-essential. It would seem reasonable to expect that some such overtures would at least be suggested if the conventions of the Society of Christian Endeavor would gather in the three million Epworth Leaguers, obliterate its literature, destroy its great periodical, and rob the Methodist Episcopal Church of the inspiration of its name and the enthusiasm of its life. We have not heard of such a proceeding at the convention which magnanimously voted to take us into union, as the lion took in the lamb, or as Jonah united with the whale.

So, the Christian Endeavor movement is here treated as a strictly denominational organization, and is called upon to make concessions as if it had not been formed originally with the special aim of being broad enough to include the young people of all religious bodies, and just as if it did not now contain the young people of a large number of the different religious bodies, working together harmoniously. This is the parallel to which we refer. In the early part of the last century a movement was inaugurated, having for its supreme aim the union of all God's people. As the basis of such union it proposed the surrender of all party names and party creeds, and the acceptance of the New Testament names and confession of faith, with the Bible alone as the rule of faith and practice. Into this union came men out of every religious body in Christendom, yielding their denominational names, their denominational creeds and conforming their faith and practice to the New Testament alone.

It often happens that in discussing the subject of union, our religious neighbors forget or fail to recognize this fact. Those who choose to be known simply as Disciples of Christ, or Christians, became such by agreeing to occupy common ground and making nothing a test of fellowship that is not made such in the New Testament. They do not claim to have fully apprehended that for which they were apprehended by Christ, or to have attained the ideal basis of union, but they do claim to have made some substantial progress in that direction, and are following on to know the truth still more perfectly, and are ready to accept any modifications in their plea for union when it is shown that such modifications are required by the New Testament. But to ask us to make concessions in order to unity as if we had not already conceded all we believe we have a right to concede, is like the Epworth League asking the Christian Endeavor Society to meet it half way in order to union.

If uniting with the Christian Endeavor movement, on its broad basis, the Epworth League is thereby put in the same relation to Christian Endeavor as the lamb to the lion, or as Jonah to the whale, what does our contemporary think of the rest of us who constitute a part of the Christian Endeavor army, and find therein all the liberty for Christian activity which we need? Why are the Methodist young people "swallowed up" any more than Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Disciples of Christ, and many others?

The Advocate illustrates its view of what is proper in the situation by the great rivers, the Mississippi, the Missouri and the Detroit, having different sources but a common destiny. "Each stream has his own service to perform; each seeks the same ocean. Why should we not let them alone?" If it were perfectly clear that God formed the denominational channels and intended His people to remain separate and distinct religious movements, as He formed the channels of the great rivers, intending each to pursue its own course to the sea, the problem would be easily solved, and the question, "Why should we not let them alone?" would be pertinent. But with the Master's prayer pleading for the union of His disciples, and with the whole New Testament pointing to one source of one great stream of Christian thought and life and activity, the question seems to us rather to be, Why should we divide what God has united, and separate into many parts what He intended to be one?

Remember Church Extension Sunday, Sept. 6. Don't be afraid of too many collections. A good church can't be killed that way. A good church is like a good cow—the oftener you milk 'em the more they give.

Not a Question of Consistency but of Charity.

The editor of the Christian Standard replies to our brief editorial entitled "A Glimpse Into History," in a somewhat lengthy article entitled "A Question of Consistency." There are a few misapprehensions in our brother editor's article which we beg leave to correct.

In the first place it was not simply the charge of inconsistency in the sense that his view to-day is not what it was a few years ago. Every growing man changes his point of view and sees many questions in a different light. But there was, in the case of the editor of the Standard, a sudden reaction from a too advanced view, as many of us conceived, to what is an equally belated view. This was a phenomenon that seemed to call for some explanation. That this change of view took place "years before he had any editorial connection with the Standard," as the editor states, is not in harmony with what had been our understanding of the facts from statements by others. But of course we accept the editor's statement.

Again, the editor is wrong in supposing that this "Glimpse Into History" was taken "to break the force of the Standard's array of facts and arguments relating to the teachings of the Berkeley Bible Seminary." The fact is it had no special reference to that particular attack of the Standard, but rather to the editor's general attitude toward his brethren who chance to differ from him in matters of opinion. It had more special reference to the editor's position on Church Federation than to any other one question. It was a little remarkable that a man who was in favor, a few years ago, of receiving his pedobaptist brethren into fellowship without immersion, should now oppose being federated with other religious bodies in order to co-operate in such things as they mutually agree upon. Those of his brethren who favor such co-operation without lowering their banner in the least, are criticised by him with a severity which hardly comports with that charity which one should feel who himself had but recently been astray in the same direction. We read, in the New Testament, of a man, who, having been forgiven a large debt, immediately imprisoned one of his fellow servants who owed him a small amount, and refused to forgive him. Those who receive charity ought to extend it to others.

Concerning the nature of the Standard editor's departure, he says:

In earlier discussions in the Missouri Christian Lectureship, on Christian unity, the present editor at that time held that if agreement among evangelical churches were reached on every other point, and certain brethren of these churches fully accepted the plea of union in Christ according to the New Testament platform, but still held that their sprinkling was valid baptism and that therefore they could not conscientiously be immersed, we should accept these persons with the understanding that immersion should be the only practice of the united church. In presenting this suggestion, it was urged that this was what was done when those who were called "The Reformers," under the leadership of John Smith, and the Christians, or "Stoneites," under the leadership of Barton W. Stone, united in Kentucky and elsewhere in the early days of the Reformation. To further justify this position, attention was called to the concession made by a great many brethren, that these people, who thought they had been baptized and therefore declined to be immersed, were Christians without any limitations whatever. On this the argument was based that it was permissible to receive them into the fellowship, especially in view of the unity of practice which would have been agreed upon for all time to come. It will be seen that this whole discussion was not one of actual conditions, but of a contingency that might arise, and had reference to a general and not a local situation. The error of the position was in the premise rather than in the conclusion. When brethren conceded the whole sum of Christian life and character to the unbaptized, they could not, and cannot, escape the conclusion which has been reached in the lecture-ship discussion just referred to. In passing, occasion is taken to say that in reconsidering the whole subject, the error in the argument that lurked in the minor premise, as expressed in the undue concessions to unbaptized persons, was discovered, and the erroneous opinion given up. That is, it was found that too much had been conceded with respect to the full Christian character of unbaptized persons, and of course the argument based on this concession fell to the ground.

The editor does not state his former position as we understood it at the time, and as we think it was generally understood. The only "contingency" mentioned in the discussion referred to was that those sprinkled should be satisfied with their baptism and desire to unite with any of our churches. We say this was our understanding of his position, but again we allow the editor the benefit of his own explanation. We need not refer to the distinction between the differences of opinion which were overlooked in the case of the "Reformers" and the Christian Connection in Kentucky, and the matter of dispensing with an ordinance of Jesus Christ.

The editor now conceives his error to have been in "the undue concessions to unbaptized persons"—that is that "too much had been conceded with respect to the full Christian character of unbaptized persons." It would be interesting if Brother Lord had stated just what change his mind has undergone in reference to that "minor premise" affecting the Christian character of the pious unimmersed. He certainly did not claim then that they had obeyed, in proper form, the command to be baptized. Does he believe now that those who have not been immersed are wanting in Christian faith, in Christian spirit and in Christian life? The only ground we urged then, and the only ground we can urge today, for refusing membership in our local congregations to the unbaptized, is that it sets aside one of the conditions of church membership in the New Testament Church, and brings into neglect an ordinance which bears solemn testimony to the divinity of Christ by its symbolic representation of His burial and resurrection, and to the reality of the change in the individual life, by its representation of the believer's death to sin and his resurrection to newness of life. We did not then, and do not now, call in question the Christian character, the honesty and the devotion of the thousands of consecrated believers who have accepted substitutes for the New Testament baptism. It is not a question of their salvation, but it is a question of our salvation and of our usefulness as reformers, if we depart from following the light as we have received the light, and cease to be faithful to the dispensation of truth which God has committed to us.

If Brother Lord has gone from the extreme of being willing to waive this ordinance in certain cases, to the other extreme of denying the Christian character and life of those who have not seen their duty as respects baptism as we see it, his last error is worse than the first, for it is a defect in charity rather than in judgment. It ought to be clear enough to any capable and candid mind that we cannot assume the position of denying the Christian character and worth of those who are mistaken, from our point of view, on the subject of baptism. Is it not equally clear that we must be loyal to the truth as God has given us to see the truth, and loyal to our providential mission in restoring the New Testament Church, with its creed, its ordinances and its life? There are those who find it difficult to harmonize these two positions, and feel that in accepting the one they must surrender the other. But they forget that the very conception of our religious movement, as a movement for the union of Christians on the New Testament basis of fellowship, involves both these points—the charity which recognizes the Christian character of others "who follow not with us," and the fidelity to truth which stands uncompromisingly for the New Testament basis of fellowship and unity.

Macatawa Musings.

Fortunately no one state has a monopoly of beautiful scenery and attractive places of resort. Missouri, which abounds in almost everything which man needs for his comfort and happiness, has within its limits some charming bits of natural scenery which fill and satisfy the eye of nature's lovers. "Blue Spring Lodge" is such a spot. It is located about seventy miles southwest of St. Louis, and six miles east of the railroad town of Bourbon, on the Frisco, at the junction of Blue Spring Creek and the Meramec River. It is a place carved out by nature for a spring, summer and autumn resort, and even a winter's residence there would, we imagine, possess features of rare interest. Those majestic bluffs along the Meramec where the river has cut its way down to its present bed by long ages of erosion, command a splendid view of winding river far below, flowing through an opening of lofty trees gracefully bending over it, of peaceful valleys, now full of tasseling corn and shocks of ripening wheat, with a narrow rim of blue hills against the distant horizon. Three of us had climbed the hill back of the Lodge to its summit and had then followed its crest until we reached the precipitous bluffs, where we paused and gazed with admiring wonder at the scene spread out before us.

While we stood thus entranced by the vision, we heard voices far below us, and looking down we saw a party of guests from the Lodge bathing in the Meramec. A pebbly beach gradually deepens into a good swimming depth, and the current makes easy swimming down stream and the walking is good coming back—much better than the swimming. We called to them, and having attracted their attention requested one of the party to meet us with a row boat further down the river where the shore-line descends from the bluff to the valley. Embarking in this row boat we saw as we passed up the stream the same perpendicular bluffs from which we had looked upon a scene not excelled in beauty perhaps by that which Moses beheld with undimmed vision from Mt. Nebo. While these majestic cliffs, seamed and scarred by the storms of ages, constitute the grander features of the scene, Blue Spring Creek, known in former neighborhood parlance as "Thickety Creek," with its musical notes as it goes laughing along over a pebbly bottom, winding its way through the valley and under the over-arching trees and green shrubbery, adds a feature of quiet beauty which give perfection to the picture. The beautiful rainbow trout which inhabit this stream are, to the eye of the angler, the crowning feature of beauty.

Here, in the log-built Lodge on the banks of Blue Spring Creek, on Lord's day evening, we preached to a little audience made up chiefly of the guests at the Lodge, from St. Louis, and a few of the native population. It was the first discourse ever preached in the place, and, so far as we could learn, the first ever preached in that immediate neighborhood. There were no hymn books, but the guests sang heartily some of the old familiar hymns, which they seemed to enjoy. They listened, too, most attentively, as we talked to them about Jesus of Nazareth, and what He came to do for our humanity, and how He met and satisfied the deepest and most abiding wants of our human nature. It was a sort of dedication of the Lodge as a place of resort for rest and recreation for those who wish to escape not only the hurry and noise, but the moral abominations of the city and breathe the pure air untainted with the vices which curse our city life. We are authorized to say that only decent, temperate and self-respecting people are wanted as guests at this Lodge, and that drinkers, gamblers and disorderly persons of any kind need not apply. At present it is quite a family resort, and this is likely to be its permanent character. Most people must take their recreation and rest near their homes and places of business, and these care less for style than for the freedom and comfort of a lodge or camp in the hill country.

During our flying trip into Missouri we spent a couple of days in St. Louis, at the old familiar desk. Everybody about the CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING COMPANY seemed to be busy and happy as well. THE CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is reported to be making new friends all the while while holding its old ones with a stronger grip. The Sunday-school and book departments know no summer paralysis, but are busy filling orders and supplying the demand for good literature. The latest output in the book department is a handsome volume by George Hamilton Combs, entitled "Christ in Modern English Literature." It is the very finest kind of literature itself, and deals in a most vigorous and incisive manner with the great authors of English literature, in respect to their attitude to the Christ of the New Testament. We read it crossing the lake on Thursday in a rolling vessel, with a heavy sea, without experiencing a symptom of mal de mer. We recommend it as an excellent preventive of seasickness. St. Louis is all activity. Great commercial buildings and hotels are rising, as if by magic, and the Ivory City, out in Forest Park, is growing steadily into a wonderful scene of architectural symmetry and beauty. What shall we, the Disciples of Christ, do in that greatest of the world's expositions to further the cause which we represent, and which we believe has in it so much to bless mankind? What sort of an exhibit shall we make and how shall it be done? We shall be glad to have personal letters from any one who has a practical suggestion on this subject addressed to us here at the lakeside.

Notes and Comments.

Bro. Grafton's article on "The Preacher at Forty," published elsewhere in this issue, is the best study of the dead-line problem that we have seen. Sometimes, as he says, it is all the fault of the churches. But it is true that the preacher has peculiar temptations to discouragement, to sloth, to self-esteem, to cant. That so few preachers comparatively yield to these temptations to any great degree, shows their high average of consecration and also the power of the grace of God. But the temptations exist, nevertheless, and they find their victims. The preacher at forty and the preacher who expects some day to be forty, will do well to guard against these dangers.

Those are very gracious and appreciative words which our friends have been saying recently about the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, some of which we have printed. What enhances the value of these testimonials is the broad-minded, large-hearted men who give them. It was a trenchant saying of a modern politician concerning a presidential candidate: "We love him because of the enemies he has made." No less true is it that any religious paper may safely be judged by the kind of enemies and the kind of friends which it makes. Whatever else the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST may have to be ashamed of, it "points with pride" to its friends as the best exponent of its spirit and aim. No greater spur to highest endeavor to be worthy of such praise, could the paper and its editors receive.

Dr. Amory H. Bradford writing on "Criticism vs. Experience" in the New York Observer, gives this true testimony to the value of Christian experience as attesting the divine character of Christianity and of Christian institutions:

The Christian experience has never been touched by criticism, and its testimony may be trusted by all who are seeking a secure support for their faith. I have long felt that I must have a basis for my faith which is entirely independent of the possible results of criticism. Criticism has to do with form only. A flower may be analyzed and criticised, but no amount of study can touch the life which manifests itself in that flower. The Church, the Bible, all Christian institutions may be subjected to critical processes, but the spiritual life can only be recognized. The life has been manifested in experiences which no scholarly processes can eliminate from the history of individuals or the race.

When the man who was born blind had his eyes opened by Jesus, he was not able to give a critical account of the wonderful personality who had healed him, but this he did know and could testify, that, "Whereas I was blind, now I see." All the logic, all the philosophy and all the theology of the Pharisees could not convince him that the man who did this for him was an impostor and a deceiver. Blessed is the man who has such a basis for his personal faith.

"About this time," as the old almanac-makers used to say, look out for the signals for the great national convention in the autumn. A quiet, and yet systematic and thorough preparation, is going on at Detroit for the entertainment of the great hosts that shall gather there in October next in national convention. It is time, therefore, that the thoughts of the brotherhood throughout the country should be turned toward this great annual convocation, and to all that appertains thereto. If there are unpaid subscriptions or pledges, they should be sent into the secretaries so as to appear in their annual reports. And then there should be serious thinking and praying by all who are interested in the progress of our cause as to what can be done to make that great national assembly speak its mightiest message to the world. Those who have been assigned places on the program are no doubt giving their best thought to the various subjects they are asked to discuss. But there is much to be done, at these conventions, aside from making and listening to splendid addresses. We trust that the ideal which the Detroit brethren have in mind may be realized in gathering a representative body of the Disciples of Christ; that is, a convention in which every section of the country and the various communities in these sections, shall be represented by delegates. State conventions should give attention to the selection of delegates to represent them—a custom which has fallen too much into neglect. We trust the General Board of Managers will issue information and instruction concerning the matter of delegates, so that there may be a more intelligent understanding as to the responsibility of voting and deciding questions of practical interest that may come before the convention.

Enthusiastic reports are still coming from the California convention at Santa Cruz. J. Durham writes: "It closed with a regular flood-tide. Have not missed a convention but once since I came, and this excelled them all. The best work was done last year and the number of delegates was the largest. The spirit of the convention was of the Lord. The whole convention unanimously stood by Prof. Van Kirk. He preached a sermon embodying all the disputed points. The same is in the Pacific Christian, July 16 and 23. He makes no uncertain sound, but shows himself sound to the core."

The Religious Herald (Baptist) says some sensible things about preparation for the ministry, and urges young men to take time for it. An old preacher, regretting that he did not take time for proper preparation, is quoted as saying:

"I could not bear the thought that the world was perishing for me while I was practically wasting my time in giving it to studies which could not, as it seemed to me then, greatly aid me as a pastor. But I soon found when the pinch came that instead of the world perishing for me I was myself in danger of perishing (starving) for lack of something to do. There were plenty of churches without pastors, but somehow they did not take to me. They were poor churches, but they did not wish a poor preacher. When too late to correct my blunder I ascertained that the world was not perishing for me, and for two score years I have gone through the world with a limp as an object lesson of the folly of a young college student who fancies that the world is perishing for him."

The Strength of the Hills is His Also

By F. D. Power

"The light of the sun, the blue of the sky, the splendor of the sea, the peace of the everlasting hills, the song of birds, the wholesome flavor of good food, the delight of action and motion, the refreshment of sleep, the charm of music, the blessings of human love and friendship—rejoice in all these without fear or misgiving, because they come from God, and because Christ has sanctified them all by his presence and touch."

This is a passage from Henry Van Dyke's sermon before the Presbyterian General Assembly as retiring moderator in May last at Los Angeles. It is sound doctrine which many need to hear. "Knowing and Doing, Joy and Power," was the preacher's theme. The Holy Scriptures are full of such teaching concerning the goodness of God in nature and the duty of praising him for all his works. "The heavens declare the glory of God and the firmament showeth his handiwork; day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge."

The divine nature is bound up with the names of mountains, rivers, forests. The Hebrews speak of "the mountains of God." They saw in them the unchangeableness of the Almighty. Nothing in nature seems so steadfast and immutable as the eternal hills. God has set them fast, girding them with power, so that no arm less than his can remove them out of place. Rising before us in awful and unchanging majesty they tell with the roar of a thousand torrents, with the voice of ten thousand thunders that God changes not, that with him there is no variableness nor shadow of turning. Here is consolation. Life's trials are severe. The world's temptations are many. Human hearts have conflicts that are grievous. Alone the soul can not stand against its opposing hosts. In such a condition we exclaim with David: "I will look off to the hills whence cometh my help."

God who is the Creator of the world is the Keeper of his people. The soul sees him above the mountains. These pyramids of nature suggest one who presides above all earthly heights. Beyond the masses of earth and stone, snow and forest crowned, are range on range of celestial summits above the reach of all cloud and storm. Not the high points of earth, the Rockies or Alleghanies, the Alps or Himalayahs, but the sublimer heights of the eternal kingdom are within the range of the eye of faith. Troubled children of God, needy, heavy-laden, wandering and unsatisfied ones are to drop their burden here. Unhappy people, afflicted ones, lost souls are to lift their eyes above themselves, beyond their sorrows, away from the world and see the eternal fastnesses of Almighty power, and upon the glowing steep of omniscient wisdom find deliverance. "Unto Thee lift I up mine eyes, O Thou that dwellest in the heavens. Behold as the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters and the eyes of a maiden unto the hands of her mistress, so our eyes wait upon the Lord our God until he have mercy upon us."

There is no other help. The world has no support to offer perishing men and women. Take the most precious and substantial of its treasures and they are nothing even to the eternity of the mountains. The most beautiful of its most beautiful things are but short lived. Look at her cities. Babylon once stood among the nations as a queen of unrivalled power and grandeur. So rich was it, so mighty, so vast, so magnificent, that we could not believe history now but for the ruins of ancient cities of the East which show there must have been works of men stupendous and beautiful in past ages. Coming down to later times take "the Queen of the Adriatic." The traveler sees nothing lovelier than Venice. It fills him with rapture. He comes away with crowded memories of sunsets emblazoned in gold and crimson upon cloud and water, of violet domes and bell towers etched against the orange of the western sky; of moonlight silvering, breeze-rippled breadths of liquid blue; of distant islands shining in sun-litter haze; of music and black-gliding boats; of labyrinthine darkness made for the mysteries of love and crime; of statue-fretted palace fronts; of brazen clangor and moving crowds and canvasses of earth's proudest painters cased in gold on the walls of council chambers where Venice sat enthroned; where nobles swept the floors with robes of Tyrian brocade, and fair women dazzled the world. He thinks before he climbs the tower of St. Mark's or reclines in dreamy languor in the silently moving gondola that threads its way between marble palaces, such colors, such skies, such effects as Turner's pictures show could not be possible, must be the dream of an artist, but now it is real. Yet all these impressions are attended with the ever present sense of loneliness and silence, the sadness of a limitless horizon, the solemnity of the unbroken arch of heaven, the calm and grey-ness of evening on the lagoons, and above all, the pathos of a marble city crumbling to its grave in mud and brine.

Babylon has passed out so long its history seems a myth. Venice hurries in the same direction. In our great western land we have proud cities—young yet, babes in years. We gaze upon their superb structures, we thread their throbbing thoroughfares, we contemplate their increasing activity with pride, but New York and Chicago and Washington must follow Venice as Venice, Babylon, and yet the same mountains that looked down upon Philip and Powhatan look down upon us, and shall upon generations long after we are gone, as the Alps and Taurian hills looked down upon the valleys and proud cities of Europe and Asia and change not.

God ever lives. The word of his promise is even more unchangeable than the everlasting hills. The mountains shall depart and the hills be removed, but his kindness shall not depart, neither shall the peace of his covenant be removed. Then the mountains tell of God's resources. These barren piles may seem cumberers of the ground, useless barriers to movements of nations, yet they mean life, health and subsistence to millions. The precious things of the everlasting hills fill the treasuries of nations and send blessings from their storehouses to the habitations of men. Level the Andes and South America would become a desert. Erase the Alps from the map of Europe and the banks of the Rhone, Po, and the Rhine would be smitten with desolation. Hurl the Rockies into the Pacific and the Valley of the Mississippi would become a Sahara. Mountains supply sources for the rivers that lend fertility to the soil and beauty to the landscape, condense clouds from the air and pour down refreshing rain on the parched lands, produce currents in the atmosphere and send from their snowy heights bracing winds that sweep away infection, yield up from their treasure houses precious gems, silver and gold, and what is better, coal and iron to serve the children of men. How vast the provision God has made here for his creatures!

And the strength of the hills—what protection they have afforded to his people! How the Waldereses defied the armies of kings and emperors amid the solitudes of the Alps! How they sang their hymns of lofty cheer:

"For the strength of the hills we bless Thee
Our God, our father's God.
Thou hast made thy children mighty
By the touch of the mountain sod.
Thou has fixed our ark of refuge
Where the spoiler's feet ne'er trod.
For the strength of the hills we bless Thee
Our God, our father's God!

The banner of the chieftain
Far, far below us waves,
The war horse of the spearman
Can not reach our lofty caves.
Thy dark clouds wrap the threshold
Of freedom's last abode.
For the strength of the hills we bless Thee
Our God, our father's God."

So the Rock of Ages is a refuge from every peril, a hiding place from every storm, an unfailing source of grace to all the millions that seek its protection.

New York's Hotel Chaplain

Guests, Patrons and Friends of this Hotel wishing the services of a clergyman are respectfully informed that they may call upon Rev. Dr. H. M. Warren, the Hotel Chaplain. He will be pleased to render any kind of pastoral service, regardless of creed, nationality or residence. Communications may be sent to the above address any hour of the day or night. Telephone call, 225-79th street.

any one. The hotel chaplain said, "Such a thing as this shall never occur again if I can prevent it." So he began to work, and in a few days mapped out the present plan.

That plan as now put into operation has back of it an organized Hotel Chaplain's Society, including such prominent men as Messrs. Simeon Ford, H. H. Brockway, E. A. Darling, Dr. R. S. MacArthur, Dr. C. H. Parkhurst, Dr. David H. Greer, Dr. Charles Cuthbert Hall, Dr. Donald Sage Mackay, Dr. George C. Lorimer, Bishop E. G. Andrews, and others. This society forms an advisory committee, assisting the chaplain in any way possible, and also doing what they can to bring the attention of the traveling public to his readiness to render services within his sphere.

The work is supported by voluntary contributions. The chaplain's society is confident that philanthropic friends and wealthy beneficiaries will provide the necessary funds for this work. The chaplain never asks for money of those who send for him. In fact, some cases need financial help themselves. Very often hotel suicides are caused by some fatal turn in the wheel of fortune, leaving the victims in poverty and despair.

Dr. Warren has been the means of preventing self-destruction in several instances. On one occasion a man who had lost all hope and spirit because of business and domestic troubles, decided to go to the Hudson river and end his life. He locked up his room and started. Passing out through the hotel corridor his eye fell upon the card at the head of this article. He stopped, thought a moment and said, "That man might give me some hope; I will seek him." He did so with the result that his life was not destroyed. He was restored to his family. His fortune was regained, and to-day he is a prosperous and a happy Christian man.

At the time of the terrible fire at the Windsor Hotel in New York, with its awful destruction of human life, Dr. Warren did much to aid the living and comfort and console the dying. Immediately after that great fire, Dr. Warren sent a card to all the hotels in New York expressing his willingness to devote a certain portion of his time gratuitously to ministering to the spiritual needs of their guests, as exigencies might require. Many of the hotel men gladly accepted the offer and sent for Dr. Warren as the needs of their guests required. And ever since the field of his operation has enlarged until it consumes most all the chaplain's time. Some days more calls come to him for service than he can attend to.

The nature of his work is manifold.

The field of operation is as broad and as varied as the sins and suffering of the human race. Sometimes he is called to perform a hurried marriage ceremony upon which important questions, legal and social, depend. Frequently his services are needed for funeral services, amid the most heart-rending and distracting circumstances. A loved one has suddenly died while in New York, or perhaps passed away on an incoming steamer, or was fatally murdered, and a minister is needed to give counsel and speak words of comfort and hope. Very often strangers become suddenly ill while away from home, and desire the spiritual ministries of a servant of Christ. In many instances they fear it would be an intrusion to request a call from some busy pastor who is also a total stranger. It is a pity, however, that many people so think about ministers of the gospel, who as a rule are ready day or night to counsel and comfort those in pain or sorrow of body or mind. Occasionally one seeks to obey the Lord in Christian baptism while away from home in our great city, having had the duty deeply impressed upon them in a sermon or some circumstance. Dr. Warren is willing to arrange for such a service and administer the ordinance or have some other minister do so.

Not a few people make their home in the New York hotels. Some of these are not able to get to church services, and yet they are anxious to have the comforts of religious services. The chaplain is called often to conduct private devotional services in the apartments of such persons. And in such instances great good frequently results.

A large field adjoining this, and into which Dr. Warren often is called, is among the patients of the hospitals. Now he devotes all his time and strength exclusively to the spiritual welfare of strangers in New York. The careless are often brought into vital touch with the church, as a result of his ministry. Dr. Warren's address is 171 East Eighty-first Street, New York City, where anyone in need of his service can reach him night or day.

It would be a good thing, indeed, if ministers in cities would look after the spiritual needs of strangers within their gates. It may be easier to enforce Christian duties upon some natures when away from home ties and surroundings. The fact that a stranger cares for one's soul is calculated to cause one to consider their duty to Christ and society.

Most men who are really accomplishing anything in life learned the meaning of work before they were out of their teens. The vacation season is the time to teach boys and girls who play the rest of the year how to work in the woods or on the farm. There is virtue in chores.—Christendom.

Here is something unique. This card, printed in attractive style, hangs in a conspicuous place in many of the best hotels in New York City, and represents an office which, it is believed, does not exist elsewhere in the world. My long-time friend, who holds this peculiar office of New York Hotel Chaplain, was for seven years pastor of the Central Park Baptist Church, from which he resigned only a short time since. During Dr. Warren's ministry in that church, more than two hundred persons were received into its fellowship, and a large mortgage indebtedness was paid off. He was the organizer of the now famous Bible class of the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, presided over by Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr. It was during Dr. Warren's pastorate in the Central Park Baptist Church that the eccentric millionaire, Joseph Richardson, who was a member there, died, leaving the church, and also the pastor, several thousand dollars each.

The chaplain is some thirty-five years of age and comes of sterling New England stock. He is the youngest son of the late Senator Joseph Warren, of New Hampshire, and a direct descendant of Joseph Warren, of Bunker Hill fame.

When asked about the needs and promises of this large and peculiar field of service, he says the work was forced upon him some years ago by the following incident, which he related:

"One evening, a well-known business man was taken suddenly ill while staying at a certain Broadway hotel. The physician called in, soon saw that he had but a few hours to live, and told him so. A perfect stranger, far away from his family and friends, and all his affairs, and conscious that they were beyond his reach, the thoughts of the dying man turned toward the life to come, and he asked for a minister. A messenger was sent posthaste. The first minister was too busy, the second too sick to leave his house, a third out of the city. The search was continued, but without success; something preventing in each case, and before he could return, the sufferer passed into the valley of shadows, his dying wish ungratified."

Here was a stranger in a strange city, dying, with scores and scores of ministers all around him, and yet he was unable to obtain the services of

The Preacher at Forty

By T. W. Grafton

Dr. Collyer tells of an hour spent at a railway station down in Kentucky with a good old colored man. The conversation was naturally about preachers, "Wall, sah, de Lawd miout call some niggers ter preach," remarked Uncle Jack, "but it sorter 'peers to me dat whar de Lawd calls one man, laziness calls er dozen. Nine nigger preachers outen ten is de lazies' puzzons in the world, sah." Then after a pause he added, "You see I knows case Ise a preacher mahself, sah."

If I should say some unpleasant things about the preacher at forty, I feel that I am at least as competent to pronounce judgment as the colored preacher, for I have myself crossed the fatal line that so often marks the limit to ministerial usefulness.

There is an underlying reason for the preference of churches for younger men that is not always mercenary. As a rule our church leaders are anxious for the growth of the cause. Even if they are not always ready to put their own hands to the burden, they want a pastor who has in him the elements of success. They are anxious that he have the hearty good will of the congregation, that the young people of the church like him and that he stand well with the community at large. Without this co-operation and support they recognize that his influence for good will be minimized and the fruit of his ministry blighted.

Now somewhere near the line of forty, certain dangers come in that often limit, if not entirely destroy, the minister's usefulness. And it is because he sometimes yields to these dangers that he is forced into retirement at a time when, from the standpoint of wisdom and experience, he ought to be able to do his best work.

One of these is the danger of becoming pessimistic, and carrying about with him an atmosphere of gloom. As he entered his ministry, young and fresh and buoyant, he anticipated an easy conquest for the gospel he preached. He believed his book, was conscious of his own powers, had faith in human nature. He felt that all that was necessary was to preach faithfully the word, work untiringly and reap the harvest. He confidently expected to see in his own time the overthrow of every form of evil and the salvation of the world.

At forty, as he pauses to look backward after fifteen or twenty years of consecrated effort, his heart becomes sick. The triumph of the kingdom is apparently no nearer than when he dedicated his own talents to its holy cause. He has discovered a vein of human weakness that his inexperienced eye, at the beginning of his ministry had not detected. The chasm between the profession and practice of religion yawns at him. Those whom he trusted were faithless. The church was often dominated by a spirit of worldliness that neutralized his best efforts. Church members showed a selfishness that stifled his own generosity, an indifference that paralyzed his energy. In the meantime a change has taken place in his own attitude. He does not preach with his old time positiveness, has even begun to doubt the power of the gospel and question the promises of God. He lives in an atmosphere of hopelessness and has lost the sunshine and buoyancy of his nature. The church is not slow in detecting this pessimistic strain, and passes him by for the courageous, expectant young leader, whose very atmosphere of optimism inspires hope and breathes life into the dry bones that slumber in the pews.

Another danger is idleness. It is not peculiar to the preacher, but the preacher has peculiar temptations to become an idler. Only strong men, whatever their profession, could resist if given his privilege. He has no fixed hours of labor like the merchant or banker or mechanic. He is his own boss and timekeeper. If his sermons are passable and if he looks after the odds and ends of his church work, that is all his congregation concern themselves about. How many hours he studies, how many hours he sleeps, how much of his time is spent in going from house to house in the Master's work, and how much in lounging about, he alone knows. It is, therefore, an easy thing for him to fall into slothful habits. There is a temptation to use old sermons, neglect the study and limit pastoral obligations. His ministry thus loses its power and freshness.

At forty, unless the preacher has cultivated industry and kept himself busy with books and men and affairs, the habit of indolence will have gained such mastery over him as to disqualify him for aggressive service.

A third element of danger is imperiousness. At the very beginning of his ministry he discovers a respect for his position that readily yields to his wishes in many things. He knows, or is supposed to know, his Bible better than any of his parishioners. He is regarded as a specialist in the various lines of religious work, to whose judgment deference must be paid, until he becomes the victim of pampered self-will. That which was yielded to him at the beginning as a courtesy, he comes to demand as a vested right. To question his judgment, to criticize his methods, or refuse to follow his suggestions, is to arouse his resentment and perhaps call forth his harshest utterance from the pulpit. He is soon on bad terms with his official board, and only yields at last when this independent American spirit refuses to submit to his dictatorial attitude and requests his resignation, leaving him to nurse his wounded self-pride and muse over the heartlessness of churches.

Now it is far from my thought to suggest that every preacher on the waiting list belongs to any of these classes. But that these are dangers to be met and mastered, I think every preacher who has passed the fateful line that marks the meridian of life, will bear me witness. To keep cheerful and hopeful, to be studious and industrious, to recognize the rights and privileges of others, is only possible to him who is always praying and striving for a meek and Christlike spirit. But if the victory over these personal dangers is won, there need be no dead line to activity and usefulness in the Master's service, short of ripe old age.

A BACK NUMBER

The Milk and Egg Diet.

Starving the patient who has a sick stomach, is an out of date treatment and no longer necessary with the predigested and nourishing food Grape-Nuts that the weakest stomach can handle and grow strong upon.

There is plenty of proof of this: "I had suffered from stomach trouble for six years, and for most of the last two years had been confined to my bed, the trouble having become chronic in spite of the very best medical attention. I had always been a coffee drinker, but for the past year I could not drink it at all because it made me so nervous I could not sleep and my appetite was almost entirely gone.

"Then some friend advised me to try the predigested food Grape-Nuts, and about three months ago I did so and since that time my improvement has been so rapid that my customers and friends are astonished, and every day some one remarks upon my changed condition. I have gained 15 pounds, sleep well, my appetite is good and my digestion is perfect. Where I have lived on milk and light diet for years, I now eat most anything I want and don't suffer any inconvenience either. The way Grape-Nuts food has built up my stomach and strengthened my nervous system particularly is just wonderful.

"I drink your food drink Postum too and no longer feel the want of coffee. There is absolutely no doubt that leaving off coffee and using Grape-Nuts and Postum has brought me out of my bed from an invalid back to fine health." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

"There's a reason," and that reason is plain to anyone who will spend a few minutes investigating in the interest of health.

In the Hot Season

By Adelaide Gail Frost

It is early June time and I know just how the shadows of the maples look on the campus green, and just how the roses' sweet fragrance lingers around the professor's gardens. Perhaps there has been a shower, and how the drops sparkle in the late afternoon sunshine! Coolness and greenness and glimpses of rose and snow-white and gold amidst the green, thank God for memories! And here? Do you hear the wind blowing fiercely without, is it autumn in the far east? Are November winds blowing? Surely I hear the rustle of dry, autumn leaves. No, the monsoon winds are blowing, hot as the breath of a furnace, angrily the fiery gusts shake the withered leaves of peepul and tamarind tree, and as you reluctantly go to the window you see the yellow glare without, the air is full of dust and the hot sunshine filters through it, a dull, yellow haze, but it makes your eyes shrink—such a stormy glare! But no other cloud than the dust cloud obscures the metallic heavens. Why is it that the sound of the punkah gently swaying overhead makes a little dull pain in your heart? It makes you comfortable shut in from that hot wind that scorches the broad banana leaves and flaps the palm branches, and why should that little, unreasoning pain come? You never heard just that sound at home, India's punkahs never cooled your brow as a child, it has no associations except that it reminds you of other hot seasons in India, of nights in the Jhansi railway station where the punkah simply agitates the hot air and makes you feel more that you are being boiled and less that you are being simmered. You have heard the punkah, too, through nights of watching and weariness and waiting, perhaps for a dreaded morning when disease shall have done its work on some poor form. You hear the scream of the "brain-fever bird," well named by frantic Englishmen, and then you hear a complaining cry. You go to the door and dare the actinic rays of the sun with all the other rays he may choose to pour down. From a house not far from you a native nurse shouts to the water-carrier to bring water. Your soul is hot within you that it should be necessary to call for refreshing for the feverish mouths. Two poor children are down there, and you may not go to them, they have smallpox. You stir up a refreshing drink and your assistant, who has had the loathsome disease, arranges so that the children are soon refreshed. You return to your own pretty room full of home tokens, pictures painted by loved hands, photographs of loved faces, books that have changed and deepened and helped your life, the clock that father gave you, articles full of mother's stitches, a rocking chair from home, prettiness and daintiness and coolness are there, but you never quite forget. Some one knocks on the window, you open the transom and a brown hand delivers the mail, small inland envelopes from missionaries, from necessity in the mountains, and longing to be down here with us for they know the joy of service. Here comes a woman to tell you that a young wife has been snake-bitten near, and you hasten to drop, with fingers that will tremble a little, fifteen drops of Lorbeer's snake-bite remedy in the cup, then fifteen more and soon until you think there are sufficient doses. A good Christian native hastens away to give the medicine properly, and pretty soon a boy comes to say she has come out of her unconscious state and is asking for water, and you assure him that she may have it safely. When she is able to sit up the Christian man comes back and tells you that she is a wife of fourteen or fifteen whose eyes were almost swollen shut with weeping, and had been so before she was bitten by the snake, and your heart is sad for the cruel lacerations of heathenism which Lorbeer's remedies cannot reach, and then your heart leaps up as you think of the remedy! Oh thank him again that you have not come to sad India without the remedy!

Oh this thirst, so thirsty all the time, you try to forget that you have even so much as seen ice! No, you never ate ice cream at a lawn fete nor rattled a crystal clear lump of coolness in a glass in your old home—it was some one else who did those things far back in the years!

It is evening now and the wet screen that closed your door and tempered the mind is taken out and once more you look out on the brown world of June in India.

The stars come out, and as you lie on your cot on the flat roof of the bungalow, you softly say the dear bit from "Evangeline" that you have recited looking through the maples of the west:

"One by one, in the infinite meadows of heaven,
Blossomed the lovely stars, the forget-me-nots of the angels."

You are glad you cannot see the dust haze, only a silver mist now in the bright moonlight; you wish there were only the stars, the moonlight seems hot and glaring and you try to find a shadow! Oh, the night sounds; sometimes you must awaken when a wedding procession goes clanging, banging by, not one "rest" in their entire "musical effort!" The moon is still glaring at you like the one eye of the ogre in the fairy story a Congressman told you back in old Minnesota, but he was not a Congressman then. What a medley! An elephant trumpets, dog barks, jackals yelp, camels bellow, monkeys whoop, watchman shout, a woman screams, owls hoot, cattle bellow, and our horses snort in derision of it all. The whole menagerie which is loose in our town every night is accompanied in its vocal efforts by the monotonous tum tum of native musical instruments, for this is the season of weddings, and the old man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of dowry.

You smother your head in a pillow and think how soothing would be the "Brekekekex! Koax! Koax!" of Frogs or Hiram students. When you emerge, on fire with prickly heat, the moon is still glaring at you, but tired eyes close in sleep.

The next morning you awake with a start, for the sun is at work before it is up. You seem to see it steaming in like a locomotive. You sit up and look down into the yard. "Mama Jee, Pyari died last night." You heard her restless groaning in the night, the last sound you heard from the poor child stricken with smallpox. You see her form wrapped in white, carried away before sunrise, and the old dull ache begins the day until a little brown girl lifts a bright face to yours and says, "Salaam!" "peace!" Surely "he giveth quietness," and you wonder if mother is praying in the evening at home with the scent of the roses creeping in at her window, praying a benediction on her child's day far to the eastward. He hears and the missionary takes up another day of a life she would not exchange for any other of earth.

Darkness.

By Mary E. H. Blair.

The day grows dark.

Athwart the sky the sun's last rays are beaming.

No more is heard the joyous-throated lark.

While gathering clouds obscure the stars' soft gleaming.

Ere long all sound is hushed and Nature sleeps.

The clouds grow blacker. Now and then the flashes

Of vivid fire, at which the faint heart leaps,
Reveal the terror of the storm which dashes
In fury wild, ere long upon the earth.

The storm abates; and lo the eastern sky
Is streaked with light which heralds forth the birth

Of day again, while rose-hued clouds float by.

The birds awake and make the echoes ring
With melody. The sun bursts forth aglow
With light, inspiring all the world to sing
Enchanted by day's victory o'er her foe.

My life grows dark.

Within my heart my fond last hope is dying.
To me all joy is stilled e'en as the lark;

The clouds of trouble all around are lying.
No friend to cheer me. All alone I weep.

My way grows darker. Now and then the bright'ning

Of faint hopes kindled—but to sink to sleep
And wake no more—reveal to me like lightning

The darkness of my soul. In agony I cry,
"Will this ne'er cease?" When lo, within my breast

Forerunners of a better day, whereby
The storm is vanquished, tempt from out her nest

The bird of joy, who fills my heart with praise

To Him who rescued me from night.
And lo,

Once more is born the hope of brighter days,
And I stand forth victorious o'er life's foe.

Jesus and His Apostles in the Inquiry Room

XI.—Christian's Explanation of Jesus and His Apostles

✠ By W. T. Moore

There was an unusually large attendance at the meeting to-night. The anxiety to hear Christian, who had been provided for in place of the Evangelist, excited a great deal of interest. At the proper time, Christian arose and began his discourse. We can give only a brief synopsis of what he said. He began by assuring the audience that he would let Jesus and his apostles speak for themselves, though it would be necessary for him to indicate a few facts which must be taken into account in order to understand clearly the whole subject under consideration. He intimated, furthermore, that should anyone wish to do so, a question might be asked at any time during his discourse.

The first thing to be considered is the difference in dispensations. No one can understand the Bible without distinguishing between the Patriarchal, Jewish and Christian dispensations. A failure to so distinguish has brought endless confusion into the thinking of theologians. The Bible must be interpreted with regard to time, place, circumstance, etc. He illustrated his meaning by referring to the great commission which Jesus gave to his apostles. This, he said, was not applicable to anyone prior to the death, burial and resurrection of Christ. Furthermore, all scripture spoken by Jesus during his personal ministry on earth, with respect to the salvation of souls, must be interpreted as either an incomplete statement of the free gospel and its conditions, or else it must have a perspective signification. We cannot properly go on the other side of the great commission in order to find a complete statement of the conditions of salvation. While on earth, Jesus had power to forgive sins on any conditions that he might prescribe; but when he issued his great proclamation, this at once became the standard for all future conversions.

But even this commission could not be preached until the apostles were endued with power from on high. Not until Pentecost did they receive this power, and consequently, not until then was the gospel preached in its fullness. It had been preached to Abraham in promise, to the Jews in type, but it never was preached in its completeness until the day of Pentecost. Indeed, it could not be preached until after the death, burial and resurrection of Christ, for the very marrow of the gospel is to be found in his death, burial and resurrection. Consequently when Jesus says, "He that believeth in the Son hath life," etc., all such passages must be confined to the personal ministry of Jesus while on earth, and not to that fuller ministry after his ascension to the heavens. He "began to do and teach" while on earth, as Luke clearly intimates, but his doing and teaching were more fully developed under the inspired ministry of his apostles. This was especially true as regards the salvation of sinners. The church itself was not definitely organized until the apostles began their ministry. We must, therefore, reckon with Pentecost in order to locate the beginning of the Christian dispensation, just as we must reckon with Mt. Sinai in order to locate the beginning of the Jewish dispensation. God is a God of order, not of confusion.

Now in the light of the foregoing, if we examine the different forms in which the question of salvation is propounded, it will be found that there is no difficulty whatever in reconciling all the cases if the laws of exegesis, which were referred to at an early period of these discussions, are carefully and conscientiously applied.

Let us notice some of the different forms of the question, as found in the New Testament.

1. In the first place, the young lawyer who came to Christ asked what he should do to inherit eternal life. (Luke 10.)

2. The deeply awakened Pentecostians cried out, "Men and brethren, what must we do?" (Acts 2.)

3. Saul of Tarsus cried, "Lord, what wilt thou have me do?" (Acts 9 and 22.)

4. The Philippian jailer said, "Sirs, what must I do to be saved?" (Acts 16.)

Now here are different persons asking substantially the same question. What is the scriptural answer given in each case? In order that we may understand this whole matter, it is most important to observe that these respective persons asked the question under different circumstances, and consequently it is only reasonable to suppose that these circumstances will be taken into account in the answers given. But when these circumstances are duly considered, it will be found that the answer is substantially the same in every case.

In the first case the answer was, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyself." (Luke 10:27.) Now it must be remembered that this answer was given to a man who was living under the law, and was therefore responsible to the law and not to the gospel; for the gospel dispensation had not yet fully begun, for the facts had not yet transpired. Christ had not yet died, had not yet been buried, had not yet been raised from the dead. But these facts are absolutely fundamental in the salvation of persons now who live not under the Jewish dispensation, but under the Christian dispensation; who are not under Moses, but under Christ; who are not saved by the law, but by the gospel. Consequently this answer cannot be regarded as in any way appropriate to those who may ask the question in these days. Indeed, we are distinctly told that "by the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified," and that it is "not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Spirit." (Tit. 3:5.) We must therefore turn away from this answer because it was not given for our guidance. We must really begin our investigation chronologically on this side of the death, burial and resurrection of Christ; for these three facts are fundamental in the gospel message, as may be seen by reference to 1 Cor. 15:1-4.

As already intimated, after our Lord's resurrection from the dead, he gave his apostles a commission, in which were contained instructions for preaching the gospel and discipling the nations. By an examination of the three records of this commission, as given in Matt. 28:19, 20, Mark 16:15, 16, Luke 24:44-48, the terms will be clearly seen to correspond with the preaching and practice of the apostles, as recorded in the book of Acts. The gospel dispensation began in its fullness on the day of Pentecost, and not till then; consequently, we must begin our induction of cases with that day.

On the day of Pentecost, Peter, being filled with the Holy Spirit, which had been promised, and for which the apostles had been waiting, preached the first gospel sermon that was ever preached in all the facts, commands and promises of the gospel; and consequently, the answer which he gave to the inquiring Pentecostians is of the utmost importance to us who live under the gospel dispensation, and who are, therefore, responsible for the reception or rejection of the gospel message. After the Pentecostians had heard Peter proclaim the gospel, they were pricked to the heart and cried out, "Men and brethren, what must we do?" Peter's answer was, "Repent and be baptized everyone of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost." (Acts 2:38.) Nor did he stop at this point, for it is stated that "with many other words did he testify and exhort, saying, Save yourselves from this untoward generation." And we learn that they "that gladly received his word were baptized: and the same day there were added unto them about three thousand souls." (Acts 2:41.)

Another case is that of Saul's conversion. He was told to go to Damascus, and Ananias would tell him what to do. And when Ananias came in, he used the following language: "And now, why tarriest thou? Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord." (Acts 22:16.) Saul had already believed the gospel, and had already repented, and hence he was told to be baptized, as this was part of the instructions given in the great commission under which the apostles were preaching, and this part remained yet to be attended to.

A third case is that of the Philippian jailer (Acts 16: 25-34), and this case differs in some of its features from both of the others we have considered, and consequently the answer is somewhat different, though, as already explained, it is practically the same when all the circumstances are taken into the account. The answer in this case was, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house." (Acts 16:31.)

Now a careful examination of the different circumstances under which the question was propounded, will show that there is no difficulty whatever in understanding the respective answers given. In the case of the Pentecostians, it is evident that they already believed the gospel, for they were "pricked to the heart," and being under deep conviction, cried out, "Men and brethren, what must we do?" They were not, therefore, told to "believe," but to "repent and to be baptized." In other words, they were not told to do what they had already done, but to do that which still remained to be done. In the case of Saul of Tarsus, he did not need to be told to believe nor repent, for he had already done both of these, and consequently he was simply told to be baptized, the only thing in the great commission that remained undone. But in the case of the Philippian jailer, he had neither believed, repented nor been baptized. Indeed, it is probable he never had heard a gospel sermon in his life, but having witnessed the earthquake, and seeing the prison doors opened, he was deeply awakened and cried out, saying, "What must I do to be saved?" He was distinctly told to "believe on the Lord Jesus Christ," because in his case this was the first thing necessary to be done. So far he had been an unbeliever, and consequently it was necessary for him to believe, as it is impossible to please God without faith. (Hebrews 11:6.)

But the preachers did not stop by simply telling him to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, they went on to explain what was clearly involved in such a faith. They were acting under a commission which told them to "preach the gospel to every creature; he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be condemned." Consequently, in harmony with this commission, "they preached unto him the word of the Lord and to all that were in his house." (Acts 16:32.) In this preaching they undoubtedly explained more fully what was included in the answer which they had just given to his earnest question. They doubtless told him that to believe in Jesus as Lord required submission to his will, a hearty obedience to his authority; for he himself says, "Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things that I say?" (Luke 6:44.) As he had commanded baptism in the great commission which he gave to his apostles, it was, therefore, perfectly evident that the jailer should obey the Lord in the ordinance of baptism; and this he did. For "he took them the same hour of the night and washed their stripes; and was baptized, he and all his straightway." (Acts 16:33.) Now in dealing with this case, it is not only important to understand the meaning of the terms, Lord, Jesus and Christ, but it is also important not to cut the record in two by leaving out the latter part, and closing the whole case by simply quoting the statement made to the Philippian jailer before the word of the Lord was preached unto him. An honest inquirer will not fail to read the case from beginning to end, and take into consideration everything that relates to it, and when this is faithfully done, it will be perfectly evident that the jailer was told to be baptized as well as to believe.

From the foregoing considerations, it will be clearly seen that when the different circumstances are taken into the account, the answer in each case is practically the same; and that, therefore, God's answer to the question, "What must I do to be saved?" involves, first of all, faith in the Lord Jesus Christ; second, repentance toward God; and, third, obedience to the Lord's will; and this obedience begins with the complete submission of the penitent believer to the ordinance of baptism, in the name of Jesus Christ, into the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit.

Let no one suppose that even a faithful acceptance of all these conditions of the gospel is everything that is necessary in order to reach heaven. Faith, repentance and baptism are conditions belonging to the gospel, but this gospel deals with the unconverted. However, when the gospel is heartily accepted and obeyed, it is just then that the obligations of the Christian life begin. Having clearly assumed these obligations by accepting the gospel, it is now all important to add to our faith all the Christian graces, so that an entrance may be administered unto us abundantly into the everlasting kingdom. (2 Peter 1:11.) Having entered the kingdom of Christ on earth, we must now fight the good fight of faith, that we may lay hold on eternal life and enter the kingdom in heaven.

From this reference to different cases, it will be seen that the teaching of Jesus and his apostles, when subjected to legitimate laws of exegesis, is in perfect harmony with the whole Bible, and also commends itself to human reason. It makes provision for different conditions and is, not, therefore, an iron-bestead system, which has no flexibility whatever. It was intended for all time, for all places, and all other conditions. The central principle is the same under all circumstances, viz.: faith in and obedience to our divine Lord.

When Christian closed his discussion there was a profound silence for a few minutes, after which it was proposed by Presbyterian that the meeting should adjourn, so as to give time for every one to think over the address to which they had just listened.

CAN'T HELP IT

Coffee Nerves Always on Edge.

The easy way to get rid of coffee nerves on edge is to quit the coffee and drink well made Postum Food Coffee in its place.

When the Postum is thoroughly boiled, it furnishes a rich tasting food drink, and it is then easy and pleasant to shift from the drug to the food coffee.

A Washington lady says: "For a long time I suffered so from nervous headache and was so weak and worn out all the time that I was hardly able to do my housework. Every little thing worried me so, and the noise of my two little children almost drove me wild. I tried my best to be kind and patient with them, but it seemed the harder I tried the crosser I grew, until I was discouraged almost to despair. I had been using coffee three times a day for about 12 years. Several months ago I read an article in a religious paper telling about Postum food Coffee, and I made up my mind coffee was causing my trouble.

"So I shut down on the coffee, which was easy when I used Postum. My headaches grew more painful at first, but I was not surprised at this, and was determined to let coffee alone and give Postum a fair trial. In a few days Postum had driven most of the drug effects of coffee out of my system. The headaches grew less and finally stopped altogether, and for the past three months I have been a different person. The headaches are all gone, my strength is coming back, nerves are steady and I feel rested in place of tired all the time.

"I know it was coffee that caused all the trouble, and I am certain that Postum is rapidly repairing all the wrongs that coffee caused. I always tell people when recommending Postum to be sure to make it according to directions; don't forget to boil it 15 minutes." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

News From Many Fields

South Dakota.

A number of our churches are now pastorless. This constant removal of ministers is much to be regretted, but apparently impossible to prevent. A little more charity and patience are the only elements likely to overcome these conditions.

We learn that W. J. Dodge has resigned at Armour. We are sorry to hear this, as Brother Dodge has been eminently successful there and leaves the church united and hopeful. We hope he will not leave the state.

L. W. Thompson has resigned at Clark and South Elrod, where he has labored successfully for the past two years. Brother Thompson will locate with one of our South Dakota churches.

J. I. Meyers has resigned at Aberdeen and departs for California the last of August.

J. I. Nicholson, of Gross, Neb., passed through Tyndall enroute to Highmore, where he may locate as minister.

The state evangelist is supplying the church in Tyndall and expects to locate a in his new field at West Point, Miss., where he recently accepted a call.

V. W. Dorris, of Georgetown, has just closed a splendid meeting at Sadieville, Scott county.

The Kentucky State Convention will be held at Paris, Sept. 22-24.

President J. W. McGarvey delivered a series of addresses at Bethany, W. Va., last month.

J. J. Cole, of Lebanon, is spending his vacation with relatives in Virginia—his old home.

Jno. B. Dickson has resigned at Grayson and Morehead, and accepted a call at Gloucester, Ohio.

W. H. Allen, of the Chestnut Street Church, Lexington, recently closed a meeting at Mt. Carmel, Fleming county, which resulted in 23 additions.

The church at Eminence continues to prosper under the faithful ministry of Ernest W. Elliott, to whom they have just extended an indefinite call.

The Small-Brown-Hawkins meeting at Murray closed with 43 additions. This congregation will soon erect a splendid new church building. On the last day of the above meeting, over $10,000 was subscribed for that purpose.

George Darsie, of Frankfort, is spending his vacation at Boulder, Col.

President B. A. Jenkins will assist the regular minister, Jos. Severance, in a meeting at Newtown, Scott county, beginning on the 10th inst.

The Bracken County Convention will be held with the church at Milford, Aug. 12, 13. R. M. Hopkins, W. C. Morro and H. C. Runyan are among those on the program.

A meeting was recently held at Briar Ridge, which closed with 38 additions. O. W. Donald is the minister.

R. M. Giddens, formerly of Paris, Tenn., is now at work in his new field at Mays Lick.

J. T. Hawkins, of Lexington, is in a meeting with the church at Berea, Logan county.

The first convention of the Harrison county churches was held last month with the Indian Creek church and was quite a success in every way. Next year the convention will meet with the Unity church.

The two weeks' meeting at Moransburg closed with 24 additions. H. A. Moore is the minister.

The new church building at Carrsville will be dedicated on the 30th. The sermon will be preached by E. J. Willis, of Hopkinsville.

F. M. Tinder, of Lancaster, is in a meeting with the Hubble church, Lincoln county. He expects to assist J. T. Hawkins at Indian Creek, Harrison county, beginning on the 24th, and C. W. Dick at North Middletown after our state convention at Paris.

Have you contributed as yet to the endowment of the McGarvey chair of sacred history in the College of the Bible? If not, why not send a liberal offering to-day to M. D. Clubb, Financial Sec'y, Midway, Ky?

The prospects are flattering at the present time for a large attendance next session in all of our Kentucky schools and colleges.

R. E. Moss, of Maysville, recently held a meeting at Murphysville, which closed with 23 additions.

Wisconsin.

The church at Milwaukee has successfully lifted her mortgage of $2,400, and on next Sunday will celebrate the event by a sort of jubilee, during which the mortgage will be burned. The church is considered to be in a highly satisfactory condition in every way.

Bro. Julius Stone, of Chippewa Falls, has recently reorganized the work at Edson Center in Chippewa county. He reports a small organization of nine members, with fair prospects of success.

The Ladysmith church, W. O. King pastor, has recently closed a successful meeting of 31 additions. Bro. Milton Wells, of Footville, did the preaching. Brother Wells expects to assist them in another short meeting during this month.

The church at Monroe is at present without a pastor. Monroe is an inviting field for some wide-awake young preacher.

Bro. D. A. Lindsey, of Pekin, Ill., is visiting the churches at Sugar Grove, Sabin and Readstown with a view to locating in that section. It is ardently hoped that mutually satisfactory arrangements may be made.

Bro. H. L. Denton, of Des Moines, Ia., is spending a short time with the churches at Twin Grove and Martinstown, looking over that field. We earnestly hope that Brother Denton may assume charge of that work.

The meeting held by Bro. Geo. Fowler, of Lisbon, O., at Superior, resulted in the organization of a church with 18 members. This young congregation has a bright future. Bro. Frank Harlow, of Ohio, has been called to the pastorate. With him at the helm, much is expected of that new field.

Bro. T. H. Goodnight, of Viroqua, is doing an excellent work at that point. He is reviving the church and putting the work on a better basis than it has been for years. Sister Goodnight is an invaluable helper to him in that work.

Word comes from Bro. Benj. L. Smith that if we can gain $5,000 between now and Sept. 30, we shall be able to go up to the Detroit convention with the glad report of $100,000 for home missions. This we must not fail to do. Will the Wisconsin churches do their part in securing this much desired end? We hope for a liberal offering from each of the 29 churches in the state. If the offering has already been taken, we trust that no delay will ensue in sending in the offering to Brother Smith.

The annual convention of the Wisconsin Christian Missionary Association will convene in Milwaukee, Sept. 15-18. A strong program has been provided. Full notice of same will appear in due time.

Ohio.

The brethren at Ashtabula have changed their plans and will not enlarge their building, but will build new throughout. There have been eleven added recently.

John Munro, of Mt. Pleasant, Mich., will come to the church at Rudolph, Sept. 1. We accord him a hearty welcome. L. E. Bates has ministered at Rudolph for three years.

James Burton Smith becomes bishop at Lynchburg and Fairview in Highland Co. This is a good field, and we hope Brother Smith will be "the right man in the right place."

Graat E. Pike has come home from Texas. At present he is at Alliance, but will soon find a location and forever wear the buckeye.

Ohio disciples welcome to the capital city W. S. Priest, of Kansas, who will take the pastorate of the Central Church in Columbus about Sept. 1. Here is the problem of the down town church, but if Brother Priest can work it out as successfully as did R. W. Abberley, he will never need to be ashamed of his record.

The Bible-school at Stubenville recently presented the pastor with a large gold leaf frame enclosing the cluster of grapes used in the revival last winter. Each grape bears the name of an individual who came into the church during the meeting—211 in all.

pastor there. The prospects are bright in Tyndall, and with the right leader and a united effort of the church many accessions can be made.

Ministers who desire to locate in South Dakota will please write the undersigned and enclose commendations from their corresponding secretary or send me their address.

As we have so nearly reached the $100,000 mark for home missions, another united effort upon the part of the churches should be made that we may come to the Detroit convention with our purpose realized. The accomplishment of this purpose will increase our faith and double our energy for the work of the coming year.

Kentucky.

Howard T. Cree, of the Central Church, St. Louis, is spending his vacation in Kentucky.

Burris A Jenkins, of Lexington, has just closed a successful meeting with the South Elkhorn church, Fayette county, which resulted in 37 additions to the church. A. Fairhurst is the regular preacher.

I. J. Spencer, of the Central Church, Lexington, is spending his vacation at Lake Chattanooga.

The church at Versailles, where W. B. Taylor has labored so faithfully for the past eight years, celebrated its semi-centennial last week. Addresses were made by Jno. S. Shouse, Mrs. L. W. St. Clair and President B. A. Jenkins. This congregation was one of the first organized in our state.

J. L. Greenwell, who has been preaching the past year at New Castle, is now at work for foreign missions! On the same mail is a cry equally as vociferous from the man across the street—Benj. L. Smith—saying "with a gain of only $5,000 by Sept. 30, we will have $100,000 for home missions." Good! Sing the doxology again. But while we sing let us get that $5,000. Think of the 101 new churches, the 11,000 additions last year by the missionaries of the A. C. M. S., then sing and send an offering.

Ohio has at least one public official after the heart of Attorney Folk, of St. Louis. This man is Mayor Goff, of Glenville. Recently the town voted dry under the Beall law. Mayor Goff, with an iron hand, is enforcing it. But best of all is his work against the gamblers. Glenville has the Cleveland race track. Last week was the grand circuit races. Mr. Goff said no pool-selling or book-making. The race men coaxed, plead, threatened, swore, and all such things. But not one inch did the mayor move. There was no gambling. His position is simply this: Here is the law, I took a solemn oath to enforce it; it is my duty with fear or favor; I am not to make law, interpret law or connive it. My duty is enforcement. May his tribe increase. Write Mayor Goff a letter, encourage him and thank him. "Do it now."

The parson at Collinwood will preach a series of mathematical sermons on the Sun-nights of August as follows: Aug. 2, "Christianity, Perpendicular and Horizontal;" Aug. 9, "Christianity Divided—How?" Aug. 16, "Christianity Divided—The Result;" Aug. 23, "Christianity Added—The Signs in the Problem;" Aug. 30, "Christianity Added—How?"

The name of Christ was confessed by two people at the close of our service last Sunday night.

Southern California.

There are certainly good reasons for predicting an era of prosperity for our churches in Southern California. This prediction is based in part on the material prosperity of the country, Wm. H. Seward's prophecy is being fulfilled. He said in the senate: "The Pacific ocean, its shores, its islands, and the vast regions beyond will become the chief theatre of events in the world's great hereafter."

On returning from a visit to the Pacific coast, J. H. Garrison wrote in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST: "The recent tour made by the editor through some of the western states has served to intensify convictions previously entertained concerning the value of this important section of the United States, and its relation to our natural development and, therefore, to the future of our cause. The missionary body that so plants its missionary operations as to hold a prominent place among the religious forces which control the destiny of this mighty western empire is planning wisely and well, for it is laying the foundation for future triumphs. Are we preparing to meet the demands of this great emergency? Can we hear the tread of the coming millions who are to inhabit those fertile, sun kissed plains and valleys?"

Whatever prosperity comes to the Pacific slope, it is certain that Southern California will come in for a large share. People are coming here in large and rapidly increasing numbers. For every homesick man anxious to go back east, a thousand back there are longing to take his place. For every lone soloist who wails out a note of disappointment and dissatisfaction, there is a mighty chorus of voices shouting the praises of the golden state. If this soloist would go back east and sizzle through one summer and frizzle through one winter, take the special cyclone merry-go-round in July and August, or the regular daily in March and November, he would then be ready to take the last cent of his or his wife's, or his wife's relatives' money, and return to California to seek a front seat in the chorus. If you were to read the letters going east on the overland mails to-day, you might find one or two, or a half dozen whose writers could find no good in California, but you would find five hundred or a thousand striving in poetry or poetic prose to describe our mountains, hills, valley and plains; our fruits and flowers; our sunshine and skies. Many of the letters would claim that the Garden of Eden has been located, and end with the confession that the half had never been told, and an exhortation to friends to gather together a few necessities, dispose of the rest of their effects at any sacrifice, make good their escape, turn their faces toward California, and remember Lot's wife. From letters I have received, from what I heard on my two trips east, it seems to me that if all the people who want to come to California could come, the east would become a wild, wind swept waste, with scarcely enough people left to fan those who are overcome with the heat in summer and rub those who succumb to the cold in winter.

If it can be said that the United States is the ripest field in the world for "our plea," I believe that Southern California is the ripest part of our field. The liberal spirit of our movement strikes a responsive chord in Southern California. The formative character of our communities is favorable to the reception of "our plea." I doubt if Christian union sentiment prevails in any part of our country to the same extent as in Southern California. I close by finishing the quotation from Brother Garrison. "Are we preparing to meet the spiritual wants of these millions, or shall we leave to others the glorious privilege of entering into this mighty inheritance?"

Texas.

The Texas talk begins this week in southwest Arkansas at the Mineral Springs camp ground. The writer spent the first fifteen years of his life as a minister in Arkansas. Among the ministers of the word of the Lord who were on the encampment program were: E. C. Browning, Cor. Sec. Arkansas Missionary Convention; Miss Ella Browning, superintendent Junior work; C. Munroe, of Nashville; Joe Jones, evangelist of Hot Springs district; Nesbit Trout, evangelist of southwest Arkansas district; from Texas, W. S. Bullard, Texarkana; J. H. Fuller, Longview; M. M. Smith, Timpson; Bertha C. Mason, secretary Texas C. W. B. M. and the writer.

The attendance is estimated at fully 2,000. The large tabernacle seats comfortably 1,200, and it would not nearly accommodate the crowds. The dominant note of every address was missions. The result will be more and better mission work in the district. It was a great pleasure to enjoy once more the unstinted hospitality of these dear brethren. Many friends of former days have gone to their reward, but many of the children are walking in the footsteps of their parents, and the work of the Master goes on with increasing success. The seventeenth annual encampment was universally pronounced "the best yet."

"Camp meetings" are fashionable just now in Texas. One has just closed at Sweetwater with B. J. Waugh and E. M. Douthit as evangelists. One begins to-day on the Chon Cho river near Brady, J. W. Marshall, evangelist, and John Brower, singer. One is in session at True, J. L. Haddock in the lead. Another is to be held Aug. 18-28, B. B. Sanders, evangelist. One of the commendable changes from the [old] [time] camp meeting is that the morning and afternoon services are really missionary institutes in which every branch of our missionary work is presented by experts with a view to bring out the best that can be said. When we consider that most of these meetings are attended by from one to three thousand people, it will be seen that the days of such gross misunderstanding of our mission work and workers are drawing to a close. So may it be.

Kansas.

We are sorry to see W. S. Priest leave Kansas. He is a great priest, but not a very "high" priest. Columbus, Ohio, is fortunate.

We welcome G. L. Burch to Pittsburg. He follows a worthy man, H. B. Wright, author of "That Printer of Udel's."

We assisted in dedicating at Council Grove on the 2nd, and will aid at Maryville on the 30th. D. S. Domer and L. W. Myers are the pastors at these places.

Kansas churches must remember that Aug. 23 is Kansas day for Kansas missions. Send to the office for literature and envelopes. It is no burden for each church to raise its full apportionment, and it means so much to our state work. Let no church neglect this. If you have no preacher, attend to it anyway.

Remember the state convention at Newton, Oct. 5-8.

Notes from the Rice Belt.

The state convention of the Louisiana Disciples met at Baton Rouge, June 16-19. There was great rejoicing over the splendid progress that had been made during the past year. The corresponding secretary's report showed that there had been 500 additions, of which 300 had been clear gain, making a numerical increase of over 25 per cent. Total amount of money raised for all purposes, $17,180.

One of the important lessons of the past year's work is in regard to the value of our home board in helping weak sections. The home board and the Church Extension Board, by rendering us assistance at critical times and in needy places, made these results possible. Without them, it is certain that this work could not have been accomplished.

We Louisiana Disciples need no arguments to prove to us the grand work these boards are doing, and we have shown in the past year, and shall in future years, show our appreciation in a substantial way. Our hands were tied, we were practically helpless, but the "mother of churches" and her "son" came to our assistance and through their encouragement we moved on to the battle and to victory. It is marvelous how much can be accomplished with a little money judiciously expended. The home board assisted us in employing our state evangelist. With an expenditure by the board of scarcely a hundred dollars, we have at Cheneyville a magnificent new church building and an elegant, roomy parsonage, together with over 40 additions. A like expenditure at Jennings netted us a $3,200 church and a congregation of about 60. At Crowley the "son" helped the "mother," and with an expenditure of $100 and a loan of $1,000 we have church property valued at over $5,000 and a congregation of 60! Who can remain indifferent to the claims of these boards when they can produce such results as these as evidence of their efficiency?

We lack only about $5,000 of raising our $100,000 this year for home missions. We have until Oct. 1 in which to raise that. May God grant that this small amount may be speedily forthcoming so that we can go to our convention in Detroit with shouts of joy and victory.

DAVID AND JONATHAN.—
1 Sam. 20:12-23.

Study Chapters 19 and 20.

Memory Verses 20:14-17.

Golden Text: There is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother.—Prov. 18:24.

From Secret Hate to Open War.

Saul's hatred of David and his fear of him grew until it was too great to hide. He no longer professed friendship to him. The people knew of his jealousy and enmity and his position was weakened thereby, for David was popular. But Saul gave orders openly to Jonathan and to the servants of his own household to kill David at the first opportunity. The intercession of Jonathan won a temporary truce (19:4-6) and David was restored to his former status at court. But though Saul swore by Jehovah that David should not be put to death, yet it may be doubted whether this assurance was given in good faith, or whether it was but a preparation for another attempt to accomplish by treachery what he had not been able to effect by open commands.

The Truce Broken.

At any rate the truce was not of long duration. There was another war with the Philistines and again David distinguished himself and was the chief agent in repelling the invaders (19:8). And again doubtless the love of the people for David was increased by this exploit. And now David was back in Saul's court, playing on the harp as before to dispel the malign influence of the evil spirit which brooded upon Saul. But Saul's case was beyond the reach of music. Even David's harp could not exorcise the spirit of evil to which Saul had given such hospitable welcome through the years of passion and jealousy. Such spirits are easier to invoke than to cast out. "This kind cometh not out save by fasting and prayer." So, while David played, Saul again tried to kill him with his spear. But he avoided the blow and fled from the court where, as it was now evident, he had nothing but hostility to expect at the hands of the king. Never again was there even the semblance of peace between Saul and David. Twice David spared the king's life, at Engedi (1 Sam. 24) and in the wilderness of Ziph, (chap. 26), and both times Saul professed to be convinced of David's loyalty and to put away all hostility toward him. But David put little confidence in these declarations and immediately after the second ostensible reconciliation, when Saul said, "Blessed be thou, my son David," David said in his heart, "I shall now perish one day by the hand of Saul."

A Woman's Device.

Disappointed in his attempt to murder David while he was ministering to him with his harp, Saul sent his agents to assassinate him in his own home. But his wife Michal, Saul's daughter, deceived her father's messengers and enabled her husband to escape by letting him down from a window by night. The messengers were delayed by a plea that David was sick. An image laid in the bed and covered over gave an appearance of truth to this report. Saul, with consummate cruelty, ordered David to be brought on his sick bed that he might slay him with his own hand. The order was executed, as the messenger supposed, but when they came into the king's presence bearing the bed it was discovered that instead of David it contained only an image (the teraphim) and a goat's hair pillow.

Saul Among the Prophets.

David meanwhile had fled to Ramah which had been for many years the home of Samuel. Here Samuel was at the head of a company of prophets whose prophesying was apparently accompanied by manifestations of frenzy or mania. Here Saul's emissaries found David, but they themselves prophesied (or raved) when they came into the presence of Samuel and his prophets. A second and a third set of messengers were dispatched, but every assassin became a prophet. As a last resort Saul himself went down to Ramah and he too prophesied, stripping off his clothes and lying naked all night and all day like one mad. Hence the saying, "Is Saul also among the prophets?" This was not Saul's first experience among prophets. Once before, just after Samuel had anointed him to be king, the spirit of prophecy came upon him and that event is given as the origin of the proverb, "Is Saul also among the prophets?" (1 Sam. 10:12.)

A Last Chance.

In the narrative up to this point Saul has made four distinct and murderous attempts on David's life. Moreover, he has ordered Jonathan and his servants to kill David at the first opportunity. Apparently David had good reason to become a fugitive. It is therefore somewhat surprising to find David and Jonathan still debating the question as to whether the king desires David's death (20:1-3); Jonathan taking the ground that such a thing could not be or he would surely have heard of it; David arguing that he is in grave danger and that the king has kept his hatred secret from Jonathan on account of their known friendship. That David should have thought for a moment of appearing in his old place at the king's table, or that Saul should have expected him to after these four attempts on his life, seems strange. Possibly chapter 20 narrates an episode which occurred before the events in chapter 19; if not, there must have been a considerable lapse of time. At any rate the incident in this chapter presupposes that there was at this time some ground for uncertainty as to Saul's attitude toward David, and David and Jonathan make a private agreement to put the matter to a final test. Saul is given one more chance to put away his hatred and accept the inevitable.

A Famous Friendship.

The story of the friendship of David and Jonathan has a few parallels, but perhaps no superior in the annals of that master-passion. If it were pure fiction, its creation would mark the author as a consummate genius in the realm of literature. As history, it gives us an interesting and important side-light on the times in which it occurred. The Hebrews of this period were in many respects a crude and undeveloped people. Polygamy was practiced and approved by their best men. Awful atrocities were committed in the name of war. Private vengeance was more common than legal punishment for crime. But in spite of all this, there were friendships as true and deep and unselfish as any that the world has ever seen. It sometimes seems that friendship thrives best among men who have not been brought too thoroughly into bondage to the forms of modern civilization. Perhaps our culture and our conventionalities have taken the fire out of our passions, and our enmities and friendships have alike lost force. In learning how to smile on our enemies we have learned how to frown on our friends, and while hatred may smoulder on behind a polite smile, friendship dies when covered with the cloak of indifference. It was not so with those primitive peoples who were the contemporaries of David and Jonathan. The heat of the south was in their veins. They could hate fiercely and love faithfully. And here and there was one who could forgive divinely. Such were David and Jonathan, whose hearts were framed to friendship. Each was man enough to see and love the other's manly qualities. Jealousy was absent from their souls. To David it was nothing that Jonathan was the son of the man who sought his life. To Jonathan it was nothing that David was his supplanter.

The Secrets of Friendship.

First, have an eye for people's good points. This is not a world of perfection, and if you insist that your friends must be faultless you will search long and find few. Cultivate the habit of appreciating virtues even when their

HAY-FEVER

AND

CURED BY THE

Kola Plant.

A New and Positive Cure for HAY-FEVER and ASTHMA has been found in the Kola Plant, a rare botanic product of West African origin. So great are the powers of this New Remedy that in the short time since its discovery it has come into almost universal use in the hospitals of Europe and America for the cure of every form of Hay-Fever and Asthma. Its cures are really marvelous. Men, women and children who have been given up as incurable are being restored daily to perfect health by the use of Himalaya. Thousands of letters attesting its wonderful cures have been written the importers, but limited space prevents a detailed list. Read what a few have to say, proving that Hay-Fever and Asthma can be cured:

Mr. Frederick F. Wyatt, the noted Evangelist of Abilene, Texas, writes Jan. 31st, Himalaya permanently cured him of Hay-Fever and Asthma. He strongly recommends it to sufferers. Dr. W. H. Vail, a prominent physician of St. Louis, Mo., writes March 8th, that he used Himalaya on six different Hay-Fever patients last Fall with satisfactory results in every case. Mr. A. L. Clark, Springfield, Mo., writes Jan. 22d, was a sufferer of Hay-Fever and Asthma for thirty years and thought I would die every Fall but Himalaya completely cured me. Dr. C. E. Deane, Marietta, Ohio, writes Jan. 28th, I was cured after several years suffering with Hay-Fever and Asthma. Mr. J. B. Ayle, Estherville, Iowa, writes Feb. 28th, that he was cured of Hay-Fever and Asthma after severe suffering for 28 years. Miss Eva Preston, Petersburg, Ind., writes March 8th, that she suffered untold misery for 18 years with Hay-Fever and Asthma. Is completely cured, although her physician said that a cure was impossible. Mr. E. B. Hume, 1345 Arch street, Philadelphia, Pa., a widely-known traveler, writes Feb. 2d, Himalaya cured me of Asthma when everything else failed. Dr. J. R. Duncan, the oldest physician of Crawfordsville, Ind., writes Jan. 23th, It is my duty to tell all I can of the great virtue of Himalaya. Rev. J. L. Coombs, Martinsburg, W. Va., writes to the New York World, July 23rd, that it cured him of Asthma of 39 years' standing. If you suffer from Hay-Fever and Asthma in any form, do not despair, but write at once to the Kola Importing Co., No. 1166 Broadway, New York City, N.Y., who in order to prove the power of this wonderful new botanic discovery will send you one Trial Case by mail, entirely Free. Remember it costs you absolutely nothing.

owner has also some vices.

Second, learn to serve and to enjoy serving. This can best be learned from Jesus Christ, who shed more light on the subject of friendship than any one else ever did. Real friendship is always unselfish. A companion chosen because he can be serviceable to you is not your friend, but your victim. Choose for your friends those who need your friendship. To enjoy friendship one must learn to enjoy service.

Third, friendship must always be based upon some common interest, and the more important and exalted this interest the more fruitful may be the friendship. There have been friendships based on a common interest in baseball, politics, music, literature, and almost every possible thing that can occupy the attention of man. But the common interest must sooner or later be in something vital and important if the friendship is to play a large part in one's life.

Fourth, religion ought to be the basis for many real friendships. It is supremely important and creates the strongest bond of union between those who are of like mind. If we are not making genuine friendships among our fellow-Christians—and distinctly Christian friendships, depending for their strength on no mere accidental matters of lesser moment—then our faith is not as vital and real to us as it ought to be. It is not playing that part in our lives or holding that foremost place in our interest that rightfully belongs to it.

A Thing Worth Knowing.

No need of cutting off a woman's breast or a man's cheek or nose in a vain attempt to cure cancer. No need of applying burning plasters to the flesh and torturing those already weak from suffering. Soothing, balmy, aromatic oils give safe, speedy and certain cure. The most horrible forms of cancer of the face, breast, womb, mouth, stomach; large tumors, ugly ulcers, fistula, catarrh; terrible skin diseases, etc., are all successfully treated by the application of various forms of simple oils. LESSONS FROM PAUL. IV.

2 Tim 1:6-8. 2 Cor. 11:23-28.

The attainment of success in life is largely a matter of, first, getting the right idea of what success is; and second, being willing to pay the price. In both of these respects Paul was qualified to succeed. To begin with, his ideal of success was the highest. He sought the best things. His desire was not to acquire possessions, not to burden his soul with things, but to lay aside every hindering weight and win the race in the arena of spiritual conflict. The winning of that race meant the development of the noblest qualities of spiritual manhood—the stout heart, the peaceful mind, the unselfish soul, the alert intellect, the humble and worshipful spirit. It meant also the joy of serving Christ and humanity.

The price of that success was high, as the world counts prices. Paul paid for it even more than most men are willing to pay for the glittering baubles which they hold dear. He tells us what he had to pay (2 Cor. 11:23-28), a moving recital of labors, perils, fastings, beatings, stonings, shipwrecks, and nearly every form of discomfort that can be imagined. It is the mark of a strong mind and a courageous spirit when one is willing to pay such a price for success.

Another price which Paul paid he mentions when he is writing of his experiences (Phil. 3:13). "One thing I do, forgetting the things that are behind." Success always demands concentration. He who would do one thing well must give up many other things which may be interesting and excellent in themselves. Devotion to the one supreme aim simply crowds them out. It is so with the Christian life. If one really takes it seriously it crowds out a great many things that are innocent, but comparatively valueless. Time is short. Our strength is limited. We must make every effort count. Do not be content then to ask—about doubtful amusements, for example—are they inherently wicked? Ask rather, Do they pay? Are they worth the time they take and the strength and money they cost? Not, What harm do they do? but, What good do they do?

"Stir up the gift of God which is in thee," wrote Paul to Timothy. Whatever ability or talent anyone has is a gift from God, and he wants it used. The word translated "stir up" means to "stir into a flame." Perhaps, even when you make it burn its brightest, it will not be enough to set the world on fire, but it will at least be enough to light up a corner of it. And perhaps your small torch may be the means of kindling someone else's larger one.

"God gave us not a spirit of fearfulness, but of power and love and discipline." No cowards need apply for admission to the working force of Christ's kingdom. Faith, like love, casts out fear. The man who believes that this is God's world and that it is governed by His power, will not be fearful about the outcome.

It is worth while to endure hardship in such a cause when there is so great certainty of ultimate victory. The sufferings are nothing to complain about. Even Paul's were nothing compared with the glorious prize, and ours are as nothing compared with his. Moreover, the prize is neither distant nor doubtful. It is here and now. Here we may have the joy of the battle; there the joy of the victory. Here the joy of the work; there the enjoyment of the fruits. But even here, amid whatever deprivations and hardships the Christian life may involve, they are more than paid for by the blessings of Christian fellowship and of communion with God through Christ.

THE GREAT TEACHER.—HIS GENTLENESS

MATT. 11:28-30. 12:17-21. LUKE 7:44-50.

"Power works easily." It was because of his divine power that the Great Teacher moved and wrought with tireless patience and exquisite tenderness. Whether among friends or foes, nothing ever threw him out of balance, nothing ever made him rough and harsh. Even his denunciations were mingled with tears.

1. In Personal Contact. In his personal intercourse with men, Jesus was gentleness personified. Never violent nor rude, he moved among crowds or with a few chosen friends like a refrain of sweetest music. Again and again he was brought into collision with hostile critics and avowed enemies; he was flung amidst the outcast and the depraved, publicans and harlots accosted him; but in the midst of moral wretchedness and rebellion, he remained calm; he stilled the angry storm. He was called to taste the bitterness of betrayal and denial. See how gentle he was with Judas, and when impulsive, boastful Peter denied him thrice, he gave the recalcitrant one reproachful look.

2. In Dealing With Prejudices. There was much bigotry, narrowness and intolerance among the Jews when Christ came to his throne, and it must have been a sore trial to his generous spirit. Ordinary men are sometimes, not to say generally, driven into an intolerant hatred of intolerance, a bigoted dislike of bigotry; but not so with the Man of Galilee. He stood in the midst of the disciples of Moses, with their accumulated masses of tradition, and sought by the gentlest methods possible to emancipate their minds. He did not leave them wedded to their idols, but as some one has said of Emerson, he took them down with such gentleness as betokened reverence—not for the idols, but for their deluded worshipers. He broke with the past, wherever a break was unavoidable or necessary, but he was not a stormy iconoclast.

3. In Presenting New Truth. He had respect to the capacities and the assimilative power of his disciples. What tenderness and thoughtful regard are shown in the oft-quoted saying—"I have many things to say to you, but ye cannot bear them now." The gentle teacher knows how to wait; how to adapt his message to his pupils; how to fill without cramming; how to reveal the unknown without discouraging. And when he felt that the time had come, then with the gentleness of the showers upon the thirsty meadows, he imparted the new truth. He was never ruthless, even when it was necessary to break the old bottles.

4. In Reproving. It is an extraordinary group of pupils anywhere that does not need occasional reproof; and it is as extraordinary a teacher that knows how to administer it. Perhaps some dull, obtuse natures will not recognize a rebuke unless it is harshly spoken; but the most of us are sensitive to rebuke, and harshness lacerates and defeats itself. "Reprove, rebuke, exhort, with all long suffering," said one of the apostles. The Master must ever remain the ideal, whether in reproof or exhortation, because of his consummate gentleness.

It must not be thought that because he was gentle, he was pliable, easily turned aside; or that he was timid, afraid to speak the truth, when truth was unpalatable. His was that unique and admirable blending of gentleness and courage which marks the well-poised character, the perfect man.

The effect of his gentleness can be seen in the twelve, in the early church, and if we have really received him, in our own characters. It can be read in the daily and hourly benevolences that are glorifying this age of philanthropy; in the march of improvement; in the growing consciousness of race unity; in the rise of the spirit of brotherhood among disciples of different names and creeds.

Prayer.

We beseech thee, O God, to have mercy upon us. Cool the fever of our lives; silence the discord; put down the riot and unrest. Make us gentle, tender, devoted, even as the great Lord and Master, for his name's sake. Amen.

A Great Railroad.

It may be truthfully said that railroads, more than any other medium, make a great city. St. Louis is truly great in her railroads, having some twenty-one important lines terminating within her borders.

One of the most important of these roads to St. Louis is the WABASH LINE, from the fact that it draws the commerce of nearly all sections of the country to this metropolis, as a magnet draws kindred metals to itself.

The great arms of this growing system reach to Kansas City, Omaha, Des Moines, Albia and Ottumwa, Ia.; Chicago, Toledo, Detroit and Buffalo, and attract business from beyond these important gateways, even from the remote Pacific Coast, the extreme Northwest, the Great Lakes and the Atlantic borders.

It is commercially aggressive, and in its never ceasing activity is to-day reaching its great steel tentacles toward Pittsburg, Pa., and Baltimore, Md. In a little more than a year these two beehives of industry and all their tributary territory will be bound to St. Louis by the continuous rails of the WABASH.

Its through-car system is perfect, running solid, fully equipped trains for night and day service to Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, Des Moines, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Toledo, Niagara Falls and Buffalo, and through sleeping cars to New York, Boston, Montreal, Denver, Portland, Ore., Los Angeles and San Francisco.

Its train equipment is modern in every particular, there having recently been placed in service many new passenger cars, consisting of Observation-Cafe and Library Cars, Reclining Chair Cars, Dining Cars, Day Coaches and Combination smoking and Baggage Cars, which are models of beauty and neatness, representing the highest state of development in car building.

This road will be called upon to transport hundreds of thousands of visitors to the World's Fair in 1904, and its facilities will be found ample for so gigantic an undertaking.

THE WABASH is essentially a St. Louis line, having its General Officers, from the President down, located here, and has an army of employees, necessary to carry on this vast system, who are citizens of St. Louis.

It spends its money largely in St. Louis and it has the interest of St. Louis always in mind.

Truly this is "A GREAT RAILROAD," and above all things, it is a St. Louis railroad.

Interest per annum compounded twice a year on savings accounts.

$8,150,000 capital and surplus stands as security.

FOURTH & PINE STS. ST. LOUIS

Our Budget

—Milo Atkinson begins a meeting Aug. 10 at Tolesboro, Ky.

—H. C. Patterson is in a tent meeting at Canon City, Col.

—Victor W. Dorris is in a promising meeting at Sadieville, Ky.

—W. H. Jones has moved from Lexington, Ky., to Palmyra, Mo.

—T. W. Cottingham begins a meeting at Freeman, Mo., Aug. 23.

—J. R. Johnson will begin a meeting at New Market, Ia., Aug. 16.

—The Audrain county (Mo.) meeting will be held at Farber, Aug. 17, 18.

—South McAllister, I. T., is prospering under the ministry of I. H. Teel.

—E. L. Powell is writing regularly from Europe to the Louisville Times.

—M. J. Nicoson, Memphis, Mo., is spending his vacation at Kingfisher, O. T.

—B. A. Jenkins will begin a protracted meeting at Newton, Ky., Aug. 10.

—T. A. Cooper goes from Atlanta, Indiana to Wellsville, New York, Sept. 1.

E. F. Mahan and C. R. Hudson are among the summer students at Harvard.

—R. Linn Cave began a meeting July 26 with L. T. Lambert at Corinth, Ga.

—W. B. Clemmer, Trullinger Grove, Iowa, has a new building on his program.

—Franklin Mahoney will dedicate the church at Middlesboro, Ky., Aug. 16.

—Jno. B. Dixon leaves Morehead, Ky., to take up the work at Gloucester, Ohio.

—A. M. Hootman, Logansport, Ind., reports additions at nearly every service.

—G. W. Coffman, formerly in the foreign work, has become pastor at Salida, Col.

—R. A. Smith will enter Kentucky University this fall to prepare for the foreign field.

—Chalmers McPherson assisted Calby D. Hall in a dedication at Marlin, Texas, July 26.

—W. J. Dodge has resigned at Armour, S. Dakota, to prepare for mission work in India.

—W. B. Crewdson, after three prosperous years at Council Bluffs, Ia., goes to Atlantic.

—Edgar D. Jones expects to have the new building at Erlanger, Ky., completed this fall.

—A. F. Sanderson, Keokuk, Iowa, declined the call to Houston, Texas. He is hard to move.

—Westport, Mo., is building a new house of worship.

—The forces at Potter, Kan., will be led in a meeting by R. E. Callithan, commencing Aug. 16.

—A joint county meeting of DeKalb and Stuben counties, Indiana, will be held Aug. 23 at Ashley.

—Ernest Elliot has received a call for an indefinite term of years at Eminence, Ky.; may it be for life.

—J. F. Floyd, recently resigned at Washington, Ind., can be secured by some shepherdless flock.

—J. E. Dinger, Cedar Rapids, Second Church, continues another year with an increased salary.

—J. M. Van Horn, of Worcester, Mass., is spending August with his family at Chautauqua, New York.

—Dr. D. R. Dungan, of Christian University, is on a combined business and pleasure trip through Montana.

—E. L. Ely has been called for another year at Slater, Mo. He is winning a warm place among the disciples.

—W. F. McCormick, Audubon, Ia., writes that they are holding "federation vespers" there during August.

—R. H. Crossfield delivered a stereopticon lecture on the "Passion Play" at the Clinton, Mo., Chautauqua, July 26.

—The new church at Northview, Mo., will be dedicated Aug. 16. Brother T. A. Abbott has promised to be present.

—Church dedications in Missouri are announced at Northview, Aug. 16, at Freeman, Aug. 23, at Renick, Sept. 20.

—J. H. Bryan, state superintendent, will devote September to promoting Bible-school rallies throughout the state.

—J. D. Adcock, president, writes that the Mississippi state convention, to meet at Meridian, is postponed to Sept. 2-7.

—W. D. Hedrick, who has been preaching for churches near Crawfordsville, Ind., expects soon to return to Missouri.

—A. J. Marshall, formerly city evangelist for St. Louis, has organized a church at Frazer, Minn., with 23 charter members.

—Edward Amherst Ott, pastor of Monroe Street Church, Chicago, reports the work there growing, in spite of great difficulties.

—Joseph Gaylor is doing some excellent work in a meeting at Rolla, Mo.; 17 additions at last report. He goes to Calhoun, Mo., next.

—It is rumored that President Jesse of the University of Missouri may resign to go to Ann Arbor, Mich. We trust it is rumor only.

—H. C. Runyan held a meeting last summer in a barn at Oakland, Ky. On the fifth Sunday in August he dedicates a new church there.

—B. E. Youtz, pastor, invites everybody within range to attend the annual basket meeting of the church at Rising Sun, Iowa, Aug. 16.

—W. J. Russell and family, of the East End Christian church, Pittsburg, Pa., are spending the month of August on Fair View Farm, Casnovia, Muskegon county, Mich.

—V. Hayes Miller, news editor of the West Virginia Christian, has resigned the work at McMechen, to take effect Sept. 1. More than fifty were added to the church last year.

—James Small is booked for meetings in Illinois, at Shelbyville and Danville; in Iowa at Exira; in Indiana at Elwood. His meeting at Murray, Ky., closed with 50 additions.

—W. E. Harlow, pastor of Central Church, Springfield, Mo., will enter the evangelistic field again, Oct. 1. He has done superb work in the past, and will doubtless win other victories.

—Eighteen churches have undertaken the support of their own home missionary. This deepens interest by making it personal. By the way, the books close Sept. 30. Is your offering in?

—O. E. Hamilton will return to St. Louis about Aug. 15, and engage in evangelistic work in Missouri and contiguous territory. His address will be Old Orchard, P. O., St. Louis, Mo.

—C. E. Millard, Enid, Okla., better prepared than ever with illustrated songs, is open to engagements for September, in protracted meetings in the middle states, as singing evangelist.

—On the last day of the meeting at Murray, Ky., $10,000 was subscribed for a new church. Together with money and materials on hand, this will enable the brethren to erect a $15,000 edifice.

—Arthur A. Brown preached July 26 at Portland, Ind., at an all day meeting on the fair grounds. Geo. B. Ranshaw was detained by the illness of his wife. A vigorous county organization was formed.

The Churches of Christ in Carter county, Ky., will hold their annual meeting at Star Furnace beginning Saturday before the fifth Sunday in August. Write Dr. J. M. Logan if you expect to attend. Basket dinner Sunday.

—Jesse T. Craig has resigned at Poplar Bluffs, Mo., greatly to the regret of the brethren. His resignation is effective Nov. 1, after which he can be secured for other work. Few men stand higher in the esteem of the churches.

—No cause appeals more strongly to the sanctified common sense of Christian business men than church extension. It therefore seems strange that 1,500 of the churches contributing to home and foreign missions make no offering for church extension. August is the month of preparation, and hundreds of new churches should be enlisted. The need was never more imperative.

—Bro. T. L. Fowler has consented to continue the principalship of the College of the Disciples, St. Thomas, Ontario. The outlook for students seems very encouraging for the coming session which opens Oct. 1.

—The Audrain county (Mo.) convention will meet at Farber, Aug. 17-19. Sermons will be delivered by J. B. Briney, W. T. Moore, and A. W. Kokendoffer, and there will be addresses by H. F. Davis, T. A. Abbott, J. D. Dillard and many others.

—S. J. White, whose splendid service at Cameron endeared him to the Missouri brethren, has resigned and is resting at Millersburg, Ohio. He has received a call from Davenport, Ia., and is expected to take up the work there Sept. 1.

—Improvement is the order of the day. The church at Campbellsville, Ky., is being remodeled, and will be re-opened in September. The First Church, St. Louis, much enlarged and improved, will have a special opening service in September.

—W. F. Turner, of the Joplin church, is off for a two weeks' rest. J. W. Baker, of Joplin, is superintending the Sunday-school there and at South Joplin, and preaches for the South Joplin mission church Sunday nights. That is doing very well for a business man.

—Brother M. McFarland, of Columbus, Kan., will take charge of the new church at Granite City, Ill., where his son, E. T. McFarland, of St. Louis, has been preaching on Sunday afternoons for some months. Granite City is just across the river from St. Louis.

—The Churches of Christ in Wayne county, W. Va., will hold their annual meeting at Nursery Gap beginning Friday night before the third Sunday in Sept. Write Chas. Wheeler, Tridell, W. Va., if you expect to attend. The church is on Tug river, five miles from Louise.

—J. E. Lynn, of the West Side Church, Springfield, Ill., is dividing his vacation time during August between Chicago University in attendance upon lectures, and Eureka, Ill., where his family is spending the summer. He is supplying on Sundays at the Jackson Boulevard church at Chicago.

—"Lightning struck and set fire to our church at Herington, Kan.; totally destroyed. It was insured. We will rebuild at once. The Presbyterians generously offered us their church during the vacation of their minister, and we will hold regular services."

F. M. McHALE, minister.

—S. M. Bernard, Boulder, Colo., reports 58 additions at regular services since Jan. 1. The Colorado Chautauqua there attracts many visitors. Homer T. Wilson is superintendent and manager, and during the summer H. O. Breeden, Geo. Darsie, B. L. Allen, J. Murray Taylor and J. N. Jessup have dropped in.

—C. J. Tanner, of Detroit, writes: "I have a bad news item. Our Central Christian church was badly damaged by fire Wednesday, Aug. 5, at 1 p. m. The expensive pipe organ was entirely consumed and the whole auditorium charred and smoked until it will require a great deal of work and money to restore it. The chapel was not injured and will be used for the service. The insurance is large enough to cover the loss, unless it is on the organ."

This calamity will add materially to the burden which the Detroit brethren are bearing. Even if it involves no great financial loss to them on account of the insurance, it will inconvenience them at a time when they are anxious to give their best thoughts and endeavors to the preparation for the convention.

—A good opportunity is offered to two young preachers who care to take a course in oratory, and at the same time learn something about city church work. Prof. Edward Amherst Ott, pastor of the Monroe Street Christian Church, corner of Monroe Street and Francisco Ave., Chicago, and president of the Ott schools of expression conducted in connection with the institutional department of that church, can use two ambitious young men. They will need to write at once, and be prepared to take up the work. It will be better to call than to write.

—The First Church at Little Rock, Ark., in granting its pastor, J. N. Jessup, a month's vacation in which to attend the Denver convention and visit in Colorado, took the occasion also of making a substantial increase in salary. The church is in good condition and is getting ready to build a new church next year.

—D. Errett has resigned at Waco, Texas, to take effect Sept. 27. A good man is needed for this important field. The church is reported in splendid condition and the right man will find a united and consecrated people. T. D. Hays is chairman of the pastoral committee. Brother Errett goes to Eugene, Oregon.

—R. H. Sawyer is entering upon his sixth year with the church at Watsonville, Cal. He has just returned from a two months' vacation, one month of which was spent at Pueblo, Colo., in an exchange of pulpits with W. B. Craig. The Watsonville congregation is completing a new $35,000 church, which will be dedicated in October.

—R. F. Thrapp has closed the second year of a very happy ministry with the church at Jacksonville, Ill.; 164 have been added to the membership. On the Sunday which marked the close of this period, Mr. Thrapp baptized the daughter of his first convert in that city. He is now with the Idelwild Club on their annual outing at Lake Matanzas.

—J. C. Mason, of Palestine, Texas, has become corresponding secretary for Texas, and B. B. Sanders will continue in the work as state evangelist. Brother Mason will write frequent news letters for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, the first of which appears in this issue. The Texas board now has more than forty workers and they are producing results in that great state.

—Walter C. Gibbs, Ludlow, Ky., and the church there, have a thousand "white elephants" on their hands! But they are all working to lift the church debt. They are printed on cards, to be spotted over with ten dimes each. Under the elephant is the inscription, "7 years old. Value $2,500. His 'keep' costs $180 a year." All departments of the church are prospering.

—The twenty-third annual conference of the Christian Association and C. W. B. M. of Great Britain will be held at Southampton, Aug. 24-26. Ben. N. Mitchell, of Liverpool, preaches the convention sermon. All reports are to be submitted in printed form. Among other names familiar to our readers we notice Frank Coop, treasurer; E. M. Todd, secretary; and Leslie W. Morgan, president.

—Occasionally we meet one who does not want a religious paper because, he says, "the Bible furnishes all the religious reading I need." The West Virginia Christian rejoins: "The Bible will make plain the duty of the Christian under certain conditions, but it nowhere gives information in regard to the existence or non-existence of those conditions." It does not tell him who is hungry, who has not heard the gospel, or where these and other needy ones may be found. Reading religious papers does not keep a man from reading his Bible.

The editor found four of these "Bible alone" Christians in a certain church, none of whom knew their congregation had employed a preacher, although his coming had been repeatedly announced, and published in several church papers! These may be taken as representative of the class. Those who are deeply imbued with the spirit of the Scriptures are most eager for news concerning the kingdom, and vice versa.

—Sister Mary Byram, of California, and Sister Mary H. Perfect, of Indiana, have just given our National Benevolent Association $100 and $500 respectively on the annuity plan. These sisters will receive a generous interest on these sums and greatly help indigent representatives of our Savior and indirectly the Church of Christ. For an explanation of the annuity plan and the good it will do, write General Secretary Geo. L. Snively, 903 Aubert Ave., St. Louis, Mo.

—Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D. D., corresponding secretary of the evangelistic committee of the Presbyterian church, announces that the committee has secured Rev. Jas. M. Gray, D. D., of Boston, to give his whole time this coming fall and winter to that work under its auspices, beginning Oct. 1." The plan of the committee is "to place Dr. Gray in communities where the conditions favor, for a longer or shorter period, giving him an opportunity not only to reach the people with the word of God but to touch the inner life of the ministry in retreats of quiet conference. Dr. Gray or Dr. Chapman will be at Winona Lake, Ind., until Oct. 1.

—The Christian churches of Callaway county held their fifth annual convention Aug. 3-5 with Friendship Church. The attendance was good. Visitors and delegates were royally entertained and sumptuously fed. The sermons and addresses were all of high order of excellence. C. S. Brooks and H. F. Davis were the only preachers in attendance not preaching in the county. The pledges to county work exceeded those of any previous year. The outlook is hopeful and inspiring. J. H. THOMAS.

Fulton, Mo.

—P. W. Harding and A. W. Kokendoffer have just returned from Wichita, Kan., where they went to confer with Architect Leon A. Hunter concerning the plans for our new church at Mexico, Mo. The building will be of classical architecture with dome. It will have two porch entrances, south and west, and will be two stories. It will have the moveable partitions for enlargement and class rooms, and will cost, with furnishings, about $25,000. It will have the art glass windows with slate roof, and the purpose is to build of gray Roman brick.

—Among the names which should have been mentioned in our California number is that of L. B. Wilkes. Among those to whom the cause of primitive Christianity is much indebted on this coast, and whom for their work's sake the church delights to honor, none is more prominent than he. Brother Wilkes went to California 20 years ago, and from the very inception of his work in that state, as pastor of the Stockton church, he was looked upon as a stalwart and uncompromising defender of the faith. He was a friend to all our missionary and educational enterprises, and up to the time of his death, which occurred about two years ago, was a wise and safe counselor in all that pertains to the upbuilding of the church.

—Last week the Board of Church Extension received $500 on the annuity plan from a friend in Michigan. This brother has now put $2,000 into the church extension fund on the annuity plan during the last 18 months. In sending his last remittance he writes: "Please accept this $500 with my best wishes for the prosperity of the work, which I feel is a most worthy one." With many others, he is gathering in his money which he has out at interest, and is placing it in the church extension fund where he can see it housing his homeless brethren while it is earning him a six per cent income. Many others should follow his example. For information concerning the annuity plan of the Board of Church Extension, address G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., 600 Water Works Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

St Louis News.

E. B. Redd preached for the First Church last Sunday morning. There was one addition by letter.

Brother Miller, a member of the First Church, preached both morning and evening for Tuxedo. There was one baptism.

At our extreme southern station, Carondelet Church, G. E. Ireland, the pastor, preached in the morning. There was one confession. In the evening there was a delightful song service with a crowded house.

The pulpit of Central Church at the morning service was supplied by W. E. Garrison, assistant editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. One addition to the congregation by letter.

Frank G. Tyrrell, pastor of the Mt. Cabanne Church, has returned from his vacation and occupied his pulpit last Sunday evening.

The morning and evening service at the Hammett Place Church have been maintained throughout the summer. Samuel B. Moore, the pastor, filled the pulpit at both services last Sunday. One addition by statement.

A prayer and praise service conducted by the pastor of the Hammett Place Church, and W. W. Dowling, the Bible-school superintendent, will be held at the new branch school Prairie Bible-school, northeast corner of Prairie Ave. and Hebert St., on Friday, Aug. 14, at 8 p. m.

The Carondelet Church is making arrangements to open a branch of their Bible-school work at the Bellefontaine street car sheds. A favorable opportunity is presented, and the church is alive to its responsibility.

Where Lies Responsibility?

In some parts of our land our churches are relatively numerous and so organized as to be responsive to the "community of interests" idea. These districts almost invariably represent well-to-do communities and are represented by well doing Disciples. These can provide for evangelization, the strengthening of old points and the opening of new ones, the building of new church homes and making provision for the debts of the old ones, so far as all this comes within their own little district. But what about new fields where our cause is represented only by few and widely scattered Disciples? Who shall strengthen these places, open up new fields, help struggling churches to tide over a period of financial stress, or equip a new church with an indispensable meeting place? How about the wide stretches of the west and northwest, the needy south and this crowded east, the best mission field in the world? Who shall evangelize for us, lift up our hands, and make possible for us a place of meeting? Local boards? We have none. Neighboring boards? Their hands are already filled. The boards of contiguous states? Their own needs are clamoring for recognition and response.

New Jersey has a population of 2,000,000. The Disciples of Christ are represented here by one church and a wreck. We have just one preacher pleading as we plead the Christian plea. How do we happen to have that one preacher in this state? Sent by the A. C. M. S. How does he happen to have a place wherein to preach? Made possible by the Church Extension Board, who bought for us a lot on which we might safely build. I have a mission at Glen Ridge, some three miles distant, and another mission is reported from New Orange. The one at Glen Ridge has a property worth about $4,000, encumbered to an amount somewhat less than $1,000. Doors are opening here in Newark, but we dare not enter in as yet. Who shall we look to to open for us the way of entrance into these splendid opportunities? Listen.

Two years ago I wrote many letters to individuals and to churches whom I knew and who knew me. I wrote the best letters I knew how to frame. I set forth the matchless opportunities confronting us here. In response just one brother and sister in Bowling Green, Ohio, stood by me. Has the work measured up to my prophecies? Look at the reports of our missionary boards. In the comparative statement compiled by the A. C. M. S. New Jersey appears as a per capita contributor to the amount of a little more than five times the average of the next highest state. And our contributions are alike regular and generous for every regular call.

Most earnestly do I wish I might get such proximity as I desire to the heart, even to the ear, of our eldership and ministry. Especially would I delight to have access to the official aural appendage of each of the 1,500 and more congregations which contribute to home and foreign missions and withhold aid from church extension. After sounding the tocsin of $100,000 this year for home missions until they caught something of the magnificent significance of such a triumph, then I would settle down to ringing the changes on the indubitable fact that neglect of church extension is the most inexcusable shortsightedness, the effectual negative of all our local fulminations against the progress of sin, in that it makes impossible the progress of righteousness to keep pace with opportunities for service opened to us by the hand of the Lord. To withhold from church extension is not to hurt anybody in Kansas City, it hurts us whose interests are one with yours; to ignore the September offering does not spite any board, it spites only him who ignores our appeals from these outlying points for a chance to help bear the burdens of the Lord. Do any of you good brethren dare prate of the sacrifices of past pioneers and our indebtedness to them, and refuse, withal, to pay any portion of the interest or principal of that debt to the present successors of those pioneers, to those of us who are doing our best to make glad waste places? When you tie the hands of the home board and Church Extension that they cannot send, you are but tying our feet that we may not go. Your obligation is not to boards, but to brethren whom they send as you allow. Thirty thousand dollars we are asking from Church Extension at their next meeting. The chiefest burden of the board is to be compelled to refuse our calls for lack of funds. From all over the land we look to Cincinnati to see the measure of your fellowship in evangelizing the frontiers. To Kansas City we look to see the measure of your fellowship in sheltering the weak, housing the homeless and putting material foundations beneath our highest aspirations.

Thirty thousand dollars for Church Extension in the September offering, $100,000 this year for evangelization through the A. C. M. S. ($5,000 yet to come in August), and $200,000 for world-wide proclamation of the gospel of the Son of God, that program once fulfilled will send a thrill of joyous sympathy around the world, perhaps into the beyond.

A gentleman made a remark in my hearing recently which was ludicrous enough as to subject matter, but the way he said it caused pain. He had been argued at for some time by an orthodox enthusiast. He tolerated first, then endured, then squirmed and turned. He said, "I had rather be dubbed a heretic by some folks than to have my pocket cry out against my mouth and say that I am a ———, timorous mortal whose religion is all above my diaphragm and finds vent only across my vocal cords."

We looked each other squarely in the eye for a moment, but fearing lest he might be uncomfortably well posted in comparative religious statistics, I stoutly affirmed that more of us were learning all the time how to pay cash for the right to speak up boldly, and the conversation closed. I dreamed of it again last night, and I am not addicted to nightmare, either.

R. P. SHEPHERD.

The Mormon-Christian War.

The "Mormons" of the "Reorganized Church," called "Josephites," to distinguish them from "Brighamites, Hedrickites" and all other kind of "ites," have launched a new paper called The Watchman, published at Clarksburg, W. Va. It is a monthly, three-column folio, just the size of my paper, The Helper.

The large weeklies of that spot on the Mormon pig certainly expect great things of The Watchman from the welcome they give it. The Saints' Herald of Lamoni, Ia., says: "We anticipate that much good will be done by the neat little paper, and commend the Clarksburg Saints for their undertaking."

Zion's Ensign, Independence, Mo., says: "The anti-Mormon missionary society organ, The Helper, has a most worthy opponent in a little paper published by the brethren in West Virginia, which they have called The Watchman. The 'antis' have been distributing The Helper in that state pretty freely, it is said, and our brethren propose to meet the issue right there. The Watchman is the result of this discussion."

In this connection we will hear the newcomer in its own words express its mission. Here's from its salutatory:

"This publication is just what its name implies, The Watchman. It is the work of the missionaries in W. Va.,—not Utah missionaries. It will be distributed as a tract freely throughout their field of labor, to meet the vile misrepresentations of various journals and pulpites, particularly the Helper, the organ of the national anti-Mormon Missionary Association of the churches of Christ (?) an institution of Campbellism organized at their late war-dance at Omaha, Neb. Eld. J. W. Darby is captain of the company, and R. B. Neal, evangelist, of Grayson, Ky., is editor of The Helper. This paper will watch and faithfully report their doings for the benefit of the saints generally. It will expose their duplicity and all their designs against the Reorganized Church.

"The Watchman will gather the news from all parts of the field. It will follow The Helper and aid it in finding the truth, teaching that little but loud thing not to lie.

"It will also consider the anti-Mormon tracts, published by R. B. Neal, evangelist, Grayson, Ky., giving them special attention."

Had I the shade of a shadow of a doubt as to the very effective work the Helper and my tracts were doing to halt Mormonism, the coming of this paper would forever banish it. If the Watchman is not "all blow and rattle" I can promise the readers of the Helper an interesting scrap. I love "a fight to the finish." A fight that means death to the cause of one and life and growth to the cause of the other. This is the kind of a battle I want with Mormonism, and every other kind of an "ism."

I now propose to send a copy of the Helper free to every name on, or that may get on, the list of the Watchman for one year, provided that the editor or publisher will send the Watchman free to my list of subscribers. To those now on and to all who subscribe during the year. This will test the sincerity of their talk and prove their honesty. This proposition gives them a golden opportunity to "missionary" and to get missionary.

As a sample of their work I hand out a verbatim copy of the Watchman's first editorial:

"Burton, of Buckhannon, editor of the M. E. Times, says: Brigham Young furnished Captain Allen a battalion for the Mexican war. Five hundred men were enrolled. Brigham Young sent an agent to Washington and received twenty thousand dollars of their advance bounty. The government paid the soldiers an advance bounty of one hundred dollars each. This would make for all of the five hundred men the total sum of five thousand dollars. Out of this Brigham Young got twenty thousand! This beats the feeding of five thousand persons with five loaves and two fishes. But Burton's dupes believe it. We would refer the Helper (Editor Neal) to this bit of Mormon history—just the kind for the Helper. If Brigham Young could get twenty thousand dollars out of five thousand, the question as to the power of the Mormons to work miracles is solved at once. With the pugnacious editor of the Helper and the erudite editor of the Times, the bigger the lie the better the history."

That's all of it. Its editor has gone so wild against the Helper that he even tries to make plain "figures lie."

The following are admitted facts:

1. Five hundred Mormons enlisted with Uncle Sam for the war with Mexico.
2. One hundred dollars was paid each man as an advance bounty.

The Watchman states the above. The Helper agrees that both statements are facts. The real and only issue is, How much money did Brigham Young collect? We can easily figure that. Five hundred men; each man was paid $100. The Watchman says: "This would make the total sum of $5,000." The Helper says: "One hundred times five hundred will make $50,000. The men got that much."

The question still pops up, "How much did Brigham Young get?" Burton says that Brigham got $20,000 of it. To this the Watchman must agree, for it is simply a matter of history down on the ledgers of Uncle Sam. No guess work about it. Now what becomes of all that argument built on the loaves and fishes and that talk about miracles? The only wondrous thing, it really borders on the miraculous to all who are posted about Brigham Young, is that he didn't get more than twenty thousand out of fifty thousand dollars.

If the Watchman has any bits of Mormon history to refer to the Helper we kindly say, Just send them in. The war is on. Send for sample copies of the Helper and push its claims. Your help is needed and needed now.

Church Extension.

Remember to keep your church informed during August concerning the approaching September offering for Church Extension.

There are about 1,500 churches that believe in missionary co operation, that ought to fall in line for the first time this year for the Church Extension offering because they have never had fellowship in this branch of our missionary operation.

Up to the first day of August, 1903, the Board of Church Extension has helped to build 716 churches in 40 states and territories and the Dominion of Canada and in Honolulu.

The Church Extension plan, according to the idea of its founders, was that the money should be loaned to one church and be returned in five equal annual installments to go out to build others. How well the plan has worked is illustrated by the fact that 293 churches have paid back their loans, and the amount returned is $295,000.00.

Since the first of last October, the mission churches have paid back in loans and interest, over $54,000. This was done by about 400 of our mission churches. When we remember that last year 1,107 of our older and stronger churches sent about $17,635 as annual offerings to Church Extension, the comparison shows shameful neglect of this great work upon the part of our well established churches. The total receipts from all sources for Church Extension last year, that is, new receipts, amounted to $54,866, including over $11,000 paid by the mission churches.

To show the great demands made upon our Board of Church Extension, there were 22 applications, aggregating $41,000, which came in during the month of July. Add to this number and amount, the applications that will be filed in August and September, in view of the forthcoming September offering, and you will have some idea why the Board of Church Extension is pressing hard upon the consciences of every church and preacher the taking of the annual offering in September.

Over $20,000 of annuity money is being called for by churches during July to help them complete their church buildings, that are an absolute necessity to their existence and growth in the towns where they are located. Why do not more of our good men and women turn over money to the Board of Church Extension on the annuity plan? The churches that are asking for this $20,000 of annuity money cannot borrow money any place else except from the Board of Church Extension. The Board will pay its annuities six per cent in semi-annual payments and back up its bonds with a total fund on the first of August of over $371,000. The annuitant will have a clear income with no taxes to pay. Write to G. W. Muckley, Kansas, City, Mo., and send your draft for whatever you can, amounting to $100 or more, and help to relieve these churches that want to complete their buildings.

A comparative statement of the receipts of the Board of Church Extension from October 1, 1902, to August 1, 1903, with the same period last year, shows the following:

1903.	1902.
From churches, $7,874.84	$6,021.33
" individuals, 18,845.19	20,873.13

It will be noticed that we have gained $1,853.61 from the churches and lost $2,027.94 from individuals, showing a falling behind in our receipts of $174.33 for the first ten months of this present missionary year. It is natural that we should gain from churches and fall behind in individual receipts because the Board has no more income, practically, from five year pledges, which the corresponding secretary ceased to take five years ago. The total income from five year pledges this year will not amount to more than $3,000. All emphasis, therefore, should be placed by the churches and preachers upon the annual offering day or the Board will be greatly crippled in its work. The Board is now sending out its supplies and there ought to be at least 2,000 churches ordering supplies of collection envelopes and "Nuggets of Truth." The Board will also supply pastoral letters. Let there be a general rally for Church Extension in September. All communications concerning the offering day should be addressed to G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., 600 Water Works Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

C. W. B. M. in Missouri.

Mr. Hartley Banks, of Columbia, made an offering to Burgess Memorial through the auxiliary, in memory of his mother, Sister Mary Banks, who died April 26. He also keeps her name on the auxiliary roll by paying her monthly offering. Isn't this a sweet testimony of "love for mother?"

Several auxiliary officers have written asking the date when fourth quarter reports must reach me, in order to be "counted in." This is good. It shows a deep interest in the good standing of our state. It is getting beyond self. My reply is, Sept. 13. This gives them to me on Monday morning, allowing six days to enter, foot, tabulate and print,—just as short a time as it is possible to do it in. You must be prompt. Monday, Sept. 14 will be too late. Do your best to be "counted in," thus rounding out our reports and, if other conditions are complied with, be entitled to a place on roll of honor. I wonder how many auxiliary women read these notes? I should judge by the response to requests that very few do. Who read and responded to Sister Goode's request for a state motto a few weeks ago? Did you? Are you not interested in this matter? Don't you believe you owe it to your state officers to co-operate with them when possible? If you knew how we covet your counsel and interest, yes, your love, you would help and encourage us by doing whatever we request of you. You dear women sometimes sit down and roll your discouragements into a personal letter, then apologize for telling dark things. Why, bless your dear, troubled hearts, it helps us to know you meet troubles in the Lord's work. It is when there are none that we fear. Then we feel sure there is no resistance to the world and its forces, that you are drifting, a most dangerous thing to progression in spiritual matters. Tell us your discouragements and your encouragements, also. MRS. L. G. BANTZ.

Missionary Work in Missouri During the War.

A few facts in regard to missionary effort in the days when "dark clouds" hung over this beloved state, may be of interest to many, especially of our younger brethren who have come upon the stage of church activity since those "days that tried men's souls." We are prone, it seems, to think we are living in the grandest of all ages, or of going to the other extreme of thinking things are going to pieces generally, and all that is good and grand lies in the bygone. Of these two ideas, one puffs up and the other dwarfs the soul. The real grandeur of any age is its nearness to the Christ; so Christ was in Missouri in 1864, even though the powers of darkness seemed to reign almost supreme.

By an earnest call from the pen of Bro. T. P. Haley, after counseling with many brethren, a number of preachers and other members of the body of Christ assembled in Chillicothe, Mo., in the month of May, 1864, and organized themselves into a state missionary meeting, adopting a constitution and electing officers to serve until a semi-annual meeting, to be held in the same place in September following. Among other things, it was determined to put into the field a traveling corresponding secretary, who was to be paid at the rate of $1,000 per year. To meet this, some $2,500 was raised in pledges, running from one to five years. Bro. Benjamin Lockhart, then of Trenton, was chosen. He accepted the work. The following is a summary of his work from then until the following September: Labored 89 days, traveled 1,611 miles, raised in pledges, $4,912.80, collected in cash, $709.35, and baptized 47 persons. This work speaks in language no man can fail to understand in regard to the missionary spirit in Missouri at that time. It did not have to be created by a younger generation. Among the delegates present at that meeting, we note the following: D. T. Wright, Joseph F. Davis, T. P. Haley, J. J. Wyatt, Wm. Wood, J. S. Allen, E. Stuart, J. G. Tucker, E. J. Lampton and wife, L. T. Morris, Calvin Reasoner, D. M. Grandfield and wife, P. K. Dibble, Samuel Hatch, Henderson Davis, John Wood and B. H. Smith, with many of the members of the church in Chillicothe.

At this meeting, Christian University was formally presented by trustees or curators to the brotherhood, and formally accepted, the delegates pledging at least their influence for its upbuilding. In September, 1864, the semi-annual meeting was held with the church in Chillicothe. There was a goodly number present—almost everyone who attended the May meeting, besides a number who were not present at the former meeting. At this meeting the north part of the state was divided into four districts, and evangelists to labor in these districts were employed. Bro. D. T. Wright was appointed corresponding secretary (not to travel), Bro. Benj. Lockhart was appointed as one of the evangelists. The other evangelists were G. R. Hand, D. M. Grandfield and E. J. Lampton. The meeting adjourned to meet in Palmyra in May, 1865, which did meet and had a fair attendance and was highly enjoyed by those present; but as I have not the minutes of that meeting, I can only give the result of evangelistic work up to the class of 1864, which was as follows: Elder Benj. Lockhart reports November 26, 1864, 39 days' work, 48 baptized, $58 cash, pledges, $106. Brother Hand reports for October and November, 36 days, 42 baptisms 23 added otherwise, cash, $45.75, pledges, $145. D. M. Grandfield reports 4 days' work, 8 baptisms, $15.45 cash. E. J. Lampton reports 3 days' work, 1 baptism, $8 cash, $87 pledged. What was done during January, February, March and April of 1865, we have no means at our command of knowing, for these months cover some of the darkest days of north Missouri. Some of the evangelists had to give up their field and find labor in other lands. Most all of them have now closed their earthly toils and have entered into that sweet rest beyond the dark river. Count the names mentioned in this short and imperfect history and ask how many are among the dying and how many have departed and entered into the land of the living. Only a very few now remain to have their memories refreshed by these brief words. The departed wrought well, and God will not forget them. There were a few who opposed the work, and some said, "We will wait and see." But those who had a mind to work, toiled on, trusting in God. E. J. LAMPTON.

Rededication at Council Grove, Kan.

On, Aug. 2, after five months of earnest toil and labor, we rededicated our newly made and repaired house of worship. It stood on the low river banks, was annually flooded in and outside. A new lot was bought and church moved onto it. The house was repapered, painted and carpeted, $1,000 improvements put on it, and all the money raised. W. S. Lowe dedicated it and raised $420. All debts paid and we are free.

Nebraska Ministerial Institute.

The Nebraska Ministerial Institute has become a fixture and a force in the life of our alert Nebraska preachers.

It has been a rare treat to the writer to be associated for two weeks in biblical lectures and studies; with such men as Chancellor W. P. Aylesworth, of Cotner University, and R. A. Schell, president of the institute, and V. E. Shirley, and H. G. Wilkinson, vice-president and secretary, respectively.

This institute is held in Cotner University, and thus helps to bring this institution more prominently before the preachers and churches of the state. Chancellor Aylesworth lectures year by year, being a favorite with Nebraska preachers, and endearing himself to them constantly. It is a high tribute to the ability and popularity of the chancellor that others may come and go, but he "goes on forever." His courses of lectures this year were in logic and the book of Hebrews, and they were greatly enjoyed by his students. With the growing popularity of institute work Chancellor Aylesworth is sure to come to the front. At the time of this writing he is at the Bethany Assembly in Indiana giving lectures.

The institute is a season of recreation and study. Especially the latter. The men who attend are in blood earnest, and bent upon getting the cream of things. They come for help, and are alert to catch the best, freshest, richest thought their lecturers can give. Such men are an honor to the cause, and they are pushing their "dead line" far away into their seventies and eighties.

The policy of the institute is to employ a different lecturer each year. Brother C. A. Young, of Chicago, was here two years ago. Last year, Bro. J. B. Briney, of Moberly, Mo. This year—the writer.

Summer schools are growing in popularity. Many earnest people are learning that rest may be found in recreation, and that the whole year's burden is made lighter by a few weeks of special work. The Bethany institute might well serve as a model in other states.

At the time of this writing the state meeting is in session, and the pretty grove in Bethany is white with tents. It is expected that a thousand people will be in attendance.

Silver Bay Conference.

The conference of leaders of the forward missionary movement among young people which was held at Silver Bay, Lake George, N. Y., July 22-31, was far-reaching in its plans and results. There were present 377 delegates from 21 states, representing 18 denominations. They were choice young people, selected by their various churches on account of their ability and devotion. They acquired vision, knowledge of facts and methods, and through prayer and fellowship have realized inspiration and consecration necessary for leadership for their own people. Here were brought together those most interested in developing the missionary spirit among young people, for the systematic study of the Bible as related to missions, mission biography, the fields, home and foreign, and the numerous problems fundamental to the evangelization of the world. A part of each day was set apart for instruction and conference about the work of the missionary committees in the young people's societies, in local unions, districts, state and denominational organizations, the organization and conduct of mission study classes, and missionary instruction and giving in Sunday-schools. The best plans and helps available were suggested by leaders and members of the conference. One of the most inspirational services was the vesper when the grand missionary hymns were sung and every body sang.

Denominational meetings were held to consider policies for the coming year's campaign in the churches. Stirring addresses were made by L. D. Wishard, one of the originators of the movement, Harlan P. Beach, Bishop Thoburn, John Willis Baer, Pres. J. F. Goucher, S. H. Hadley, S. Earl Taylor, C. V. Vickery and others of like power. On Sunday evening, after a service addressed by three young men student volunteers, 13 young men and women pledged themselves for foreign mission work, if God so desired. Others determined to take up home mission work. Prayer was the all-pervading spirit and source of power during every hour of the conference.

The first conference of this movement was held in New York City in Dec., 1901, with more than 100 present. The second was held at Silver Bay, July, 1902, with 172 in attendance. The first one of this year met at Lookout Mountain early in July, 167 being enrolled. So in the four conferences held within the last 19 months, more than 900 young people of 30 denominations have been awakened and inspired to become the leaven among their own people that shall show the waiting world what God can do with thousands of young people fully consecrated to him. The young people's forward missionary movement is destined to become a movement of movements, including all the world for the evangelization of all the world. MARY A. JOHNSON.

California Convention, Santa Cruz.

This is the last day of the Christian Church State Convention for northern California. It has been the most pleasant, highly interesting, lovable and profitable convention ever held in this state. The C. W. B. M., with Sister Hartley in the chair, did its work and did it well.

Brother McCay presided with dignity and entire satisfaction to all. Brother Nesbit, of Fresno, with that cultured and very sweet voice which he has, led a large and well-trained choir to the delight of all, while Sister Cutler, as organist, did well her part and made many new friends. Allen Wilson, of Indianapolis, was chief speaker. He appeared on the rostrum as a recruiting officer for the Captain of our salvation; His sermons were delivered with Christian enthusiasm and great earnestness. Many able addresses were delivered by men and women of acknowledged ability, which I have not time to notice, but I must call attention to the valuable services of A. McLean, of Cincinnati. He delivered seven addresses during the convention. His addresses on Alexander Campbell as master of assemblies, the power of preachers and the unity of the church, should be printed in pamphlet form and distributed for the benefit of those who are just coming on the stage of action, and for the comfort of those whose time of departure is at hand. I desire to thank him with all my heart for the privilege of reading and studying his manuscripts which I could not hear.

Last year's work in California was very successful and encouraging, both as to additions and finance. Many more were added to the church than in former years, and all debts were met and promptly paid, and there is a nice balance in the treasury. The state board worked in perfect harmony and received the hearty co-operation of the brotherhood.

The Berkeley Seminary and Dean Van Kirk excitement, about which we have all read and heard so much, caused no trouble whatever here; all seemed to be of one mind and one heart relative to that matter, as was evidenced by the fact that the old Berkeley Seminary board was re-elected unanimously.

The following were elected and will compose the state board for next year: A. C. McKeener, president; C. W. Jopon, secretary; Thomas Barr, treasurer; W. F. Reagan, U. A. Russell, B. G. White and A. L. Platt, vice-presidents; J. P. Dargitz, corresponding secretary and financial agent. This is a strong board. They will go to work with the love and confidence and co-operation of the entire brotherhood, and much will be accomplished by them next year as instruments in the hands of God.

Garfield Park is truly a lovely place, well suited for the headquarters of a great and growing brotherhood. The church has here a large and comfortable tabernacle capable of seating 2,000 persons, a large restaurant where meals are served at reasonable prices, a store, post office, telephone system, street car every fifteen minutes to Santa Cruz, a number of cottages and scores of tents, with a vast throng of as intelligent and happy people as the world has. This gives simply an idea of Garfield Park, which is regarded as the loveliest resort on the coast of the Golden State. The church owned 140 lots in the park. All have been sold to members of the church but 29, and they will soon go.

The Berry Brothers, editors of the Pacific Christian, are here, and are elegant Christian gentlemen. I was glad to meet with Sister Winthrop, H. Hopson and others, and talk over other days spent in Kentucky, Missouri and Kansas, but we were much disappointed in not seeing and hearing the junior Garrison, the brilliant assistant editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Many of us who have known and loved his father these many years past, were anxious to see and hear him. We are in California on a visit to Brother McKeener and wife. JOHN BALLINGER.

CURED TO STAY CURED.

Mrs. S. T. Roberts, Clinton, La., sent a postal card request for a trial bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine to Drake Formula Company, Drake Block, Chicago, Ill., and received it promptly by return mail without expense to her. Mrs. Roberts writes that the trial bottle of this wonderful Palmetto Medicine proved quite sufficient to completely cure her. She says: "One trial bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine has cured me after months of intense suffering. My trouble was Inflammation of Bladder and serious condition of Urinary organs. Drake's Palmetto Wine gave me quick and entire relief and I have had no trouble since using the one trial bottle."

Drake's Palmetto Wine cures every such case to stay cured. It is a true, unfailing specific for Liver, Kidney, Bladder and Prostate Troubles caused by Inflammation, Congestion or Catarrh. When there is Constipation, Drake's Palmetto Wine produces a gentle and natural action of the bowels and cures Constipation immediately, to stay cured. One small dose a day does all this splendid work, and any reader of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST may prove it by writing to Drake Formula Company, Drake Block, Lake and Dearborn Streets, Chicago, Ill., for a trial bottle of Drake's Palmetto Wine. It is free, and cures. A letter or postal card is your only expense.

C. P. Williamson.

Is it possible that he is no more? That we no more shall hear his clear, calm voice, or behold the face wreathed in smiles? He was a sunny man; he loved the pure, the dignified and the noble in life.

I knew him well; when a student his presence and voice cheered me; at Madison Institute, Richmond, Ky., I visited him, and we were at Lawrenceburg in one of the first "protracted" meetings I ever attended, and my memory of him will ever be sweet. He has since then assisted me in meetings; he knew how to rebuke a church, and he knew how to inspire. He was fearless in dealing with evil and loyal to the pastor. A wise counselor, strong, yet tender-hearted as a woman. At times as he plead for souls I have wondered how a sinner could resist. It seemed as though he looked into heaven, and no wonder he so preached. In Atlanta, Ga., he did a wonderful work. It seems too hard that such men have to leave this earth, and men who are only stumbling blocks remain; but God knows it is not for us to reason, but ours to be resigned through faith.

He was a scholar, educator, preacher, pastor and evangelist; his talents were many, God-given and used for his glory. As a preacher he was graphic, realistic, poetical, convincing, yet simple. The young loved to hear him, and the aged were comforted by his words. He loved his family, and to those who remain, and through whose tears God's sunbeams play, suffer the exhortation, "Look up and trust, Christ is with you."

He is not dead, but still lives; but now perfectly. He will watch and wait at the beautiful gate as your days are passing by. He is at rest, and instead of a cross it is a crown; instead of heartache it is "joy unspeakable and full of glory." Christ loves you; trust him to wipe away your tears and to lead you to living fountains of waters, in a land where no sorrow is, where sin cannot enter, and thus shall "we be forever with the Lord," and the loved who have gone before. A. M. GROWDEN.

Dedication at New Franklin, Mo.

The pastor, Arthur N. Lindsey, and four M. K. & T. railway employees, each borrowed one hundred dollars, and with that amount the beautiful new church at New Franklin was started. Then followed a story of sacrificial heroism and triumphant faith in God and his people till the dedication, Sunday, July 26. On that day, assisted by Frank G. Tyrrell, Edgar M. Richmond and J. B. Briney, with Presidents J. B. Jones and Carl Johann to participate in the services, the happy people and pastor set apart the completed building to the worship and service of God.

With the parsonage adjoining, the property is easily worth $10,000. The main auditorium is reached by two front entrances and one side entrance. There is a good Bible-school room, together with basement, kitchen and dining room, and a fine airy pastor's study. The windows are of cathedral glass, each one being a gift or a memorial. The front window is a memorial to Wm. Burton, for forty years a minister of the gospel. On opposite sides of the auditorium are the windows in memory of John Lee and J. R. Estill, in the tower memorials to A. F. and T. A. Settle and John and C. E. Whitlock. Other windows are gifts of sister churches in the country. The baptistry is a gift of the McGavrocks.

The ladies of the church gave a basket dinner in the grove hard by, and of the generous fragments served an equally choice supper to all who remained to the evening service. The Methodist and Baptist churches dismissed their services for the day, attended the dedication, and offered their houses for our preachers at night. The indefatigable pastor follows the dedication with a special meeting.

Your reporter was entertained at the home of the pastor and at the fine country place of Mr. Wallace Estill, one of the elders. Mrs. Lindsey is a sister of Baxter Waters, whose fame is among the churches. F. G. T.

Life of W. K. Pendleton, by F. D. Power, is a late book from our press. This book is the work of a skilled author, dealing with the life of a great and good man. The book contains more than 400 large pages and many fine illustrations. Price $1.50, postpaid. A few extracts from high testimonials follow:

"This is one of the most delightful volumes that has appeared from our press in many years. Bethany people, and thousands besides, will read it with the greatest interest and with the greatest pleasure."—Missionary Intelligencer.

"This book ought to be owned and read by every preacher in Virginia. It is of absorbing interest to every Disciple interested in our pioneers and pioneer work."—Christian Monthly.

"A portraiture as charming as it is valuable. Dr. Power has performed a great service. The book is full of the personal charm of the subject and of the author. The life is a noble one—among the noblest and purest that are known to our annals—and it is worthily portrayed by a pen that ranks among the most skillful as well as the most delightful that is known to our literature to-day."—Christian Standard.

"Dr. Power's pre-eminent qualifications for the task undertaken by him are traceable not only to the fact of his long and intimate personal acquaintance with Dr. Pendleton, but also to his deep sympathy with him in his lofty aims and objects and his fellowship with him in his arduous labors and sacrifices."—J. S. LAMAR.

"Married by me" is what the preacher says in a marriage certificate. We can furnish marriage certificates in different grades and will be glad to send illustrated circular on receipt of request. Write us.

A Shaped Note Edition of the Christian Sunday-School Hymnal has just been printed by us. We have published this book in attractive board binding and greatly reduced the price from former prices. We have frequent calls for music books with shaped or character notes, and can recommend this edition of the Christian Sunday-School Hymnal as a splendid, all-purpose music book. We can furnish this music book at $2.40 per dozen, or $18.00 per hundred copies, sent by express, not prepaid.

WING ORGANS

We make the Wing Organs and sell them ourselves. They go direct from Factory to Home.

We do not employ agents or salesmen. When you buy a Wing Organ, you pay the actual cost of making it and our small wholesale profit. This profit that we charge is very small because of the large number of organs we sell. A single agent or dealer sells very few organs in a year and has to charge a large profit.

You save from $50. to $150.

by buying an organ direct from the factory.

Sent on Trial. We Pay Freight. No Money in Advance.

We will send a Wing Organ to any part of the United States on trial. We pay all freight charges in advance. We deliver the organ to your railroad depot free of expense to you. We do not ask for any advance payment or deposit. You can try the organ right in your home for 20 days, and if not satisfactory to you we will take it back entirely at our expense. You pay us nothing unless you keep the organ. There is absolutely no risk or expense to you.

EASY MONTHLY PAYMENTS. Thirty-four years' experience enables us to guarantee every Wing Organ for twelve years against any defect in tone, action, workmanship, or material. Wing Organs need absolutely no tuning. They have a sweet tone, easy action, very handsome case.

CATALOGUE.—A beautiful catalogue of Wing Organs containing handsome half-tone pictures will be sent free if you write.

prayer-meeting last night. We are to let the contract for our new church Saturday, Aug. 15.—J. H. COIL.

St. Louis, Aug. 3.—One addition at Huntsville yesterday.—W. H. KERN, 518 N. Garrison Avenue.

Elvins, Aug. 10.—One addition yesterday from the Methodists: 37 additions in the past four months.—J. G. M. LUTTENBERGER.

Springfield, Aug. 3.—Two additions yesterday: one by letter and one by confession and baptism. We leave in the morning for our vacation. Will be at Baldwin, Ark., near Fayetteville, for a month.—D. W. MOORE.

Altamont, Aug. 4.—Two from the M. E. Church at Prairie City. One baptism at Altamont; one baptism at Civil Bend.—G. W. LEONARD.

Windsor, Aug. 4.—Just closed a meeting at Hall Town, Mo., resulting in a new organization of 25 members: nine by primary obedience and a move on foot for a new house. The opposition was strong, but "the truth will prevail."—R. B. HAVENER.

SOUTH DAKOTA.—Oacoma.—We have had 27 additions here in three weeks.—W. F. DODGE.

TEXAS.—Corsicana, Aug. 3.—Being almost a year old in Texas, I asked the board of officers to ascertain the desire of the congregation as to future work. They met, decided to recommend that our present relations be continued, and notified the membership of the matter to be considered. By vote of all present yesterday, the board's recommendation was accepted. The church has not turned the world upside down, but has kept itself right side up. Two added last Sunday night. J. F. QUISENBERRY.

VIRGINIA.—Martinsville, Aug. 6.—Just closed a short meeting at Stoneville, N. C. This is a small town and four churches; not much material. There were 16 persons baptized and six added otherwise. J. A. Spenser is the pastor. He is quite popular.—W. H. BOOK.

THE PULPIT

What Think Ye of Christ? By H. B. Underwood.

(Matt. 22: 42.)

This is pre-eminently an age of investigation. Especially is this true of every problem of a religious nature. The Christian is forced to give a reason for the hope that he possesses to every one who challenges him. A mere profession goes for an idle tale. Proof and proposition must be homogeneous. We must meet the agnostic challenger upon his own ground. In this age it would be detrimental to shirk the responsibility of investigation. The critic, the scientist, and the skeptic must alike be answered. If a thing is in existence, there is a reason for its existence. We must prove every religious proposition by testimony, and the testimony must be built upon facts. It is self-evident that a thing that is in existence must have had a beginning. Christianity has been perpetuated for over eighteen hundred years. Its existence no one denies. It is either true or false. It must have originated either with God or man or the devil. It would not be reasonable to suppose that the devil would originate a thing that would destroy his own kingdom, or that man would create a system of morals that would condemn his practices. This being true, we must conclude that God is the author of Christianity.

What think ye of Christ? Whose son was He? Was He the son of God, or as the skeptic says, was He the fleshly son of Joseph and Mary? We do not suppose that any scholar of to-day would deny the personal Christ. Even Strauss and Renan, notwithstanding their destructive criticism of some of the vital truths of Christianity, acknowledge the historical Christ. Infidelity no longer controverts the claim that a man called Christ lived, taught and suffered crucifixion in Judea nineteen hundred years ago. To do so would be a denial of plain, historical facts.

Mythical theories were tenable only before archaeology had poured the wealth of its discoveries at the feet of modern scholarship.

But leaving this external evidence let us look to that within. Did Jesus rise from the dead? If He did, then He is the Son of God, and the Bible is of divine origin. Christianity and infidelity run in parallel lines in regard to the personal Christ, the land of His birth, the time of His birth, and His arrest, trial, crucifixion and burial. The divergence comes in regard to His resurrection. Christianity says He was raised from the dead by the power of the Father in Heaven. Infidelity denies this, and claims that His disciples stole His body from the tomb. Which is correct? If His disciples stole His body from the tomb, then as Paul says, "If Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins." What evidence have we that His disciples stole the body from the tomb? The only evidence is that of the Roman soldiers stationed at the tomb of Christ. What is their evidence? They say, "after being given large money," that, while they were sleeping at their post of duty, His disciples came in the still hours of the night and stole the body from the tomb. But we must not overlook the fact that the Centurion, a Roman soldier, said when he felt the earthquake, saw the sun refuse to shine, "Truly, this was the Son of God." What object would His disciples have in stealing the body from the tomb? They believed that it would decay just the same as any other body. They did not understand that He would rise from the dead the third day. Their conceptions of His kingdom were that it would be an earthly kingdom, and that they would occupy places of honor in it. Even after His resurrection from the dead they asked Him, saying, "Lord wilt Thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" Would it be reasonable to suppose that a few unarmed men and some women would attempt this theft when they knew that the tomb was guarded by sixty Roman soldiers?

The object of those women, who were waiting so patiently for the expiration of the time for which the guard were stationed to watch, was not to remove the body from the tomb, but to anoint it with frankincense. Upon entering the tomb and finding the body gone, they even accused the guard of removing it, which showed that they had no previous thought of trying to remove it themselves.

But let us hear Peter on the day of Pentecost, just fifty days after Christ's resurrection from the dead, "Ye men of Israel, hear these words, Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God, among you by miracles and wonders and signs, which God did by Him in the midst of you, as ye, yourselves also know, Him being delivered by the determinate counsel and fore knowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain. Whom God hath raised up, having loosed the pains of death, because it was not possible that He should be holden of it,—this Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we are all witnesses." This is peculiar language coming from the lips of this apostle, charged with being the prime factor in stealing Christ's body from the tomb. But there was not a dissenting voice to be heard. Even Christ's murderers and Peter's accusers believed the apostle's statement and cried out, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?"

Again hear the same apostle, "For we have not followed cunningly devised fables when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye witnesses of His majesty. For He received from God, the Father, honor and glory, when there came to Him such a voice from the excellent glory: 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased,' and this voice, which came from Heaven, we heard when we were with Him in the holy mount." He could not have been deceived, for he had the same opportunity as Thomas to thrust his fingers into the nail holes in His hands and feet if he had desired additional testimony to prove that it was the risen Christ.

Let us turn to a man, a disciple of Gamaliel, a member of the Sanhedrim, surpassing many of his age, "Touching the righteousness that is of the law found blameless." See this man raging like a ferocious beast, "making havoc of the church." He persecutes even to strange cities, and journeys to Damascus with authority from the High Priest to bring all Christians bound to Jerusalem. He saw a light from Heaven and heard a voice saying, "Saul! Saul! why persecutest thou me?" And he replies, "Who art thou, Lord?" And the answer comes back, "I am Jesus, whom thou persecutest." What a great change suddenly takes place in this man's life. He turns his back on all past honors. With inspired zeal he travels into Syria, Arabia, Palestine, Asia Minor, Macedonia, Greece, Crete, Italy, preaching Christ and Him crucified. He counted not his life dear unto himself, "In labors more abundant, in prisons oft, in stripes above measure, in death oft." He was shipwrecked, stoned, beaten with rods, and of the Jews received he forty stripes, save one. We find him "in perils of rivers, in perils of robbers, in perils of his countrymen, in perils among the gentiles, in perils in the city, in perils in the sea, in perils in the wilderness, in perils among false brethren, in labor, in travail, in watching often, in hunger and thirst, in fasting often, in cold and nakedness, pressed down with anxiety for all the churches," the Holy Spirit testifying in every city, bonds and afflictions awaited him.

Was he discouraged? No. Hear him: "None of these things move me, I am ready not only to suffer, but to die, if need be, for the Lord Jesus." How prophetic were those words! See him as he stands bound in chains before the Emperor, Nero. Hear him say, "Decapitate me if you will, but I will never deny the resurrection of Jesus." What courage! What zeal! Who can doubt the sincerity of this man? Paul was led three miles from the city, to a place called the Fountain of Salvienne, where the executioner's block awaited him. On the way he preached the gospel of Jesus to the soldiers who guarded him. Three of them accepted this gospel and soon after suffered martyrdom.

We would point to Ignatius, bishop of the church in Antioch; to Polycarp, bishop of the church in Smyrna; to Symphorose, Perpetua, Felicitas and hundreds of others who suffered martyrdom for the cause of Jesus of Nazareth.

Is it possible that 1900 years of the world's history revolve about a life that never existed—a mythical Christ? Does B. C. and A. D. record the birth of a delusion? Erase the name of Jesus Christ from the past and you not only become the iconoclast of literature and art, but you must obliterate 1900 years of the world's history.

It has been said that Julius Cæsar was the greatest man that ever lived. Ridpath says that he was head and shoulders above the age in which he lived. Did angels announce the birth of Julius Cæsar? Did the sun refuse to witness his assassination in the senate chamber? Did Julius Cæsar have power to take his body up and lay it down again? Was it for the name of Julius Cæsar that apostles proclaimed, martyrs died, and musicians landed? Is it at the name of Julius Cæsar that every knee shall bow and every tongue confess? Cæsar and his kingdom are things of the past, and were it not for history they would have been forgotten long ago. But the name of Jesus, the Babe born in a manger, is lauded to-day more than any other. You may go to the remote isles of the sea and His name is there; you may sail the boundless ocean and His name is there; you may visit every land and clime and His name is there; if you could enter to that within the veil, you would find His name there. His name spans eternity past and eternity to come. He is the Alpha and Omega. He is the Son of God.

The Strength of the Hills is His Also.

I am grieved to part with Pike's Peak. The hoary old monarch has grown increasingly dear to me. A magnificent thunder storm swept around his base to-day, with vivid lightnings flashing clear to the zenith, and dense black clouds that poured out their waters upon his rocky sides, while a heavy fall of snow whitened his top. All the elements seem to assault him and rage around him, but he is everlastingly serene. Such is the power of a great soul that lives near to heaven and looks down upon earth and earthly things. He is a liberal giver, this old mountain. He gives gold and things better than gold. He gives health and fruitfulness and protection and lessons of the immutability and of the resources of God. Here at his base are fountains of blessing. As I sit and watch the multitudes come and go, a new and sweeter meaning breaks forth from that precious scripture: "Ho every one that thirsteth come ye to the waters!" They come, people of all classes and creeds and conditions; men and women of wealth, rich with jewels and fine clothing, and poor children of toil with the dust and grime upon them; aged people, and little children, many of them wheeled in their baby carriages; sick ones with pale faces and shrunken forms, and the deadly cough that tells such a story and drives so many to this dry air and lofty attitude; white people and black, Indian and Chinaman; men and women and children with bottles and jugs and vessels of every kind to fill at the free flowing fountains that pour out their bounty without stint or measure for all. How good is God! Why should not needy thirsting souls come with the same eagerness to the waters of eternal life!

A Modern Plea.

"I have just read with pleasure and profit, your little book entitled 'A Modern Plea for Ancient Truths,' and I want to thank you for giving it to us. I prize the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST most highly. I like its spirit, and in nearly every department I find many helpful thoughts. In the matter of the Berkeley Seminary it seems to me the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is just right."

From the Missionaries' Standpoint.

I want you to know that your article on "Church Federation," has been greatly appreciated by all the missionaries in the foreign field in India. It is one of the directions in which we must move in bringing about the desired Christian unity for which we hope and pray. Only narrow sectarian minds would refuse to co-operate on such grounds as laid down in your address.

I feel convinced that it has given our people a higher, broader and better understanding of the unity for which we stand.

That Hundred Thousand.

I am glad to see that we are near the $100,000 mark for home missions. The additional $5,000 ought to be secured in the next sixty days. The home society is doing so much for our cause all over the country, and especially so much in Kentucky, that I trust we shall not fail them in the great work they have in hand. We have laid great emphasis upon foreign missions, and rightfully so, but home and foreign missions are but two different phases of the self-same thing. They are different facets of the same gem; they are the two wings of a bird; they are the two legs of a man. Useless each without the other. Let us see to it that our full duty is done to home missions between this and the great convention at Detroit.

BURRIS A. JENKINS.

Hymn Books.

DEAR EVANGELIST:—In your issue of July 16 I inserted an article saying that we had 125 copies of the Standard Christian Hymnal that we would donate to some worthy church. In reply to that notice we have received up to date over sixty applications for the song books, and still the applications come. We made a special effort, and by so doing we were able to supply three churches with the number they wanted, one each in Michigan, New York and California. I am satisfied that there are many of our churches that have hymn books lying stowed away in their church shelves that would be glad to supply deserving churches if they knew the demand that is most piteous for the same. Will you not request churches that have unused books to denote them to some church, as by so doing they will not only bless some one else, but will be blessed themselves in so doing?

F. J. STINSON,

Pastor First Christian Church,

Cedar Rapids, Ia.

A Misnomer.

There are five churches in this town, one of which is the Christian. This church, in this community, represents the plea for Christian union. Two other churches here are stronger in numbers, none is stronger in zealous effort. However, it is difficult for this town to support five churches and five pastors; four should be enough. It occurs to me if we are to accept Bro. Cumming's position in the People's Forum, July 30, that the highest duty the Christian Church here can perform, is to disband, sell their property, give the money to the other churches, join those other churches, and thus "federate" with them. Would this be the most effective way to teach Christian union?

In a near-by town, Welch, I. T., there are a number of brethren who believe in the return to New Testament Christianity. They are not organized, but three other organizations have been formed and are struggling to gain a permanent footing. These other churches do not teach or practice Apostolic Christianity. Would it be best for these few disciples to give up their plea and unite with the denominations, or to begin a work that shall probably culminate in a Church of Christ?

Bro. Cumming's position is not federation.

If the few disciples at Hazelton are not doing any Christian work at all, they would strengthen, not weaken, the aggregate religious forces by getting to work and building a new church and, of course, a house for its home. If they are working with the other bodies, yet without joining them, they do well. They should be looking forward to a time when they may organize our own work. When they do so they may weaken the churches they now help, but not the aggregate religious force of the community. They may even augment it.

The way to increase the religious force in any community cannot possibly be to give up our position to accept that of some denomination. The natural conclusion from our brother's article is that our entire brotherhood ought to flock into other churches and add the force of our numbers and spiritual life to them. Of course, we would select the strong ones regardless of their teaching and practice. What a stupendous mistake the Campbells and their co-laborers made! Federation is good, but why call it federation to give up the Divine Plea and identify ourselves with those who hold to the very errors we seek to remedy?

Gospel of the Fields.

Have you ever thought, my friend,
As daily you toil and plod
In the noisy paths of man,
How still are the ways of God?

Have you ever paused in the din,
Of traffic's insistent cry
To think of the calm in the cloud,
Of the peace in your glimpse of the sky?

Go out in the growing fields
That quietly yield you meat,
And let them rebuke your noise
Whose patience is still and sweet.

They toil their æons; and we,
Who flutter back to their breast,
A handful of clamorous clay,
Forget their silence is best.

Mary Minton.

By Alice Curtice Moyer.

"Do you want to hear the story of Mary Minton?" asked our hostess during a lull in the conversation at a delightful little informal gathering of just a few of us who were close friends.

"Now, who is Mary Minton?" asked the youngest member of our group.

"She is just an everyday person in an everyday story of everyday life," was the reply. "She is not merely a type however,—though there are many like her—but a real woman."

"Then let us hear about her," said our young friend.

"I remember well when Mary was born," resumed our hostess, "and how I esteemed it a great privilege to be allowed to peep at her the next day as she lay under the cover beside her pretty young mother. Her mother was a sister to mine and of a good family. There was proud old Tennessee and Virginia blood in her veins. But her father—my grandfather and Mary's—had been unfortunate in speculation, and the family was poor at the time of the marriage of Mary's mother, and they felt that this, the youngest daughter, was doing well to marry the son of a well-to-do farmer; but misfortune awaited the young couple also. They had been married only a few months, when by some piece of rascality or trickery, the farm was gone, the stock mortgaged, and every vestige of property was wiped away and things were as though they had never existed. So, shortly after Mary's birth, the young father went west to try his fortune. The months passed and Mary could talk and walk, but still her father could not have his wife and baby come to him. He had a good, kind, loving nature and loved his wife and child dearly; but there was something lacking in his makeup. He did not have the ability or the courage or the tenacity to rise when once down; he just stayed down.

At last, however, news came that he was ready for his little family and money was sent them for the journey. The relatives gathered at my grandfather's where Mary and her mother had lived all these months, to help get them ready for the journey. It was not such a little thing in those days to travel so far, and we were all very glad to hear, three weeks later, that they had reached their destination safely.

Well, children came fast to the young couple, but this world's goods did not come in a corresponding measure. Soon Mary's young shoulders were becoming stooped from being a veritable baby-drudge. Her slender arms were ever ready to care for the brothers and sisters that came so fast, and the parents, in their struggle for existence, did not see that, though a child, she was becoming old and careworn.

Fourteen years after Mary and her mother had journeyed to the far west, we saw one evening at dusk, coming down the street toward our home, a rickety wagon drawn by two horses as rickety as the vehicle. There were some poor chairs and cooking utensils tied on behind the wagon, and from under the ragged cover that was drawn up at the sides, the heads of a large-numbered family protruded. We were surprised and shocked to find this to be the family of my aunt who, years before, had gone west a hopeful young wife and the mother of one child. This child, Mary, was now a girl of fifteen. She was tall and uncomfortable because of her angles and elbows; and she was proud. The blush of humiliation often came surging into her pale cheeks, but she was loyal to her parents and brothers and sisters and would have been quick to resent it had anything been said about the condition that brought the blush. Her father rented a small farm, and with the help of their more fortunate relatives, they managed to live, or rather to exist, through the winter. My mother made many little garments for the children, and when my aunt was finally taken sick from hardship and exposure and doomed to die if not better cared for, she took her to her own home and nursed her, during which time Mary mothered the children and did the best she could.

Soon they were on the go again. Mr. Minton could never understand that his poverty was due to himself. He always blamed his surroundings and was always possessed with the idea that he could do better somewhere else. This time they went to a northern state. Here Mary managed to attend school more than usual, and so rapidly did she advance, that at the age of eighteen she passed the teachers' examination and secured a country school. That should have been a beginning of better times for her it would seem, but there was her father's family as poor as ever, and Mary's little salary each month went for actual necessities of life in order that the family might exist. She did this for three years, never complaining a moment.

She would have been a nice looking girl now, under more favorable circumstances. The angles had rounded out, and her height, which was too great for fifteen, now gave her a dignity of bearing that commanded respect. She sometimes longed for something that she felt would be really nice. A new fall frock, perhaps; a new hat, kid gloves and so on. But she bravely wore her calicoes and wool mittens, shut her lips hard and said nothing.

When she was twenty-one she had her little romance. Wallace Eaton was a fine young man, highly respected, and possessed the ability to take care of a wife. Life suddenly put on a roseate hue for Mary, and she actually kept all of one month's salary to buy the white dimity dress, gloves, and other little articles which composed her trousseau. Her association with Wallace lifted her to a higher social plane and brought her many friends. She was glad to step out of her old narrow sphere and began to feel that the world was a glorious place. What a blessed comfort it was to stand with her hand in her lover's and hear him tell her that her old hard life would soon be over. Her eyes would fill with happy, grateful tears.

Well, they were married and went to live in the cozy home that Wallace had prepared, where three days were spent most blissfully. On the morning of the fourth day, Wallace kissed his bride and drove with the men to the field. In less than an hour he was carried to the house senseless. The horse had become frightened and unmanageable, and this was the result. For five years he was a helpless invalid.

Mary bravely took up the burden which was as large as the one she had lain down but a few days before, and bore it just as heroically. In addition to the tenderest care given to her stricken husband, she was compelled to oversee the work on the farm and did much of the work herself. The old stoop came back to her shoulders and her anguish over the condition of him she loved, brought a little more anxiety to her patient face. When he died, she found that the indebtedness incurred during his long illness, added to a mortgage that was on the farm when she married him, but which would have been of small moment if misfortune had not overtaken him, would require her all. She gave it up without a murmur and went back to her old profession of teaching in the country schools,—her money going to help her sisters prepare themselves to become self-supporting.

When I last saw her, though still young, her face was one to not soon forget. It was purely spiritual. Self-renunciation was written all over it. Self was crushed and her life dedicated to the service of others.

Only once did I see her show any signs of feeling as we earthly mortals feel. We had heard a beautiful sermon on the subject of heavenly reward where all our trials are laid down; where our hopes are made realities and where our aspirations are reached. The choir sang "Beautiful Isle of Somewhere." Mary clung tight to my arm as we passed out. Her hand trembled and I believed that I understood something of what she felt, but she said not a word.

There are many Mary Mintons in the world.

Newly-Hatched Americans.

The humors of citizen-making are described by a New York Sun reporter who paid a visit to the Federal court to see the naturalization of a contingent from Italy, who had been coached as to the answers they should make.

Whenever the commissioner suspects that a candidate is unworthy, he does not show it in his demeanor. He first puts the question:

"Do you renounce allegiance to the king of Italy?"

"Sure," answers the Italian.

"Will you take up arms against our President?"

"Sure," comes the reply with a promptness and a note of sincerity indicating long practice.

"Will you trample upon the American flag?"

"Sure."

"Will you sack and burn Washington?"

"Sure."

"Will you gloat over the nation's ruin?"

"Sure."

At this point, when the candidate thinks all is well, the commissioner springs up and shouts:

"Get out of here, all of you!"

Eight Great Secrets of Success.

A man with a mania for answering advertisements has had some interesting experiences. He learned that by sending $1.00 to a Yankee he could get a cure for drunkenness. And he did. It was to "take the pledge and keep it."

Then he sent fifty cents to find out how to raise turnips successfully. He found out. "Just take hold of the tops and lift."

Being young he wished to marry and sent thirty-four one-cent stamps to a Chicago firm for information as to how to make an impression. When the answer came it read, "Sit down on a pan of dough."

Next advertisement he answered read, "How to double your money in six months." He was told to convert his money into bills, fold them, and thus double his money.

Next he sent for twelve useful household articles and got a package of needles.

Benny's Front Tooth.

Benny lay in bed, and thought all about it. He knew he couldn't stand it. Then he rolled over and buried his face in the pillow, and dug his toes into the mattress, and wondered what he could do about it. Mamma had said firmly that the tooth must come out. Such a shame to spend a Saturday morning in that way, too.

Now it is only fair to Benny to say that when he had to have a tooth out last summer he was very brave, and faced the music like a man. That tooth had ached and ached, and when it was pulled they found it very bad; and, even though he had taken gas, it hurt him cruelly afterward, and he felt that he couldn't possibly be brave again. Beside, mamma had said that this time he couldn't even have gas.

"O Benny! are you worrying?" asked mamma, as she drew away the coverlet from Benny's face and saw two big round tears just ready to toboggan over Benny's rosy cheeks.

"Wow, but it hurt me last time!" Benny groaned. "Yes, but this is different. Why, the tooth is loose already. Come, be my brave, good boy!" Benny shook his head mournfully. And he wasn't a bit brave; but he managed to dress himself and eat a very, very little breakfast. His brother Rob went with him to the dentist. Of course he had to wait. Nobody ever went to a dentist and didn't. That is always the last screw to be turned. Rob tried to be very kind and brotherly. "Here, Benny," he said, "I knew you'd have to wait; and I brought some taffy and a story paper on purpose. Take a bit to cheer you up, and I'll read you a story." "It will take more than candy and stories to cheer me up," he said dolefully; but he took the candy generously held out to him, and bit into it. Then he groaned again.

"Oh, dear, I can't eat candy now. My tooth hasn't ached a bit, and now it's beginning. Oh, dear!" and he looked gloomier than ever. "It will stick my tooth all up, too. Maybe I can eat it afterward." And he dropped it into one of the dentist's envelopes and slipped it into his overcoat pocket. "Never mind," said Rob, cheerfully, glad that it wasn't he who must have a tooth pulled.

Just as Rob was beginning to read, the dentist called. Benny climbed tremblingly up into the chair, and the dentist hunted around among his instruments, for he knew what Benny had come for. Benny opened his mouth and held his breath. Then the dentist scowled with a pretended dismay.

"What's this, young man?" he asked sternly. "Are you trying to fool me? This isn't the first of April. What do you come to me for when you have pulled the tooth out yourself?"

Benny gasped. He couldn't believe his ears. He took the hand-glass and gazed with interest into the little red cavern of his mouth. As true as I'm alive the tooth was gone, and in its place was the tiniest round bit of a new one.

The dentist laughed, and Benny climbing down from the chair, looking very much surprised, but also very happy. He went back to the waiting room, drew the envelope from his overcoat pocket, looked at the taffy he had saved for by and by, and there, half buried in the dark, soft sweetness, gleamed the missing tooth.

How Rob laughed! "And you never even knew it had been pulled out!" he said. And then they went home to tell mamma how brave Benny had been.—Christian Register.

Helping Childs Along.

The following little story of the child-likeness of Walt Whitman, the poet, in his later days, is quoted in the Christian Endeavor World.

He was, as is well-known, dependent during most of his life upon the kindness of friends and admirers for support, making little or nothing from his writings. A few years before his death one of these friends called upon him in his little house in Camden, a suburban town of Philadelphia. "Well, Walt," he said, "how goes it this winter? Any subscription needed for Christmas?" "No," said Whitman. "No, I'm at work now. I'm in the employ of George W. Childs. He pays me fifty dollars a month."

"You at work! May I ask your occupation?"

"Why, I ride in the street cars. I fall into talk with the drivers and conductors and find out which of them have no overcoats and guess at their size and notify Childs, and then he sends the overcoats. It's not hard work," said the poet, "and then, you know, it helps Childs along."

With the Children

By J. Breckenridge Ellis

Tom McTeary, Osage, Ia: "Please put my name on the Honor List as I have read everything you required." (You do not tell what history or poetry you read, of whose quotations you learned, or how much you read in the Bible, so I cannot put you upon our Honor List. If you will inform me upon these points, you may yet be announced. Here is the report of Henry Brune, Citna, Minn., which I submit as an example of the condensed kind, when you don't want to go into particulars, but are in a hurry and have something else to do: "I have kept the 5 Av. S. rules. Total for the quarter: of Macaulay's History of England, 97 pp., Shakespeare's 'As You Like It,' the entire play, quotations, from Shakespeare and Macaulay, Bible, 7 chapters, note book each week.") On the Fourth of July I learned to swim. I can't swim very far at a time, it tires me. But I like to splash around in the water where it isn't over my head. I wish I had been among the first to join the Av. S., but I can't join any sooner than now. Edna Shriver said somebody lived in Roodhouse, and we wondered if that was a town or a house. I knew who Captain Cuttle was as soon as you mentioned him. He was a funny character, and so was Mr. Toots. You seem to like your cat. I have a cat who has never had a name, and now he is old. I will call him Felix after your cat. I will see you at the World's Fair next summer."

Opal Jarvis, Shell City, Mo.: "I have been sitting here, wondering how to address you." (I wish I could have seen you!) "Are you a man or woman, married or single? I do wish you would rid my mind of that doubt." (Did you not see my picture when it was printed in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST about two years ago? What did you think it looked like? I think you do not believe much in signs, or you would have had all your doubt settled by that mustache. And didn't you notice how independent and free, the manner in which I held my head and looked as it I didn't care? Do married men look that way?) "In this week's CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST you speak of having to practice your music. Of course we have our finest musicians men. But your talk was so flowery that if you are a man, you are single." (You seem to think that when a man is married, he has all his flowers of speech plucked.) "But I expect you wonder how old I am. Well, I am not quite past the age when you say, 'Sweet sixteen and never been'—" (Yes! I thought you were along there.) "But I must get down to business, for if your wife sees this—" (She wouldn't care.) "I have started to keep the Av. S. rules twice. Once I kept them 6 weeks, once 4 weeks. This is the third time. I hope I may succeed, but—" (That last word makes your hope an uncertain one.) "There is to be an encampment in Nevada in August, and my time will be taken up in swimming in the lake at the park." (I think swimming is fine, but why let it take up all your time? We are not ducks, nor geese, I hope. If you will keep the Av. S. rules, their good will stay with you. But after your swim is done, you get dry and are just where you started.) "But I know the rules by heart, and I will get papa to get me a diamond so I will not forget them." (Is not your heart as good as a diamond? I am glad for you to begin our rules a third time; this time, make them a success; help us by your presence, and perhaps we can help you; for the best books and the best thoughts will make a different person of any boy or girl who becomes devoted to them. They will make the life shine. I like diamonds. The prettiest and most valuable are those which culture and refinement have set in the heart and mind. When there are diamonds in your soul, it doesn't matter how your hands look, or if you have on gloves.)

Maude Kelley, Saskatoon Sask, Canada: "It has been some time since I wrote to you. It has been quite hot here, but just now in the mornings and evenings you can usually wear a jacket with comfort." (I don't know about that. I'm afraid if I started down town with a jacket on, my acquaintances would make it a little uncomfortable for me.) "Clara R. Pfrimer, I believe I can answer your question about shakes." (Members will bear in mind that this was written before Zella and I explained what shakes are. Of course all know what they are now, but Maude was the first to write to tell about them. It is the strangest thing to me why people made a mystery of shakes, talking about milkshakes and the like!) "I will try anyway. They are a kind of rough shingle, split from straight grained trees. Am I not right, Zella? A little different from milkshakes." (I should think so, indeed!) "You wanted to know how we spent the Fourth of July. We Canadians don't celebrate the Fourth of July but the first, for that is Dominion Day. They did celebrate the Fourth, but I got left at home, so I can't tell you anything about it." (Youngest?) "I will soon have another report to send in. I am starting my 8th week. Well, I must close now and get dinner." (Glad you can do it. I am quite a help about the house myself. When anybody gets my dinner, I can do the rest. I wish you and Opal and Tom had sent your vote on the society colors. At present, old gold and blue are ahead of all others.)

Jas. Alison, Paris, Ky.: "I am a boy of 14. The books I like best are Brother Garrison's 'Alone With God,' and your 'Adnah.' I think 'Red Box Clew' splendid, too. I want somebody to organize a society here against valentines and Fourth of July pistols and fire crackers." (You talk like some old man.) "One of my friends was made an enemy by an old comic valentine, and a cousin lost an eye from a snap-pistol." (I'm afraid you didn't have much fun on the Fourth. Well, I don't like those pistols myself. Nor comic valentines, except when sent to very young children who enjoy them as they were intended to be enjoyed. But the older you grow the less fun you see in things; it seems to leak out of one thing after another, till finally, it looks like nothing will hold it any more. So at last you get to despise even fire-crackers. I wish a society could be started to make old people stop being cross over young people enjoying themselves. There ought to be a book written for them to study. Chapter one would be, How to Grin and Bear It when Young People are making a Noise. Second, How to Remember the Way We Did It Ourselves, when Children Tear Their Clothes and Grow Dirty. Third, How to Understand why Young People Will not Sit Still. Fourth, How to cultivate a Christian Eye for Fire-crackers. Fifth, How to Get Back the Old Passion for Eating Between Meals. I think this would do good, if given to old people by some charitable society. Perhaps I will write the book, myself.

ART AND LIFE

The human ideal is to transform life into something more excellent than itself. We may compare existence to raw material. What it is, matters less than what is made of it, as the value of a work of art lies in the flowering of the workman's skill. We bring into the world with us different gifts: one has received gold, another granite, a third marble, most of us wood or clay. Our task is to fashion these substances. Everyone knows that the most precious material may be spoiled, and that out of the least costly an immortal work may be shaped. Art is the realization of a permanent idea in an ephemeral form. True life is the realization of the higher virtues,—justice, love, truth, liberty, moral power,—in our daily activities.

What We Stand For.

For the Christ of Galilee,
For the truth which makes men free,
For the bond of unity
Which makes God's children one.

For the love which shines in deeds,
For the life which this world needs,
For the church whose triumph speeds
The prayer: "Thy will be done."

For the right against the wrong,
For the weak against the strong,
For the poor who've waited long
For the brighter age to be.

For the faith against tradition,
For the truth 'gainst superstition,
For the hope whose glad fruition
Our waiting eyes shall see.

For the city God is rearing,
For the New Earth now appearing,
For the heaven above us clearing
And the song of victory.

Castile soap is supposed to be made of olive oil, hence its presumed purity. Some Castile soap is made of olive oil and some is not. Some Castile soap is good and some is bad. In purchasing you can not tell which kind you are getting.

In buying Ivory Soap you are always getting a vegetable oil soap of known purity. It is also more attractive in form, lathers more freely and is therefore more convenient to use.

Epigrams by President Roosevelt.

It is almost as irritating to be patronized as to be wronged.

The man who lives simply and justly and honorably, whether rich or poor, is a good citizen.

A man to be a good citizen must first be a good breadwinner, a good husband, a good father.

If a man will submit to be carried, that is sufficient to show that he is not worth carrying.

In the long run, the only kind of help that really avails is the help which teaches a man to help himself.

Hardness of heart is a dreadful quality, but it is doubtful whether, in the long run, it works more damage than softness of head.

The prerequisite to doing good work in the field of philanthropy—in the field of social effort, undertaken with one's fellows for the common good—is that it shall be undertaken in a spirit of broad sanity, no less than of broad and loving charity.

Material prosperity without the moral lift toward righteousness means a diminished capacity for happiness and a debased character.

We live in an era when the best results can only be achieved, if to individual self-help we add the mental self-help which comes by combination.

The man who gives himself up to the service of his appetites, the man who, the more goods he has the more he wants, has surrendered himself to destruction.

Every one of us slips on some occasion, and shame to his fellow who then refuses to stretch out the hand that should always be ready to help the man who stumbles!

The true line of cleavage lies between the good citizen and the bad citizen, and the line of cleavage may and often does, run at right angles to that which divides the rich and the poor.

Current Events

The Colombian Senate by an almost unanimous vote has rejected the Panama Canal treaty. The House has not acted upon it, but it is not believed that the Senate can be brought to reconsider its action. The committee which has charge of the treaty in the Colombian congress favored amendments for increasing the compensation to be paid to Colombia (now fixed at $10,000,000) and retaining a larger share of control over the territory through which the canal is to be built, and until the arrival of the latest news it seemed probable that the treaty would be adopted with these amendments. The province of Panama petitioned for the ratification of the treaty without amendment. But even if the plan of amending the treaty had been adhered to, it would have been necessary to begin anew and take up the other route, for it may be taken for granted that the Senate would not accept such amendments. There is now nothing to do but to turn to the Nicaragua route. It is stated that negotiations with Nicaragua and Costa Rica have been quietly carried on and that treaties opening the way of the Nicaragua route are ready to sign. The President was authorized by the Spooner act to choose whichever route was most practicable, and if the stubborn folly of Colombia forces him to turn to Nicaragua, no new legislation will be necessary except the ratification of the new treaties by the Senate. A patient public is weary of these alternate hopes and delays, and may presently be willing to drop the whole affair in sheer disgust. The obstructive element which wants no isthmian canal is doubtless alive to this possibility and is using it. It will pay those who have convictions on the subject to be patient and keep up the fight.

The Canal Treaty Rejected.

The discovery of some disgraceful irregularities in the conduct of Indian affairs gives promise that the Department of the Interior will soon have on its hands an investigation rivaling that of the post office department. The department has had ground for suspicion for several months, but its attempts to investigate have not been fruitful, nor so far as now appears, very urgent. The Indian Abuses.

Indian Rights Association, a thoroughly responsible organization with headquarters at Philadelphia, has had an investigation made by a special agent, whose report contains specific and detailed charges. The substance of the scandal is that land sharks and trust companies in the Indian Territory are defrauding the ignorant Indians of the lands allotted to them in severalty under the Dawes Commission, and that government officials and even members of the Dawes Commission are profiting by such transactions. It is not charged that there is anything that can be legally defined as bribery or embezzlement or fraud, or that there is ground for criminal action. But there is certainly grave impropriety, to use no harsher term, in an arrangement by which officials, who are paid to protect the rights of the Indians, affiliate themselves with speculators whose plan is to buy the Indians' property for a small fraction of its value and sell it immediately to those who know its worth. In many cases federal officials connected with the Indian service are stockholders and officers in land companies that are doing this sort of business. The favorite scheme seems to be to persuade the Indians to lease their land for five years with a contract for sale at a nominal price at the end of that period. The report criticises some members of the Dawes Commission very sharply. Secretary Hitchcock cannot begin an investigation too promptly.

The battle for arbitration is on in New York. The Building Trades Employers' Association, in a meeting attended by over a thousand members, agreed to stand by their demand for an arbitration agreement. The labor unions in the building trades have rejected arbitration. Some new rival unions have been formed favoring arbitration, and the Employers' Association has agreed to recognize these and to employ only their members. The strike now in progress is embarrassing all building operations.

Another walking delegate is being tried for attempting to extort money from employers under threat of calling a strike. S. J. Parks, of the Structural Iron Workers' Union, is accused of using these tactics with the Hecla Iron Works and also with the Tiffany Art Glass Co. He is said to have demanded from the latter $500 as an "initiation fee," though all the rules of the union were being observed, and to have admitted that the money was for his own pocket.

Firemen on a Lake Michigan steamer struck because they were given boiled instead of mashed potatoes for dinner. As a strike on the Great Lakes is mutiny, the strikers were put in irons and were jailed when the vessel reached port, where they are now awaiting trial under federal laws. The Firemen's Union has called a strike until their imprisoned brethren shall be released.

In Chicago twelve damage suits against unions are pending to determine whether they can be held responsible for damage resulting from boycotts. The Anti-boycott Association is prosecuting. Six non-union girls are suing for damages on the ground that they were "intimidated, libeled, slandered and insulted" by members of a union while going to work.

Joseph Pulitzer has provided an endowment of $2,000,000 for the establishment of a School of Journalism in connection with Columbia University, New York. It is the founder's intention that the scope of the school and its relation to the university shall be similar to those of the other professional schools—law, medicine, etc. As the field is a new one, the wisest counsel will be needed in arranging a course of study. For this purpose there will be an advisory board, the following members of which have already been nominated: Pres. Nicholas Murray Butler, Whitelaw Reid, John Hay, St. Clair McKelway, Andrew D. White, Victor F. Lawson, Charles H. Taylor and Pres. Charles W. Elliott. It is a matter of great significance that a practical publisher and editor like Mr. Pulitzer realizes the need of definite and scholarly training in journalism. No one underestimates the value of the training received in the school of experience, but there are some important things which that school has not time to teach adequately. The decreasing prominence of the editorial page and the increasing influence of the news pages are facts which cannot be overlooked. Bright, irresponsible and untrained boy-reporters write the part of our daily papers which is most read and has most influence. The power of the press for good or ill is too great to justify the public in being content that the wielders of that power should have only the haphazard training of the office and the street. In this age of commercialism there is an immense strain upon journalism to drag it down to the level of a mere business. If Mr. Pulitzer's school can help to keep it in the list of the professions, he will do well. And meanwhile, since we are to have a school to teach the art of making newspapers, would it not be worth while for public schools and colleges to give courses in the equally important and still less understood art of rightly reading newspapers?

In creating a new administrative district in eastern Siberia and Manchuria, and appointing A Shrewd Russian Trick Vice-Admiral Alexieff viceroy of this Amur district, Russia has made a clever move. The government of this vast region, including all of Russia's possessions on and near the Pacific and also, inferentially, the territory which Russia hopes to possess, is put into the hands of a man trained in Russian methods, committed to the Russian ideal and armed with absolute power. He will be on the ground to exercise the czar's power at short range on a moment's notice. The disputed territory of Manchuria, which Russia has sworn to evacuate and determined to control, lies adjacent to the new viceroy's domain. Even if the Russian troops are removed from Manchuria—which is a remote contingency—the viceroy will be at hand to see that the Russian ascendancy does not suffer. The Russian consul at Chicago says frankly that his government is in Manchuria to stay, and he assures us that this is the best thing that could happen for all parties, because Russia will give the open door to the world's commerce. "Manchuria has been forced on us just as the Philippines were forced on the United States," he says. The United States, however, never gave any pledge for the surrender of the Philippines as Russia did for the abandonment of Manchuria. A more accurate parallel would be with the relation of the United States to Cuba. The difference, however, is that the United States agreed to evacuate Cuba and did so, while Russia agreed to evacuate Manchuria and did not.

Macedonia is the scene of a genuine political cyclone such as only the Balkan peninsula can brew. During the past two weeks there have been outbreaks at widely separated points, giving evidence of a carefully and shrewdly planned general movement against the Turkish rule. The palace of the Turkish governor at Krushevo, in western Macedonia, was blown up. Railway bridges were dynamited by the insurgents. Local uprisings of the villagers and peasantry against the Turks at several points in the vilayet of Okhrida assumed serious proportions and led to considerable loss of life. As soon as the Turks could collect their wits the counter-movement began. A wholesale arrest of suspected persons was ordered. Several villages were almost completely destroyed. It is feared that a general massacre may be precipitated at any moment. Turkey is buying large quantities of munitions of war and apparently preparing for a struggle. The murder of the Russian Consul at Monastir by a Turkish constable probably had no direct connection with the Macedonian uprising, further than that it is an outgrowth and an index of the lawless spirit and the panic-breeding atmosphere which now pervade the province. The Sultan sent his oldest son to the Russian embassy to express his regret at the assassination, and offered the widow of the murdered consul an indemnity of $80,000 which she refused, saying she would not live on Turkish charity. Russia is sending a squadron to Turkish waters to emphasize a demand for more substantial atonement for the deed, and especially to require the punishment of all Turks who have participated in the recent outrages against the Christians. The Macedonian rebels have been warned that they need expect no help from Russia, but the visit of the squadron is none the less a great encouragement to them. Bulgaria has addressed to the powers a note, more scathing and less circumlocutory than diplomatic notes usually are, accusing the Sultan of cruelty and misgovernment, and going into particulars to prove it. The Bulgarian government, like the Russian, insists that it is preserving strict neutrality as regards the Macedonian rebels, but as the Macedonians and the Bulgarians are racially one people, the note cannot fail to be in effect an appeal in behalf of the insurgents. The representatives of the European powers to whom the note was presented understood it so and fear that it may involve Bulgaria in serious trouble with Turkey, in which the powers would be compelled to take sides.

The stock market shows but little alacrity in rallying after the recent semi-panic. Mr. Rockefeller says that if the market rises five points it will rise twenty more during the fall, and attributes the recent decline to merely superficial causes. But he does not feel like giving an opinion as to how long it will be until those first five points are recovered. The dullness of the market is fostered by a widespread opinion that the recent decline brought most of the stocks nearer to their true value than they have ever been before. There is still room to squeeze a good deal of water and wind out of some of them before they get down to a valuation justified by their assets and earning capacity. But for all that, the present prosperity of the country is genuine and the speculators of Wall Street cannot plunge it suddenly into panic, though they may whistle up a brief financial hurricane that will prove disastrous to some of themselves.

The Rock Island railroad has gotten control of the Seaboard Air Line, as a result of the recent pressure in the stock market which compelled some of the backers of the latter road to let go. This gives the Rock Island system 2,600 additional miles of track and ample terminals along the Atlantic coast from Norfolk to the Gulf.

The government Bureau of Forestry, replying to a query from the N. Y., N. H. & H. R. R., advises all railroads to secure tracts of land adjacent to their tracks and begin growing chestnut timber for ties. Over ten million ties are used every year by the railroads of this country, and the supply of timber available for this purpose is rapidly decreasing.

Brevities.

Twenty-five prominent participants in the recent riot at Danville, Ill., have been indicted.

The British Parliament adjourned Aug. 14. The most important action of the session was the acceptance of the government's Irish Land Bill.

Sleeping-car porters have organized a union for the abolition of the tipping system. The traveling public will cheerfully co-operate in this movement.

The destruction of $10,000,000 worth of property and the loss of 50 lives were the results of a hurricane which struck Jamaica last week. Port Antonio, an important fruit shipping town with 2,000 inhabitants, was totally destroyed.

A fire in the underground railway at Paris caused the loss of 114 lives. A defective motor set fire to a train and the tunnel became a roaring furnace. The accident emphasizes the necessity of introducing fire-proof cars, especially for underground roads.

The troubles of King Peter, of Serbia, have already begun. His cabinet has resigned in a body because of disagreement with him regarding an appointment. It is said that he is under the thumb of the military set who murdered King Alexander, and he lives in constant fear of sharing the fate of his predecessor.

The trial of the Humberts at Paris is revealing new details of the greatest swindle of the century. The defendants borrowed sums aggregating $10,000,000 on alleged securities which were supposed to be contained in a safe that had been sealed by order of court pending the settlement of a protracted law-suit. In reality the safe was empty.

It is unofficially announced that Secretary Root will retire from the cabinet this fall and return to his lucrative law practice and that Gov. Taft will succeed him as secretary of war. In that event Gen. Luke C. Wright, a Democrat and ex-confederate, will undoubtedly become governor of the Philippines.

The Church and Its Ministry.

Continuing the general topic which we have been considering in a number of articles—that of church organization and work—there are a few things further we desire to say concerning the responsibility of the church for its ministers or public representatives. We have already spoken of the divine side of the call to the ministry, and of the human side in so far as the call of the church is concerned. The question may have arisen in the minds of some readers as to whether it is necessary for a young man desiring to devote himself to the ministry to wait for any church to call him to such work. It may be, and is said, If God impress a young man's mind with the sense of duty to preach the Word, why should he not go at it without consulting flesh and blood? There need not be any consulting with "flesh and blood," but there ought to be some consultation with the Church, which is supposed to be guided by the Word of God and the Holy Spirit, in its operations. We have suffered too much from irresponsible preachers for whom no church is willing to be held responsible. It is no small matter for one to stand forth, in pulpit and on platform, as the public representative of a great cause like that which is committed to the Church. And no man has a right to assume such a responsibility without the consent and approval of those with whom he is to co-operate in the work. No cause that expects to hold the respect and confidence of the public can be careless and indifferent about the kind of men who are to represent it and plead its claims before the people.

The question may be asked as to the extent of co-operation on the part of the churches in setting apart young men to the ministry. This, of course, will depend upon circumstances. If a congregation occupies an isolated position in a field far removed from sister churches, it may act independently in ordaining young men to the ministry; but in localities where there are a number of congregations bound together by their common interests and co-operating in a common work, they might well unite in so important a matter as that of giving sanction and approval to the character and qualifications of one who is to be their public representative. It is easy to carry the principle of congregational independency to an extreme in matters of such general interest. The character and fitness of a man for the ministry of the Word are matters that affect the reputation and welfare not of one church alone, but of all the churches co-operating within any given locality. In such matters the spirit of unity should be emphasized far more than that of independency.

The church has a responsibility lying back of this calling and setting apart of young men to the ministry of the Word, to which we have often ad-verted, but which cannot be too often emphasized. It is that of making provision for the adequate training of young men for the ministry. In no one thing have the churches of this reformation been more derelict in these later years, when their wealth and numbers have enabled them to do larger things, than in the matter of endowing and equipping higher institutions of learning in which our young people, and especially those who contemplate giving themselves to the preaching of the Word, may receive that thorough training which can alone fit them for the high duties of their office. We have suffered much, and are suffering to-day, the consequences of this neglect, and the time has come when our churches should be thoroughly aroused to a sense of their responsibility as respects our Bible colleges and our other institutions of learning. We owe a debt of gratitude for what our colleges have done in the way of recruiting the ranks of our ministry, but they have been handicapped by inadequate endowment and equipment and are now appealing to the churches for financial aid to enable them to do a larger and better work in the future. This call must not go unheeded if we are to hold our rank and enlarge our influence among the religious forces of the age.

There remains the question, after our young men have been trained for the ministry and have been properly called and set apart to their work, as to their proper distribution and utilization. Without any plan of supervision there is bound to be what we find among us to-day—a large number of churches without preachers, and an almost equally large number of preachers without churches. This would be considered a very poor policy in any business enterprise. Why is it not an equally poor policy to adopt in a religious enterprise? Is there no remedy for it? The evil is much greater than any one supposes who has not traveled among the churches or had other means of becoming acquainted with the helpless condition of many of the young flocks without a shepherd's care, and without proper spiritual food and guidance. This evil is only magnified by the fact that there are a number of worthy men capable of ministering to such flocks, but who are without employment, without remuneration and therefore without that joy and inspiration which come from an active, fruitful life. The religious movement that confesses itself unable to provide any remedy for such a condition of affairs, confesses the imperfection of its organization, and its inability, by reason of its genius or traditions, to adapt itself to the conditions and needs of the times. Are we prepared to make such confession?

The first step is to recognize the need, and the next is to recognize the responsibility of the Church, through its leaders and representative men, to provide some method of meeting this need. Hitherto when this subject has been pressed upon the attention of the brethren in convention assembled, there has been a sad failure on the part of many to recognize the magnitude of the evil and our imperative duty to remedy it. A better trained ministry and longer pastorates will do much toward lessening the evil mentioned, but there will always be need for some method by which preacherless churches and churchless preachers may be brought together to their mutual benefit. Why should not a committee of wise, godly men be appointed in each district or county to assist the weak and shepherdless churches by grouping them and aiding them in procuring the right kind of preachers to minister to them and give counsel in all cases required, and assist in putting the churches in order, until such time as they might be able to care for themselves? Or, why not adopt the New Testament plan of having an evangelist, working under a committee or a state board, do the same work? In one way or another this work must be done or we shall continue to suffer great loss, not only in numbers and strength, but in reputation and in influence.

Why Not?

Modern novelists are divided into two schools, known as Idealists and Realists, and they each have their advocates. The latter school says: "Picture life as it really is, no matter how revolting the picture may be. The other believes in drawing pictures of life as it should be, in contrast with what it is. Our judgment is that if literature were confined to either it would be unfortunate. There is need, occasionally, for a life-like portraiture of life in its wretchedness and hideousness, that the people may know the real truth concerning present conditions. There is also need that the creators of our literature should lift up ideals that are in advance of the present toward which we should struggle. There is room in the wide range of literature for both history and prophecy; for fact and fiction; for the real and the ideal.

We have been thinking of an ideal for our own brotherhood that appears to us very winsome and attractive. It is a picture of complete unity—a unity superinduced by love for our common Lord and for one another. The vision rises before us as we write, "a thing of beauty and a joy forever." The apostolic injunction, "Now I beseech you, brethren, through the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you; but that ye be perfected together in the same mind and in the same judgment," has been realized. Not that there is absolute uniformity of opinion on all questions, and uniformity of methods, for we do not believe that the apostle means that, but oneness of heart and oneness of judgment on the great fundamentals of Christian faith and duty, with an intensity of love that fuses all varieties and shades of thought and modes of activity into a wider and more perfect unity. Envy and strife and party spirit have taken their flight, and the fruit of the Spirit abounds. There are human weaknesses and faults, yet, of course,

"But free from envy, scorn and pride,
Our wishes all above,
Each can his brother's failings hide,
And show a brother's love."

How alluring the picture! The strong are bearing the infirmities of the weak, and the weak are trusting without suspicion the guidance of the strong. There is a fellowship of sorrow, as of love and joy. When one member suffers all suffer with him. If one brother falls a hundred willing hands are reached down to help him up. In their wider activities, in missionary, educational and benevolent work, all the churches and all the members of all the churches bear a part and have great joy in this fellowship of Christian service. No one is burdened. No one shirks his part of the work of carrying forward the great interests of the kingdom of God.

The preachers all have a jealous care of each other's reputation and interest. They are continually seeking to help each other in their work, to share their knowledge, their experience, their influence with others less fortunate than themselves. Each rejoices in the success of every other, and sorrows over his brother's misfortune. The religious papers sound the same great notes, though it may be in different ways, making a divine harmony, having for their supreme aim the building up of the church of Christ on earth and the salvation of the world. The editors rejoice in each other's success and have a tender care and solicitude for the reputation of their brethren, and seek, above their own good, the highest welfare of every agency and instrumentality among us that is working for the advancement of the kingdom of God.

The scholars among us are delving after the truth with open minds and hearts, and the great mass of the members believe in their fidelity to the Lord Jesus, and call not in question their loyalty, if now and then they bring forth from the treasure-house of truth some things new as well as old. On the other hand these scholars who are leading our thought into wider ranges of truth, do not despise the rest of us who may not be able at once to see with them, or to accept of their conclusions, but give us credit for loving the truth as well as they, though we seem to them slow in accepting it.

The world would look on in amazement and in profound admiration at a scene like that. Such a body of believers would over-ride all obstacles, go forward with leaps and bounds in numerical strength, in missionary achievement, in educational enterprises, in benevolent activity and in every good word and work. Infidelity would be dumb in its presence. Why should not this ideal become real? Come, thou Holy Spirit, and breathe upon us the spirit of unity, of sympathy, of brotherly love, of larger life and a deeper and wider activity in the kingdom of God!

Enlargement.

The voice of Jehovah came to ancient Israel at one of the crises in their history saying, "Enlarge the place of thy tent, and let them stretch forth the curtains of thy habitation; spare not: lengthen thy cords, and strengthen thy stakes." Israel had to enlarge their view of their mission and get ready for a more aggressive work. They were not to settle down into a state of self-satisfaction, because God had blessed them above all other nations, and leave the world in darkness, but they were to be God's messengers to the whole world.

This word of God we may appropriate as coming to the church to-day. It is the divine program, the standing orders of the great head of the Church. He is ever-more saying to his church, "Enlarge the place of thy tent; spare not: lengthen thy cords and strengthen thy stakes." When the Church loses this spirit of aggressiveness and settles down satisfied with past achievements, it will have forfeited the divine leadership and its glory will have departed. It has been well said that when the church ceases to be evangelistic it ceases to be evangelical, for evangelism is but the divine life within the church seeking to communicate itself to others.

Church Extension, then, is the divine policy, and must continue to be so until the whole earth is filled with the knowledge of the Lord. The church is God's army whose business it is to extend Christ's reign over all the earth. Christ's soldiers constitute both an army of invasion and an army of occupation. The plan is to hold the ground conquered, and to make each new position gained a basis of operations for further conquests. It is just here that the Church Extension Board has proven its great usefulness. When the missionary society sends an evangelist into a new region to preach the gospel and organize a church, the Board of Church Extension follows him with plans and specifications for a new building and with a proffer for necessary help in the way of a loan to assist the young church in the erection of a suitable house of worship. Thus while the evangelists are lengthening the cords of our habitation, the Church Extension Board is strengthening the stakes and rendering permanent the advance that has been made.

No department of our work has demonstrated its economic value and its great usefulness more than the work of Church Extension. We shall, therefore, give special space to this work in next week's number, and we would most earnestly commend the same to the favorable considerations of those churches and brethren that have hitherto stood aloof from it. It deserves the hearty support of every one among us who believes that we have a cause to extend over the world, and that it ought to be made permanent in every community where it is planted. There is little need of lengthening the cords and enlarging the place of our tent, unless we can at the same time strengthen the stakes and hold the ground thus gained. The mission of the Church Extension work among us is to strengthen the stakes by assisting in the erection of suitable buildings wherein may be inculcated, from Lord's day to Lord's day, those principles of Christian living which commend Christianity to the world. The Church Extension wants a million dollars by the time of our centennial in 1909. Let us all see to it that we bear our share in making this achievement possible.

Macatawa Musings.

It is the annual regatta day at Macatawa. The conditions are all favorable—a clear sky with a good breeze from the southwest and only a slightly ruffled lake. As we pen these lines the view from the southwest window of our study over Lake Michigan is one of life and animation. The lake is filled with white sails that loom up against the horizon, presenting a scene not unlike that of a great army encamped in their tents on some green, level plain. It requires something of an expert to judge the progress of these races, for it is not always the vessel that seems to be ahead that is actually in advance. A large number of vessels are competing this year, and the interest excited is no doubt very great among those directly interested, and it furnishes a pleasant scene and a change for the population of the Park. Since the days of steam navigation the matter of speed in sailing vessels does not possess the commercial value that it once did, and yet it holds its place as a sport and pastime, and probably will ever do so. There is something too fascinating about sailing for it ever to be displaced entirely by steam, electricity or other motor power. Tonight will be "Venetian night," and Macatawa Bay will be ablaze with lights and Chinese lanterns, and all the vessels in port will be decorated with flags and lights until the whole bay will present a scene of wonderful beauty as the vessels move about like phantom ships, suggesting a scene from fairyland. From Macatawa on the west to Waukazoo on the east, with Jenison on the south shore and Ottawa Beach on the north, the bay will present a moving panorama of lights as the vessels flit hither and thither, reproducing, in some measure, the appearance of the ancient city of Venice.

But the regatta and Venetian night come only once a year and the daily pastime is that of sailing, yachting and fishing. We have quite a number of enthusiastic anglers here at present, among whom are several names known to our readers. One afternoon, last week, the fish seemed to be biting especially well on the south shore of the lake near the Virginia Park Hotel. While pausing there for a while we noticed, in boats round about us, T. P. Haley, A. B. Jones, the Bacons, the Hallacks, and the Cadys, of Kansas City; the McBees, of Louisville; the Funks, of Bloomington; Purcell, of Chicago, and others, perhaps whose names we do not recall. G. A. Hoffmann, of the CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING COMPANY, spent a couple of days with us at the Park, coming over on Saturday evening and returning Monday evening. Though his visit was brief he had a pretty fair experience of Macatawa life, as he took some of the walks through the woods Sunday morning, was in our Bible class Sunday afternoon, in the preaching service at four, listening to a great sermon by A. B. Jones, of Liberty, Mo., attended the beach meeting at night, and himself made a splendid address, among others, to a large audience sitting on the sand, went fishing Monday, sailing up the bay in our row boat, and riding back in the launch of Col. Hallack, and catching a good string of white bass, and leaving Monday night on a stormy lake. Our preaching force here has been augmented by J. G. Waggoner, financial agent of Eureka College, Eureka, Ill.; M. E. Dutt, minister at Girard, Ill.; Wm. Bellamy, of Vincennes, Ind., and John L. Brandt, of the First Church of St. Louis. The Macatawa Bay Chautauqua, which takes the place of our Macatawa Assembly, is to begin on Friday of next week, the 21st inst., and will run until the 30th. Among the celebrities who are to speak are Sam Jones, Col. Bayne and Z. T. Sweeney.

This is another beautiful day, but of a type entirely different from yesterday. The sky is thickly veiled with clouds, a heavy mist lies over the lake, and a gentle rain, such as delighteth the heart of the farmer when his crops are thirsty, is pattering upon the roof of our study, with a music that lulls to sleep or to quiet meditation. All days have a beauty of their own if we only have eyes to see it. We love a day like this occasionally, not only because it breaks the monotony in the weather, but because of the peculiar charm that belongs to it in itself. The little oil stove in the center of the study keeps up a gentle glow, driving the dampness out and bringing the temperature up to the normal. What better day does one want in which to read a good book or a good religious paper? What a pleasure it is on such a day, when confined within doors, to acquaint one's self, through the religious papers, of all that our workers are doing in various parts of the wide field! At our dinner we had for dessert the charming article by Adelaide Gail Frost in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of last issue, entitled, "In the Hot Season," read aloud by one and enjoyed by all. Such missionaries are a credit to the people sending them, and a blessing to the people to whom they are sent. Besides that delicious bit of literature there were other able contributed articles, with "News From Many Fields," showing how the kingdom of God is faring in various states, territories and foreign lands. How refreshing! And yet there are people, even church members, who seem able to get on without a religious paper.

But speaking of doing without a religious paper, one can get used to almost anything. Some Christians manage to get along without any stated times for prayer and meditation, and with very little praying at all. These are, let us think, unconscious of the joy and benefits of which they are depriving themselves. One can get along without going to church much, or studying his Bible, or refreshing his heart with the good news in our religious journals, but it is a poor, meager, starved sort of life, without the vigor, robustness, beauty and joy which come from an earnest faith, nurtured and sustained by all these gracious influences and helps. Why should one be content to thus impoverish his life, traveling a desert road under a brazen sky to some vague destination, when he may as well enrich and beautify his life by walking with God, with refreshing springs and green oases along the way, an open heaven above him, and a certain and glorious destiny beyond? It is the difference between a life of faith, with its infinite perspective, and a life of bondage to materialism, in which the soul has no outlook except through the five senses which reveal to it only things material. Every one has in him the capacity for this larger and richer life if he will but open his heart to those heavenly influences which enrich, ennoble and beautify the spiritual life. What we could wish for all our readers, far more than for wealth or fame or ease or earthly pleasures, is that they may learn the true secret of living which Jesus taught and illustrated—that of living in the spirit, and walking after the spirit, rather than living in the flesh and minding the things of the flesh. "For to be spiritually minded is life and peace, but to be carnally minded is death." If the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST does not help its readers to live this life of faith, this life of the Spirit, then it is a failure, no matter what else it may accomplish, or how successful it may be from a material point of view.

Notes and Comments.

A preacher and educator whose name would be familiar to the entire brotherhood, were it mentioned, in a personal letter to the editor says: "There is a deep-moving sentiment toward the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST." This is the word that comes to us from thoughtful brethren everywhere, and it greatly encourages us, not simply as respects the paper, but much more as respects the future of our cause. The Lord is trying us, in these days, by many of the new questions with which we are confronted, and may it be that we shall not be found wanting in the eyes of the world or according to the measurement of heaven.

We were glad to receive and publish the tribute to Brother C. P. Williamson, from his friend, A. M. Growden, in last week's CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. Brother Williamson was a lovable character and his sudden departure is a loss to the church universal, and to the cause he loved. His life was not a long one, but it was full of earnest, consecrated service, and he leaves behind him a beautiful memory that will be an inspiration to his family, his friends and his preaching brethren. One by one our workers drop out of the ranks of the church militant, to join the ranks of the church triumphant. Blessed is he who, when his Master calleth, is prepared to render his account.

An aged minister writes: "How many I have seen go through with the process of confessing Christ, and being baptized, without the least manifest change in their spirit and life. To embrace Christ as a living personality, to believe into him so as to make his life mine, is a very different thing." This is just the difference between a formal and vital conversion. There have always been, and always will be, under any and every form of administering the gospel, those who render a mere formal obedience without that renovation of heart and life which it is the intention of the gospel to accomplish. Preachers cannot be too careful in guarding their hearers, and especially their converts, against this mistake. It is "with the heart that man believeth unto righteousness," and then it is possible "with the mouth" to make "confession unto salvation." The faith that counts is the faith which sees spiritual realities as realities and produces a corresponding life.

A Package of Letters By William Dunn Ryan

A REVIEW OF SOME LETTERS WRITTEN BY ALEXANDER CAMPBELL AND MEMBERS OF HIS FAMILY TO ELDER TIMOTHY BREWSTER, OF ELLESBURGH, N. Y., BETWEEN 1825 AND 1833.*

Read the published works of Alexander Campbell and you will know Campbell the scholar, the logician, the defender of the faith. Read his private letters to his friends and you will know Campbell the man. Personality finds expression, as in no other way, in one's communication with one's friends. In this package of letters, yellow with age and dimmed by time, Alexander Campbell lives and speaks.

His abounding joy in service, as well as the greatness of his faith, shine forth in this:

"I can only say that the hope of immortality is worth all the troubles and sorrows of the longer lives in the antediluvian age; and, sustained by this blessed hope, I can endure all the mortification from persecution, and all the pains and sorrows from the loss of friends and relatives, and all the hardships of the most laborious life devoted to the Savior of the lost." (Letter written at Bethany, Va., Feb. 6, 1828.)

A new year's letter, written Jan. 1, 1829, seems the product of a heart overflowing with joy. The reason for this peculiar gladness soon appears: "My two daughters, Maria Louisa and Lavinia," says the writer, "were immersed into the faith a few days ago and added to the church. These are matters of great joy to me, and I know will be pleasing to you. Lavinia is eleven years and Maria thirteen."

Mr. Campbell was a model letter writer. His letters of personal friendship were not theological dissertations. Neither were they so extreme in the personal and colloquial element as to be devoid of opinions on questions of first importance. Sometimes, apparently in answer to questions of his correspondent, he devoted much space to the exposition of Bible themes. A letter written from Wellsburgh, Va., Feb. 11, 1825, is chiefly devoted to the exegesis of Matt. 19:29. After giving a literal translation of the passage, Mr. Campbell proceeds: "The Savior just meant what the above words explicitly declare. He makes, on this occasion, two promises: one to those called apostles, who had accompanied him always, and one for all others, who, as his disciples, should forsake any present fleshly privilege or enjoyment for his sake.

... Indeed this promise (judging from the tribes of Israel) is peculiar to the apostles, and the time when it should be accomplished and the event that must necessarily precede it, are both distinctly declared. ... Did the limits of one sheet permit, an induction of particulars could be presented to show that in the sense of the Lord's discourse to Nicodemus and Matt. 19:29, not one of the twelve were born again or regenerated until Pentecost. Many will be troubled at this declaration, yet it is as capable of proof as that the Holy Spirit was not given till Christ was glorified, i. e., given in a certain sense." In this connection a distinction is made between the requirements for seeing and entering in to the kingdom of God. "The Lord told Nicodemus that unless a man was born from above or a second time, he could not see the reign of God, and to enter into the kingdom he must be born of water and spirit; to enter in required more than to see or understand."

In a letter written Nov. 13, 1828, Mr. Campbell states, in no uncertain way, his views of free-masonry: "I have been astonished at some Christians," he writes, "who appear to wear the badge and to esteem the company of brother Masons as an honor and a benefit. I am constitutionally, morally, politically and religiously opposed to free-masonry in all its forms, roots, leaves, branches and fruits, yet I have never wished to see it made a term of communion, because of the weak brother. ... But perhaps I have gone too far in my remarks already, especially as I know not whether my Brother Brewster has kept his garments always so clean as never to wear an apron. If you have not, I rejoice to know that our King will not let you think the less of me for my frankness.

... I have not yet said anything about it (free-masonry) in my essays, but I am not sure that I will not one day open a few broadsides upon the old fort."

There are many allusions and references that are of historic interest. A letter written Oct. 10, 1827, has this significant postscript: "I have got a post office here now, and am postmaster. I have changed the name of my residence from Buffalo to Bethany, Brook county, Va. A. C."

Mr. Campbell's brief political career is referred to by his wife, Mrs. Salina H. Campbell, in a letter dated Feb. 15, 1830: "The fear you appear to have entertained, as expressed in your last letter, lest Mr. C's. political engagements should prove injurious to him, was not at all to be wondered at, because we have had many examples of the bad effects of professors of religion intermeddling in state affairs, and exposing themselves to the company they have to under the present order of things. However, if the testimony of a wife will be taken in the case, and if my mind is sufficiently free from being prejudiced too much in favor (and I hope it is), I think I can safely say that Mr. Alexander Campbell, of Bethany, Brook county, member of the late Virginia convention held in the city of Richmond, has passed the fiery trial of sitting in the midst of that august and worldly assembly, taking an active part as a member thereof for the space of one hundred and three days, without sustaining any injury, either mental or corporeal. ... I am happy to inform you that Mr. C's. labors were very great during his stay in Richmond, both in the city and in its vicinity. He labored incessantly, night and day, both in private and public. I trust it will redound to the glory of God and the good of many."

July 26, 1832, Mr. Campbell's daughter, Eliza Ann, addresses a letter to Elder Brewster in which she refers to the untiring industry of Thomas Campbell in his declining years: "Grandfather Campbell is now, and has been for the last ten months, in the lower part of this state. He is now upwards of sixty-four and enjoys most excellent health. The last account that we had a few days since, says that he has spoken two hours every day for more than a month. His hair is very white and covers a brain that has for more than forty years been strictly devoted to his Creator."

This correspondence was carried on during the stormy period in Mr. Campbell's life. But in all these letters there cannot be found one word of despair. He describes the entrance of sorrow and death into his own family, he speaks of persecution and cruel criticism inflicted by those who do not understand him, but the dominant note is one of joy and thanks.

A thought expressed in a letter of Aug. 3, 1830, is in one form or another constantly recurring. It is this: "The ancient gospel is mighty through God. It works as in days of yore. ... The time has come when human traditions must give place to the apostles' doctrines, and when the sects and their leaders must go to the wall. The time is short; the great earthquake is at hand. The dreadful day of the Lord, the brightness of his coming is soon to destroy the man of sin."

No discouragement was great enough to cause him for one instant to doubt the ultimate success of the movement he inaugurated. No mere extracts or review can portray the lofty loyalty of friendship that finds expression in these yellowed pages.

Taste and affection are alike in evidence in the subscriptions. A typical one is this: "Wishing you all the beatitudes of the Sermon on the Mount, I remain, your fellow-servant of the great King;" or, "I remain, as I hope I shall be to eternity, your affectionate brother in the indissoluble chains of redeeming love."

Reform Forces in Church Work

By Frank Moss

Formerly President of New York Police Board

The need of reform in the local governments of our country is felt by all good and patriotic people. Few of our largest cities have escaped public exposure of official corruption; and so general is the disease that we discover its symptoms in the smaller communities also. Even the national government is not free from scandal.

At the present time while congratulating New York on her recent deliverance from a despotism of crime and venality, we are mourning over the exhibition of civic decadence in the ring-ridden city of Philadelphia, and wondering at the failure of the great state of Pennsylvania to make effective protest at the shameful invasion of local rights by tyrannical central authority.

We read the thrilling stories of "Tweed Days in St. Louis," "The Shame of Minneapolis," "Pittsburg a City Ashamed," "Philadelphia Corrupt and Contented," which are going through the magazines in serial form, and we add for ourselves titles of other suffering cities in nearly all parts of the land. Thinking men are looking for the cause of this epidemic, and are searching anxiously for a cure.

The disease had its season of greatest growth in a long period of indifference and carelessness, wherein nobody gave heed to the growth of dishonesty, and the alliance of crime and officialism. This period we trust is coming to an end, for in every city and community may be found a slowly forming civic pride, and a more or less numerous body of reformers.

There has not been a more critical period in our national history, nor a period wherein was more greatly needed the highest type or moral devotion and love of country, for in this time of prosperity when we are not endangered by blows from without, the very richness of our growth is developing internal rottenness. If we look fairly and speak truly, we are bound to admit that the conceded corruption is not a mere growth of politics, but is rather an extension into politics of methods that are common in business life. Gross evils are tolerated by business men in their city governments, because they are familiar with similar evils in business.

Government makes compacts with thieves and gamblers and harlots, and opens doors to hell on the public streets so that children and youth may stray therein and be lost. When we realize that governmental corruption has its necessary root in business immorality and individual laxity, we feel that a live Church must know the facts and must put forth a worthy effort to correct the wrong.

But truth compels the reluctant statement that of all sleepy bodies the one which shows the slowest disposition to rise to the obvious opportunity and duty is the Church—the very body which by its foundation, its purpose, its size, its organization and its general diffusion over the land is best fitted for the task.

Let us see what the Church in the United States consists of: It contains twenty-eight million communicants. It has 374 out of 567 colleges and seminaries. Its young people's associations are large and enthusiastic. The Christian Endeavor Society (inter-denominational) has nearly four million members distributed among over sixty thousand societies. The Epworth League (Methodist) has nearly a million members. The Young Men's Christian Association has over three hundred thousand members. The Sunday-schools, the Young Men's Hebrew Association, the Young Women's Christian Association, the Women's Christian Temperance Union, the Societies of the Catholic Church, the societies of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and many other smaller organizations are numerous and busy.

Various denominations maintain publishing houses doing immense volumes of business, and they circulate many newspapers and magazines. The great churches are splendidly organized, maintain armies of preachers, teachers and workers and meet annually in conferences and conventions. The Young People's Societies have great national gatherings with thousands of delegates. They make heroic exertions to evangelize the heathen.

The weakness of this grand array is in these two facts: (1) It is divided into sects which do not work in harmony, and (2) too many of the local churches are mere religious clubs, affording delightful associations and rich privileges for their members, but not touching the life of the community.

This condition is not within the spirit and purpose of the founder of the Church, which is in danger of losing its prestige and rightful privileges, by the neglect of its duty. Every church society should know thoroughly the locality in which it is placed and should assume a responsibility for its moral condition, especially as affecting the young, and for the conditions of life affecting the homes. Every church should go back to an earnest propaganda, and an individual teaching of the principles of the Ten Commandments. Every denomination should support its individual churches in these matters. Every church should preach business honesty and fair play, should insist on honest and faithful public service, and should put these matters as religious essentials. There should be constant, persistent and earnest prayer for city, community and nation, the enthusiasm of the church running into patriotism as well as religion—(patriotic prayer-meetings and revivals if you like).

There should be national conferences of all religious bodies for deliberation and prayer on subjects of national honor and uprightness, regardless entirely of political policies or preferences. This would bring life to the Church, and would help to bring purity to the nation. Until the religious forces of the country find the way to fraternize and to attack these moral problems, appropriately and effectively, the fights against corruption will be local and spasmodic.

It is not meant that the Church should seek to dictate methods or candidates or in any way control public policies, but simply like other organizations of citizens interested in good government it should be heard and felt for the right. Its deadness in almost every struggle for decency is incomprehensible, and its coming into the struggle appropriately and with its splendid forces and resources would presage victory.

The church is a moral organization, each of its leading denominations covering the land, and having the means of combining thought and effort, and all professing principles which should permit a general fraternization. It exists for spiritual and moral purposes and therefore its intelligence and its conscience should be specially acute to general immoralities tending to vitiate the standards of living. There is no body or set of sympathetic bodies which should be so sensitive, and none which has such powers of opposition to general evil.

Its indifference to the prevalence of shocking criminality in government is a plain indication that the conscience of the communities and of the nation is asleep, and full deliverance, founded as it must be upon aroused and virile public conscience, need not be expected in advance of the awakening of the church. When its millions sing and pray, "God Bless Our Native Land"—with adequate fervor of spirit and consistency of life—a new era of good government and of civic advance will come to the nation.

Realizing the gravity and the extent of the evil, we look about for some extensive organized force through which we may deal with it radically, and instinctively we turn to the Church. We have a right to turn to the Church as a conservator of morals and a fountain of patriotism. We feel that it must be concerned with the conditions in which the people live, in which characters are formed, in which the determining environments of life are established.

It must be concerned with the government of a city, when that govern-

A New Plan of Church Work

(A Paper Recently Read Before Christian Church, Peoria, Ill.)

By Ashley J. Elliott

About fifteen years ago I became firmly imbued with the idea that our city churches were sapping the vitality of their members through the medium of a multiplicity of so-called "services." I had worked hard for a number of weeks to arouse interest in, and secure speakers for, what seemed an attractive program for a Christian Endeavor meeting on a Friday night, and was greatly disappointed and chagrined when the night came, at the small attendance of church members.

The pastor said to me afterwards, that in this strenuous, driving, physically exhausting age, we, in our church meetings, would have to make the most of Sunday. And, since coming here, twelve years ago, I have felt that we do not make the most of Sunday, except to split it up into small particles and with it our possible congregation, in such a way that one part rarely sees the other part. This applies, with equal force, to our neighboring churches, who resort to various schemes to secure the attendance of their members, many of which could rightly be termed "clap-trap," or as the outside world is prone to call them, "holy shows."

A church that has no higher ambition than to simply keep its members together, and get them out to an occasional meeting will, sooner or later, and perhaps justly, die. It is statistically reported that in one of the densely populated wards of New York city, during a given period, 22,000 people moved into the ward, and twenty-two churches moved out. If our city churches have no greater warrant to live than the eking out of a precarious existence for the benefit of a faithful few, it is questionable whether those few had better not disband and go where their labor will amount to something.

In 1894 this splendid edifice was erected. We are a down-town church, and our members are scattered throughout the city. The question, therefore, is how may we best serve a good purpose and accomplish the most with our present equipment? My answer would be, first, by limiting the meetings in this building on Sunday to one. And for such a change we are not without precedent. I want to mention a few religious bodies, some of which we are not in the habit of saying good things about, and to suggest that we pattern after one of their customs. The Roman Catholic Church long ago found it wise to call its members together but once on Sunday. The great Mormon Tabernacle in Salt Lake City, with a seating capacity of 10,000 people, is thronged, I am told, every Sunday afternoon at 4 o'clock, with a gathering taxing its capacity. They have religious services to perform at other times and places, in their various wards, but the one gathering to which they all look forward with happy anticipations is the 4 o'clock Tabernacle meeting Sunday afternoon. Were we to pattern after their example, in this regard, and perform our Christian service at other times and places, where service is needed and workers are few, and then come here Sunday afternoons as a happy, united family, to reflect upon our experiences and rejoice together over our accomplishments or undertakings, then my vision of the possibilities involved in this proposed new order of things would be realized.

At Prof. Swing's church in Central Music hall, Chicago, where Dr. Hillis afterwards preached, the meetings are limited to one on Sunday, and that at 4 P. M. I am told that perfect throngs of people congregate in Zion Church, Chicago, every Sunday afternoon at 4 o'clock. And to these instances might be added others—such as the German Lutherans in the old country, and the Jews, led by Rabbi Hirsch; but these will suffice.

Now, what are some of the reasons why the Christian church of Peoria should adopt this plan?

First—It would mean a spiritual uplift to our members, if they could be induced to do religious work elsewhere, and rejoice together here.

Second—It would go far to solve the problem of our city missions, releasing our workers from the necessity of attending numerous meetings at the Central Church, leaving them free to go and work wherever missions were being planted.

Third—It would grant to those whose physical nature demands it, an opportunity to thoroughly relax and stay relaxed one morning out of seven. Those who are blest with comfortable situations cannot, even in imagination, sympathize with men and women who are burdened beyond their strength, and who are anxious to surround the Lord's table Sunday mornings, but are prevented from so doing by sheer lack of strength.

Fourth—It would solve many of our financial troubles. Sunday is naturally our pastor's busy day. He could just as easily serve one or two missions, together with preaching to us once on Sunday, and thus save the expense of other preachers for such missions. Were we enabled to take the money we now spend on our one mission, and with it employ an assistant pastor who could devote all of his time to pastoral work, our mission would be better served.

The objections to our present procedure are fourfold—physical, mental, financial and religious. Physical, in that our energies are exhausted through needless repetition of journeyings hither; mental, in that the more one says to you the less you think of it, and one good sermon a day is about all an ordinary individual can digest; financial, in that our members almost all live too far away to walk, and are too poor to ride several trips a day—the extra street car dimes required for second trips to and fro would employ a third preacher; and religious, in that our members would be furnished the opportunity of doing something for others, in needier places, instead of being preached at themselves, or feeling guilty if they escaped one sermon. The maid would not need to be kept from church to get Sunday dinner, for she could go to her own church Sunday morning, or come with you to yours in the afternoon.

Were I to outline a detailed program it would be something like this:

Sunday-school at 2:30 P. M., followed by preaching at 4, and young people's meeting thereafter. This would accommodate both the aged and the young; would enhance the value of our meetings 100 per cent., in that those who now come in the morning would meet those who now come at night. There would be the inspiration of numbers. Our music would swell, and our contributions also; whole families would be together, and general rejoicing would be manifest in every pew.

The condition of commercial affairs is not to be compared to 100 or even 50 years ago. In the Cotters' Saturday Night they met around the family board and read the Scriptures and prayed. The shoes were blackened and linen laid out, and Sunday dinner prepared. This in many homes is made practically impossible to-day by the requirements of business and the manifold demands of schools and customs. Sunday morning is the time when nearly all preparation for the day must be made.

Were we to look in upon some of our faithful families Sunday mornings, we would find them all in a flutter, the little ones to be dressed for Sunday-school, the breakfast to be prepared, and the dishes cleared away. The loving mother fairly runs as she works, while the father frets and stewes for fear they will all be late to Sunday-school or church. The mother is the last to get away, and enters church somewhat late, not knowing whether her usual home duties were all fulfilled that morning or not. In this frame of mind she settles down to enjoy a sermon. Perhaps she gets settled by the final "Amen;" perhaps not. She goes home to a disheveled house, and the second rush commences, in the preparation of Sunday dinner. Piety under such adverse circum-

Bethany Beside the Sea

By F. D. Power

From the summit of Pike's Peak down to the shores of the Atlantic is a long step. The journey is full of interest, and the contrast between the majestic mountains and the vast waters is a striking one. Both possess elements of sublimity that appeal to all that is best in the soul. The mountains for some reason suggest the law, the sea, the Gospel.

The greatest of earthly blessings are the blessings of the great deep. The mightiest voice is that which stilleth the tumult of the waters. The greatest deliverance is that when Jehovah rides upon the horses and chariots of salvation through the sea. The greatest dominion is that which extends from sea to sea. The greatest triumph of the latter day will be when the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea. The crowning ascription of praise to God will be like the commingled sound of the countless swellings of the waves of many waters. How much men owe to the ocean! We are supported by the abundance of the sea. We speak of it as a "waste of waters." Yet the great deep saves the earth from becoming a desert. Forests on the mountains, grass upon the plains, cattle upon a thousand hills all derive their subsistence from the sea. The three-fourths of the globe covered by water are an exhaustless treasury of life and health and riches to everything that lives and grows. The ocean feeds the stream, fills the lake, bubbles in the spring, foams in the cataract, rushes along in the mountain torrent, shows itself in the magnificence of forests, the verdure of fields, the luscious fruits of our orchards. The sun lifts the waters of the sea into the air, the winds waft their burden over the land, clouds form and rains fall, and so vegetation is kept alive and food is supplied to every living thing. Three thousand years ago the writers of the Old Testament understood the circulation of the atmosphere: "All the rivers run into the sea, yet the sea is not full; unto the place from whence the rivers came thither they return again." The blessings of the deep are around us and above us every moment. Without the sea our planet would be as the moon—a wilderness of death. Then like little Paul Dombey, in wandering by the seashore and listening to the eternal toil of the ocean and asking the question: "What are the wild waves saying?" Answer will come with its ceaseless ebb and flow: "Thy way is in the sea and thy path in the great waters!"

We see here the riches of God and the power of God. Many a time I have watched the movements of a tide mill on the Chesapeake Bay. It is probably the only one to be found along the coast. An old Disciple invented it, built it and operated it. Erected at the mouth of a little bay, the tides would flow in and turn its wheel one way and then they would ebb and turn it the other way, and day and night its great stones were busy. Think what vast stores of power, all the way from Maine to Florida, are laid up in these restless, ceaseless tides! We have harnessed Niagara, yet its concentrated volume would be but the touch of an infant compared with the might of the great tides of the Atlantic. We think nothing is weaker than water, yet among all material elements nothing is so mighty. It has written its story upon every mountain and every pebble. It swings all hammers, turns all wheels, tunnels the mountain ranges, drives the ocean steamships. All the industries of earth would be paralyzed without the aid of this wild giant that God has tamed and harnessed and commanded to come up to our help out of the sea.

Another lesson from the sea is the eternity of God. The awful hymn of praise lifted up, by the mysterious main whose goings forth are unto the ends of the earth, and whose secret chambers no eye hath seen, and whose billows appear to roll on forever, speaks to us of eternity. You stand on the deck of an ocean steamer and gaze out upon the great waters and they seem limitless upon every side. Old ocean talks with you in manifold voices and presents an infinite variety of scenery. As you look over the heaving bosom of the Atlantic or watch the foam-like, creamy folds of lace tossed from the good ship's sides and stand at the stern where the great screws make the deep to boil like a pot, or study at night the luminous billows in rolling masses of white light, from which flash lambent flames like auroral streamers, you think what history has gathered about the sea since God in the beginning divided the waters from the waters; what romance has been associated with it from the earliest ages; what poetry has glorified it from David and Homer to Tennyson; what mysteries belong to its depths—Andes and Himalayas, corals, sponges and mollusks, depths six times greater than the elevation of Pike's Peak above the level of the sea, curious forms of geologic ages, living monsters in crumbling tombs of the dead, great, unexplored regions for science through ages to come. What ages upon ages these vast waters have tossed and moaned and hurled themselves against the shores of every land, and what ages of toil are yet before them! And as we watch them, we think of that greater mystery—eternity—that stretches away and away and away and never ends. And as we see the little birds that play over the water, hundreds of miles from shore, soft gulls and stormy petrels and Mother Carey's chickens that sleep upon the water, or think of ourselves, frail and helpless creatures with but a board between us and the unfathomable depths, we are filled with wonder and adoration for the majesty and greatness and eternity of a God who can alike hold the ocean in the hollow of his hand and care for the tiny bird that flits over its billows. And as little children stand on the seashore and look off and wonder at the greatness of the great sea, and think what islands may rest somewhere upon its bosom, what ships may be careering over its waters, what strange lands and peoples are way over on the other side, and long, it may be, to sail away across the eternal blue, and explore the mysterious regions that lay beyond, and dwell there in the bright palaces and among the strange peoples of those distant spheres, so we stand upon the shores of this life and look away, and are filled with visions of the eternal world, the Father's house, the city that hath foundations, the new heavens and the new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness, the glorious land where there shall be no more sea.

What lessons, what visions come to us here beside the Atlantic! What rest, and wholesome recreation, and religious and educational uplift, and excellent fellowship we are having during these August days! Washington and Baltimore, Philadelphia and Pittsburg, Scranton and Johnstown, Richmond and Detroit, cities as far west as Lincoln, Neb., have sent their representatives and such teachers and helpers as T. E. Cramblett and Mrs. A. R. Bourne, G. P. Rutledge and H. C. Kendrick, W. J. Wright and J. A. Hopkins, Herbert Yenell and B. A. Abbott, E. B. Bagby and W. S. Hoyer, Dr. Allan Walker and W. L. Harris, Mrs. W. E. Thurston and John A. Jayne have enriched our program. Bethany Beach has grown in every respect. The company is made up of some of the best men in the brotherhood, and they are pushing the enterprise with commendable zeal. W. A. Dinker, of Pittsburg, is the president, and such men as Latimer, Errett, Addey and Cramblett associated with him, give every assurance of success. A number of cottages have gone up, and others are being projected rapidly. It is expected to enlarge soon the Board of Control, so as to take in the whole brotherhood. The Vermont Avenue pastor will put up a cottage this year which will be known as the Weneeda Rest. There is every promise of large and useful things for our seaside resort.

Primitive Churches.

By W. W. Sniff.

One of the elements of the plea we have made for the restoration of the primitive church has been our insistence upon the New Testament plan for the organization, government and care of our congregations. When Paul and the other early preachers went out and established churches by preaching the gospel and forming the believers into congregations, they appointed elders in every place who should have oversight of the brethren. That must have been the best way, else they would not have done so. There are indications that several men in each congregation were appointed to the work of the eldership. They were pastors or bishops. In the course of time fewer men were appointed to this office and work, until one man was in many churches alone in that important position.

The dangers attending the departure from the primitive arrangement were, and are, two: first, that with one actual and active elder or pastor, there would be others in the congregation holding the office and doing none of the work; and second, that the position and work of "the pastor" should be undervalued if not dispensed with. From one or the other of these errors many churches are suffering. No doubt in the early days of our movement one element of strength and success was the evangelistic work of the mighty men who went about from place to place planting churches and placing an eldership in charge. In time, however, it seemed to become a necessity for each congregation to employ one man who should devote his entire time to the work which belongs to the New Testament eldership. The office of "pastor" has been in some cases abused, and the scriptural eldership lost. But the correction of this wrong does not lie in dispensing with the "pastor," nor in having a man come from a distance one or two Lord's days in the month, simply to preach, oftentimes coming late Saturday evening and leaving early Monday morning. This is what many of our churches are doing, to the great detriment of our cause.

In Rush county (Ind.), for example, where we have twice as many members as any other religious people, we have about 20 congregations. There are five resident preachers in the county. Thirteen of these congregations have preaching by men who do not live with them, some of whom come a considerable distance. In most instances there is no one whose heart is burdened as Paul's was with the care of "the church."

This cannot but hinder our work, or do an actual injury to our cause. The men who do the kind of work referred to are good men, and one secret of the churches' desire to have them is that their preaching is many times of a high order. But all who love the cause we represent should co-operate to bring our churches to a condition in which they will have the personal oversight of a resident pastor or elder. Such a condition would build up stronger churches, put more money into all our benevolences and lend power to the great plea.

Bible Teachers.

By D. T. Stephenson.

One of the most crying needs of the present, in the congregations of the Lord, is an educated ministry that will depend upon the scriptures as the great source, in the hand of God, for bringing man to a realization of his mode of life and conduct to merit salvation depending upon the stand he may take and pursue.

The apostles taught nothing greater than these same scriptures teach. Nay the Master himself taught no other plan than what they contain, "that we may be saved."

Rightly employed we will find that of all commentaries the scriptures are the best commentary of themselves ever found. And why not, since they are the production of the most perfect wisdom, with an interest surpassing the human power and lasting in character through all time!

While to get learning from other sources to broaden our comprehension and power of elucidation is in every way commendable, yet such learning must only be an auxiliary to the Bible teaching to be beneficial to the teacher who would faithfully fill the mission of "dividing the word to saint and sinners aright." Resting assured that the inspiration of the Bible teaching is that we can depend upon, and none from other sources independent thereof, let us rally to the help of God's cause in Christ.

Christian Industry.

By Milo Atkinson.

The spirit of American activity in every department of life condemns the drone and exalts the principle of industry. This is well. But in our intensely commercial age may we not sometimes fail to distinguish between industry in its broadest sense, and Christian industry as set forth in the teaching of Christ and his apostles? "Let him that stole steal no more: but rather let him labor, working with his hands the thing that is good, that he may have whereof to give to him that hath need." Eph. 4:28.

Few sentences of inspired writing contain more comprehensive thought in so small compass. "Let him that stole steal no more"—honesty, that fundamental principle of character. "But rather let him labor, etc."—industry, that cardinal element of true manhood. "That he may have whereof to give to him that hath need"—charity, that crowning virtue of the Christian life.

But to the special thought of this article, "Let him labor." That shuts out all drones. The large per cent of the American people are ready to accept that principle, but the apostle didn't stop there. "Working with his hands the thing that is good." This not only excludes the idler, but specifies the kind of industry—"the thing that is good." How much of American activity to-day, passing under the name of industry, really comes under the condemnation of this language? Among the millions of men who arise early and join each day in the mad rush of so-called industrial pursuit, how many can lie down to rest at night asking the blessing of God upon the labors of the day?

Then most beautiful of all is the motive prompting this Christian industry. "That he may have whereof to give to him that hath need." When a man labors to provide food and shelter for himself—this is needful; when he labors to supply the wants of his family—this is laudable; when he labors to give them not only the necessities of life, but education, culture, refinement and position in the world—this is noble. But when his motive in his activity reaches that height where he labors "that he may have whereof to give to him that hath need"—this is sublime, the very essence of Christian industry.

WONT MIX

Bad Food and Good Health Wont Mix.

The human stomach stands much abuse, but it wont return good health if you give it bad food.

If you feed right you will feel right, for proper food and a good mind is the sure road to health. "A year ago I became much alarmed about my health, for I began to suffer after each meal, no matter how little I ate," says a Denver woman; "I lost my appetite, and the very thought of food grew distasteful, with the result that I was not nourished and got weak and thin. My home cares were very heavy, for beside a large family of my own I have also to look out for an aged mother. There was no one to shoulder my household burdens, and come what might I must bear them, and this thought nearly drove me frantic when I realized that my health was breaking down.

"I read an article in the paper about some one with trouble just like mine being cured on the food Grape-Nuts, and acting on this suggestion I gave Grape-Nuts a trial. The first dish of this delicious food told me I had struck the right thing. My uncomfortable feelings in stomach and brain disappeared as if by magic, and in an incredibly short space of time I was again myself. Since then I have gained 12 pounds in weight through a summer of hard work and realize I am a very different woman, all due to the splendid food Grape-Nuts." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Trial will prove.

No More Loans Will be Granted.

Just at the eve of the approaching September offering for Church Extension, and at the time when churches are making up their minds as to whether they will take the offering, the Board of Church Extension deems it proper to make a statement of its operations for the first ten months of the current missionary year and the condition of its treasury.

Eighty loans have been granted since the first of last October that have not yet been paid, aggregating $102,250. Most of this has been granted recently. Loans that had been granted previous to last October and not yet paid, aggregate $22,250. Counting annuity money and all, the Board had $28,000 in its treasury on the first day of August, 1903. It will be noticed that the Board is obligated to pay $124,500 just as fast as the buildings are completed where these loans have been granted. With $28,000 in our treasury the first of August, and obligations amounting to $124,500, it will be seen that the Board has granted $96,500 more than is in its treasury, believing that the annual offering will be so liberally and generously observed this year that the Board will be able to meet its obligations.

We believe that this information given to the brotherhood will bring the largest offering in the history of this work. There should be $2,000 churches sending contributions this year and the amount should be not a dollar less than $50,000. Last year 1,107 churches sent $17,635. Thus far this year $7,874 have been sent by 674 churches. Up to the first of August, over 800 churches had ordered supplies, agreeing to take the collection.

If the older and stronger churches would do as well in proportion in sending annual offerings as the mission churches do in paying their interest and paying off their loans, this deficit of $96,500 would be taken care of during the next six months. Let us here make a comparative statement for the first ten months of this missionary year between the mission churches that have paid off loans and interest and the older churches that have sent offerings:

Since last October 400 mission churches paid on loans and interest over $54,000.

Since last October 674 missionary churches sent $7,874.

The comparison is certainly not favorable to the churches that claim to be missionary. It will be asserted that these 400 mission churches were paying off their debts to the Board of Church Extension. But let us stop to think conscientiously whether the older and stronger churches owe any indebtedness to the Church Extension Society which they brought into existence through our national missionary convention. The Board, of course, can grant no more loans for several months unless the annual offering is sufficiently large to justify the Board in increasing its obligations.

In granting nearly $100,000 more than our Board has money in sight, the Board has faith that the churches will put their part of this obligation into the treasury, so that with returns on loans from our mission churches we shall be able to pay these obligations as they become due.

Shall our faith be in vain?

G. W. MUCKLEY, Cor. Sec., in behalf of the Board.

The Answer of a Good Conscience.

There is one word in 1 Pet. 3:21, that I have sought carefully to understand. That word is variously translated answer, interrogation, a requesting, the seeking, the requirement, the inquiry, appeal, pledge, covenant, decision. The authorities for these translations are before me. Are there other renderings for the word? What is the word thus rendered, and in what other passages may it be found?

Applying the principle of hermeneutics, it seems to me the passage becomes most luminous when "a fixed or formal decision," "a solemn pledge" or "a covenant pledge" is taken as the exact synonym of "eperotema." If John's baptism was a pledge, "a moral obligation" to a better life, how much the more this baptism, "the requirement of a good conscience toward God!"—(Bible Union.) The verse affirms that baptism doth also now save us; not the putting away the filth of the flesh, but the "eperotema" of a good conscience toward God (or before God), through the resurrection of Jesus Christ.

In studying the passage, I have found the blessed sunshine to come in as I looked into the "conscience" of the matter—a "good conscience toward God." Conscience is the infallible faculty within its sphere; the soul's sense of right or wrong in its moral motives, intentions, choices, decisions. Baptism is as spiritual as the faith that inspires it.—(Prof. I. B. Grubbs.) Hence it has to do with a good conscience. "The analysis of conscience in full activity," by Joseph Cook, is the best help I have ever found in the solution of this point in the passage. It is this:

1. A direct perception of right and wrong in its moral motives.
2. A feeling that the right ought, and the wrong ought not, to be done.
3. Complacency in the right, and displacency in the wrong choice made.
4. A sense of personal merit in the performance of the right, and of personal demerit in the performance of the wrong.
5. Delight or pain, bliss or remorse, according as the choices are right or wrong. [Always in the moral sphere.]
6. A prophetic anticipation of reward in the performance of the right, and of punishment in the performance of the wrong.

With this definition and analysis of conscience, it seems to me that the passages throughout the New Testament in which the word occurs become much plainer so far as the idea in this one word is concerned. With this view of a good conscience in 1 Pet. 3:21, and the term "onsuer" (A. V.) to mean "a fixed or formal decision" on the part of the one to be immersed, that he, with a true, tender, good conscience, gladly pledges himself under God, by his grace, to work out his own salvation, to save himself from "this crooked generation"—these two ideas clarified, seem to make sense, and not nonsense out of an important passage that losers of the truth seek to understand. With this construction, it appears clear and reasonable that "even baptism doth now also save us." It seems thus to be in harmony with all such passages as Mk. 16:16, Acts 2:38, and every other one in which baptism is in any way connected with our salvation.

ABOUT COMPLEXIONS

Food Makes Them Good or Bad.

Saturate the human body with strong coffee and it will in time show in the complexion of the coffee drinker.

This is caused by the action of coffee on the liver, thus throwing part of the bile into the blood. Coffee complexions are sallow and muddy and will stay that way until coffee is given up entirely.

The sure way to recover rosy cheeks and red lips is to quit coffee and drink Postum Food Coffee, which makes red blood. "I had been for more than 20 years an inveterate coffee drinker, and it is absolutely true that I had so completely saturated myself with this drug that my complexion toward the last became perfectly yellow and every nerve and fibre in me was affected by the drugs in coffee.

"For days at a time I had been compelled to keep to my bed on account of nervous headache and stomach trouble, and medicines did not give me any relief. I had never consulted a physician in regard to my headaches and terrible complexion, and I only found out the cause of them after I commenced the use of Postum, which became known to me through Grape-Nuts. We all liked the food Grape-Nuts, and it helped us, so we thought Postum must certainly have merit, and we concluded to try it. We found it so delicious that we continued the use altogether, although I never expected it to help my health.

"After a few months my headaches were all gone and my complexion had cleared wonderfully, then I knew that my troubles had been caused by coffee and had been cured when I left off coffee and drank Postum in its place." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum will change the blood of any coffee drinker, and rosy cheeks and health take the place of a yellow skin and disease.

News From Many Fields

Maryland, Delaware and District of Columbia.

Your correspondent left his regular work at Rockville and Redland, Md., on July 25, having completed nearly three years at those points in connection with Boonsboro, where he still ministers, having an appointment once a month. Sunday, July 26, was spent with the Jerusalem church in Hartford county Md., where a woods meeting was in progress, and various preachers assisted. There were eight conversions. J. R. Gaff is minister.

Leaving there on Thursday, arrived at Bethany Beach, near Ocean View, Del., on Friday. Evangelistic services were held the first week, beginning July 26. The assembly is still in session. We had the privilege of witnessing one baptism here in old ocean.

The writer conducts the music. Miss Florence Robertson, of Scranton, Pa.; Miss Louthier, of Johnstown, and Mrs. Power, of Washington, have been soloists. W. J. Wright conducted the evangelistic services. On Sundays we have had sermons by Wright, Craig, of Pittsburg, Bagby, Yenell, Power, Jayne and Cramblett. We have had good, solid food from these shepherds. Yenell gave splendid stereopticon lectures on "Ben Hur," "Quo Vadis" and "In His Steps."

B. A. Abbott delighted us with two excellent readings on the book of Colossians and a bright, stirring account of the Denver Christian Endeavor convention.

G. P. Rutledge pleased the people with his lecture, "Going Through Life."

The assembly ends the 16th inst. We have to-night "Uncle Rastus," by E. B. Bagby. This is as entertaining as any lecture that has been given here.

People come and people go, but the old ocean goes on forever. The surf bathing is grand. The view is beautiful. The ocean grows on, on. Yesterday was our best day. We hope to see this, some day, the great religious resort for Disciples of Christ.

Chicago.

August may be considered the picnic season in the city. The church for a time must suffer, but no one acquainted with the monotony and hum-drum of an exacting city life will blame those who have an opportunity for a vacation for taking it and making the best of it possible. It is true that the vacation may have its dangers, it may be fraught with excess, but those who are forced into the city's strenuous life must have an opportunity now and then to take to the country and there have an opportunity to relax, to enjoy God's pure air and to drink at the fountain of nature's own self. For one accustomed to the country and its easy way of doing and enjoying things, to be forced into this tangled mass of humanity, a change in conditions is very noticeable. Young men have a haggard and worn look, young women have wrinkles in their faces all too soon, their complexion is sallow and life blood is not rushing freely to their cheeks. The answer is easily found—too many cares! And there are thousands of them who have but really one bright spot to break the dreaded monotony—the short vacation! If for any cause it is not properly used, let us not speak evil of the vacation. It is a necessity, but let a little well-seasoned advice go along with the young people and with the old people. If they will just remember to take their Bibles and the Lord with them, no great danger will befall them, we may be assured.

Chicago is now on the wave of wonderfully prosperous times. Never was there so many homes being built, and never could a young man get him a home on more favorable terms. If one has a little ambition to save enough to buy him a lot, this recommendation is usually satisfactory to men of means to loan him enough money to build him a comfortable home and on favorable terms, and if a little wisdom is used in selecting a location, the increase in value will pay his interest, and this accounts for the city's marvelous growth in home building. The population is now believed to exceed 2,000,000, and its growth continuing at a rapid rate.

Never was there such opportunity for evangelistic campaigning as now. In the midst of this complex population, great problems are to be wrought out, and while trying to settle some grievous questions of orthodoxy, the multitudes have gone out to make mirth and a holiday for the reason that no one has come to them with a message from heaven that is a call to duty. There was a time when the old pioneers entered the villages and cities of Kentucky, Missouri, and even this fair state of Illinois, and at the sound of their voices, sectarianism began to fear and tremble and to vanish before the terrible onslaught. Were those days better than these? Hardly! During that period Christian union was the theme, "One Lord, one faith, one baptism." It was simply irresistible, because all who preached it preached the same thing. There was no confusion of tongues. This is no time for heresy hunting nor posing as a heretic. The truth is too well established in the hearts of men, and in trouble they want consolation. They want to see the prisons opened and the captives set free, and that the sick are raised from their beds of affliction and, above all, that the poor have the gospel preached unto them. Shall we set to the problem?

ROBT. L. WILSON.

Northern California.

Our annual Santa Cruz convention has come and gone. Never was there a more peaceful and harmonious gathering. All seemed to be of one mind and one heart. This was not because there were only a few there, for not in ten years has there been such a crowd as this year. Various things worked to bring this about. First, there was unusual interest in our seminary, but this was entirely one sided. The opposition was absent. Then the evangelistic feature of the convention drew many who would not have come otherwise. Allen Wilson did some excellent preaching, and the closing service, with seven confessions, was one of the best. Again, the convention was better advertised than heretofore, and of course it pays to advertise.

Lastly, there was the revival of missionary enthusiasm engendered by great prosperity among the churches and a most excellent year's work done by the state board of missions: $2,403 raised for state missions as against $1,348 the year before; 551 added by the men under the board, 91 churches in northern California and 80 of them contributing to this work; a net gain in membership of 1,197, or over 12 per cent in twelve months and 7 per cent gain represented by 652 baptisms, $344,000 worth of church property with only $18,000 of indebtedness, having paid $13,000 of indebtedness in the last year, 2 new churches organized. Our net increase the past year is five times as great as the increase for the whole brotherhood. Now, will you cease giving California a hard name?

We still want more preachers. We have at present one $800 pulpit vacant; one at $700; one at $600; one at $300; two co-operating at $700; two co-operating at $500, and two more co-operating at $400. Some of these may be taken before you get here, but changes are continually occurring and other vacancies occurring. It will take two or three months to make arrangements, so if you have any idea of coming to California write at once. Please don't write just for fun; we are busy.

J. S. Pierce has accepted the work at Ruthersford.

H. H. Rama has accepted a call to Brentwood and is already at work.

W. W. Pew has accepted a call to Oroville and will begin Sept. 1.

Ernest Thoruquest has entered on his duties as teacher and preacher at Corralitos. J. J. Evans has accepted a call to Palo Alto. R. L. Johnston is supplying at San Jose, Central.

Brother Hood, from Minnesota, is supplying at Healdsburg while T. D. Butler is on a two months' trip east.

Hiram VanKirk and Mrs. R. M. Butler were elected delegates to the Detroit convention.

The Richmond Church was organized in July with 21 members; 2 added since. Will build in September.

The Sunset Mission in San Francisco has its house nearly enclosed. The basement is being used already; auditorium will seat 300.

The new state board is as follows: A. C. McKeever, president; W. F. Reagor, vice president; C. W. Japson, recording secretary; Thos. Barr, treasurer; Burrell G. White, attorney; A. L. Platt, D. A. Russell. The writer was continued as corresponding and financial secretary. The board also arranged to support two evangelists and assist in supporting twelve missionary pastors. Their faith is great. Shall we not demonstrate that they were wise?

Missouri.

This is the season for conventions. They follow one another so rapidly and so many of them that it is impossible to give each one a write up. In fact it is not possible for any one man, especially with the other work that devolves upon the corresponding secretary, to attend them all.

Jackson had its first county meeting for fifteen years at Hickman Mills. It was a splendid success because it was held in a good place and a good pusher was behind it. Bro. L. J. Marshall marshalled his forces well, and the result was a splendid convention which we trust will be the beginning for many more.

Cass County was held at Bethany Church, Nodaway County at Arkoe, Worth at Grant City, Clay at Barry, Lincoln County at New Hope, Monroe County at Mountjoy. These I was privileged to attend, and they were all splendid gatherings of our people.

These county conventions get right down close to the individual congregation and I believe are an unmixed blessing, and can be more so in the future than they have been in the past. But organization is of slow growth if it is sure, and gradually they are coming into better shape.

The State Convention is the one theme of attraction just now. Its date is Sept. 21-24. The place is Columbia, one of the best convention towns in the state. Every trunk line in the state, with the exception of the C. & A., and it doubtless will, have notified us of the rate of one fare for the round trip, plus 50 cents. This is a good rate. We ought to have the best convention we have had for years. The program will soon be published. It will be, we believe, a model program. It has men on it worthy of a National Convention. The church at Columbia sent out its invitations to all members of the church in the state to come and see their city, the great University, Christian Female College, the Bible College of Missouri, and many other attractions.

Will not every preacher in the state make a note of the State Convention and announce it at every meeting from now until that gathering convenes? If our preachers will do this, this convention will be the best-advertised convention we have ever had, and this is one of the essential features of a great convention. We must advertise or we perish.

One thing more, but it is the important thing. I have reserved it until the last that I might fix it more surely in your minds. Many, very many, altogether too many of our churches have not responded to the call of state missions with an offering. Only one month and the convention will be with us. Many of our churches have but one meeting between now and then. The treasury of the State Board is empty. We are face to face with the fact. Unless we have a strong, determined rally, we shall go to the convention with a report that will sadden me beyond expression. It lies within the power of the preachers of Missouri to say whether this report shall have that sad feature of a deficit or shall be all together one of splendid, glorious victory. I beseech my preaching brethren throughout the state, as they love this cause, as they love our great state, as they pride themselves in our prominent position before the religious world, I beseech you, my brethren, by all you hold sacred, that you bring this matter before your people, that you lay it upon their conscience and help us in this hour of need. Please let us hear from you speedily. The necessity is urgent, let the answers be prompt.

Western Pennsylvania.

The annual convention of the Western Pennsylvania Christian Missionary Society will be held Sept. 29-Oct 1, at Hazelwood Church, Pittsburg Pa., E. W. Thornton, minister.

Wallace Tharp begins his ministry with the First Church, Allegheny, Sept. 1, coming from Crawfordsville, Ind.

Chas. W. Watson, formerly minister at Bellaire, Ohio, and who has just returned from a course of study at Yale, will take the church at Connellsville, succeeding W. R. Warren, who has taken full charge of the Christian Worker, the official paper of the W. P. C. M. S., published weekly from Pittsburg.

E. A. Hibler resigned at Johnstown on account of failing health, but the church sent him away for three months' rest and refused to accept his resignation, and secured W. R. Warren to supply the pulpit in his absence.

Central Church, Pittsburg, is a happy people over the safe return of the Thurgoods from Australia, where they have been visiting and recuperating for nearly a year. There were crowded houses to greet them, and over 100 more in Sunday-school than the same day of any of the seven years previous.

Y. E. Bates returns to the church at Shady Ave., Allegheny, of which he was formerly pastor, after an absence from Pennsylvania of three years in Ohio. He begins about September 1.

Thomas Martin is already at work at Sandy Lake, Carpenters and Millidgeville Churches. The yearly meeting will be held at Sandy Lake, Aug. 21-23. Elder Moffatt in charge.

Indiana county convention will be held at Gipsy, Aug. 14-16.

J. H. Allen has lately taken up the work for the church at California.

C. E. Smith, of Monessen, has accepted a call to Pane Flats and Sample Run churches and is already on the field.

Fred A. Bright, evangelist for Pennsylvania, under the A. C. M. S. and W. P. C. M. S., holds his first meeting with the McKees Rocks Church, beginning Sept. 1.

R. G. White has started a new work in a hall at Cannonsburg, and already has the nucleus for a promising work.

The meeting at Athens, Texas conducted by the writer and Brother Wesley Parker as leader of song, resulted in 52 additions, 40 of which were clear gain. The brethren at Athens have recently built a new church house which has one of the largest and most comfortable auditoriums to be found in the churches of Texas.

Notwithstanding the intensely warm weather, protracted meetings are being conducted in all parts of our state and our evangelists are having a great harvest. Camp meetings have been organized in many parts of the state which are largely attended and greatly enjoyed. The Panhandle camp meeting has come and gone, while Sweetwater, Brady, True and Breckenridge camp meetings are now in progress, and the Mineral Wells camp meeting will commence August 28.

Brother Davis Errett has resigned the pastorate at Waco to accept the pastorate of the church at Salem, Oregon. His work at Waco has been quite successful, and the church there is loath to give him and his estimable wife up. We regret that he will leave us, and wish for him a happy and successful pastorate at Salem, Oregon, whither he goes about Sept. 1.

The following churches are now pastorless: Waco, Palestine, Ladonia, Terrell, Kaufman, Marshall, Athens, Orange, Gainesville, Bowie, Graham, Decatur and Alvin, and many small churches by the grouping of some three or four of which a minister could be sustained. Brother J. C. Mason, Dallas, Texas, is our corresponding secretary to whom all correspondence relative to those churches should be addressed.

The corn crop of this state is the best we have had for a number of years while the cotton crop is very promising, and if not damaged by the boll weevil there will be a very heavy crop. Wheat and oats, were very good, and taking the crops in the aggregate we will have prosperous times again within a few months.

The outlook for Texas Christian University was never so good, and we are hoping to have an opening with some four or five hundred students. The school opens Sept. 8.

W. H. Trainum will soon resign the pastorate at Manor to enter a medical school that he may prepare himself to become a foreign missionary. He is a young man of splendid education, and already ranks among our best preachers, and we predict for him a life of great usefulness in our Savior's cause.

Jas. S. Meyers and R. R. Hamlin respectively of the Tabernacle and First Church of Fort Worth, are planning to have their city evangelized and plant some two or more churches. This should be done, and doubtless will be done, and we hope that our pastors in the other cities of Texas will do likewise. A co-operation of the churches and individuals of our cities would plant churches in different parts of the cities.

Ohio.

E. J. Meacham is taking his vacation by holding a tent meeting at Blanchester, in Clinton county. The church there is without a home as yet, but looking forward to one. Chas. C. Smith is pastor there half time.

A. F. Stahl, of Muncie, Ind., has been visiting at his old home in Kenton while on his vacation. Brother Stahl has been loaned to the Hoosiers for a time, but is now ready to come back to Ohio. Some good church will do well to ask him to preach for them. We would all welcome him back.

P. J. Rice, another Ohio man in Indiana, is spending his vacation in and about Medina. Brother Rice has not yet confessed that he would like to come back to Ohio, but we know whereof he thinks.

D. D. Burk has accepted a call to the church at Niles, so says the Canton Christian. Both parties to the contract are to be congratulated.

State Evangelist Ragan has organized a new church at Byesville with 72 members. This was done August 9, after a tent meeting had been held. Byesville and Harmony now want a preacher and will soon have him.

D. P. Shafer has moved his household effects to Barborton and will look after the saints and sinners of that municipality. Brother Shafer is an excellent man and will do a good work.

John G. Slayter, of Akron, is with C. W. Huffer at Sebering in a tent meeting. We have not learned the results as yet, but expect things to move when Slayter and Huffer are together.

The Londonville church has had a house cleaning and new pews, new carpet, new paper, etc. W. L. Deming led in all this good work. This church will entertain the fourth district convention in October.

Samuel H. Bartlett will dedicate a new meeting house at Cambridge the last Sunday in August. There is no organization at that place as yet, but a vigorous Bible-school and several disciples. The house costs about $1,600.

The Second Church in Dayton laid the corner stone of a ten thousand dollar structure the first day of August. Geo. B. Stewart is the bishop of this diocese.

H. E. Stevens has resigned at Van Wert. His new field of labor is not certain at this writing, but will likely be settled soon.

Theo. Johnson, of Hubbard, has also put up the white flag. His future is not known.

I. J. Cahill spent ten days on a lecture tour through Maryland and New York states visiting several summer assemblies. Peter's wife's mother seems to have become quite a popular old lady.

It is none too soon to be planning for the trip to Detroit in October. This will be a rare opportunity for Ohio people as the convention will not likely come so near again soon.

The Eastern Ohio Ministerial Association will convene at Hiram, September 1-3. This is the 40th annual meeting. The program has already been published in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

J. P. Meyers, of Chicago University, has accepted a call to the church at Painesville which F. A. Bright is just leaving for the evangelistic field in western Pennsylvania.

E. C. Harris, of Washington, D. C., has been called to succeed W. L. Spayd at Shreve, O.

Never Neglect Constipation.

It means too much misery and piling up of disease from all parts of the body. Death often starts with constipation. The clogging of the bowels forces poisons through the intestines into the blood. All sorts of diseases commence that way. Most common complaints are dyspepsia, indigestion, catarrh of the stomach, liver complaint, kidney trouble, headaches, etc. The bowels must be relieved, but not with cathartics or purgatives. They weaken and aggravate the disease. Use Vernal Saw Palmetto Berry Wine instead. It is a tonic laxative of the highest order. It builds up and adds new strength and vigor. It assists the bowels to move themselves naturally and healthfully without medicine. One small dose a day will cure any case, and remove the cause of the trouble. It is not a patent nostrum. The list of ingredients goes with every package with explanation of their action. It is not simply a temporary relief, it is a permanent cure. Try it. A free sample bottle for the asking. DAVID SPARES SAUL.—
1 Sam. 26:5-12; 21:25.

Read chapters 21-26.
Memory verses, 26:21.

Golden Text: Love your enemies; do good to them which hate you.—Luke 6:27.
A Reform Movement.

After the incident narrated in chapter 20, in which Jonathan sounded Saul regarding his intentions toward David and gave David a warning through the preconcerted signal of the arrow flight, Saul and David were never again reconciled. David did not return to the court. He was a wanderer and a fugitive, probably for many years. His standard became the rallying point for a party of protest. It was not exactly a revolutionary movement which he headed, for more than once David spared Saul's life when he might have put him out of the way and inaugurated a new regime at once; and revolutionists should be made of sterner stuff than that. It was more likely the nucleus of a reform movement, something akin to the present Macedonian Committee, though less truculent, or to the Chinese Empire Reform Association, though more compact and military. The decadence of Saul's character and the waning of his kingly powers must inevitably have led to abuses of administration, perversions of justice and governmental corruption which made the best people desirous of reform. The narrative gives few details at this point, being interested almost exclusively in the personal contrast between Saul and David, but there are clear indications that we are not to think of David as a solitary wanderer during these years, nor of Saul's continued enmity toward David as altogether a matter of personal jealousy.

David's Wanderings.

During these years of flight there must have been many adventures of which no record has been handed down to us. Very likely, too, there were considerable intervals during which Saul was busied with other matters and David and his followers had peace. But the incidents recorded are enough to show the spirit of the two men, the passion of one and the calmness of the other, the futile raging of one and the quiet effectiveness of the other, the implacability of one and the forgiving spirit of the other, the waning influence of one and the growing popularity of the other.

It was at Nob that David, being in need of food, ate the showbread which only priests were allowed to eat and gave it also to the men who were with him. (21:1-6.) This act, showing that the needs of man are superior to the technicalities of religious ceremonial, was cited by Jesus in justification of what the Pharisees considered a desecration of the Sabbath. (Matt. 12:1-4.) Lacking a weapon, David took the sword of Goliath, which had been placed behind the altar. (21:7-9.) He must himself have been a very powerful man to make effective use of so mighty a weapon. Then, fleeing from Saul, David went down to Gath, where he feigned madness to insure his safety. (21:10-15.)

The Slaughter of the Priests.

Returning from Gath, David mustered his force of malcontents—reformers, we might better call them—at the cave of Adullam, a few miles southeast of his native Bethlehem. He gathered a force of four hundred men there and marched them over to Moab, where, by special permission of the king of Moab, David's father and mother also found a safe dwelling place. Here he staid for a considerable time and was finally moved to return by the advice of the prophet Gad. (22:1-5.) Meanwhile Saul was accusing his whole household of complicity in what he considered a conspiracy against him. David evidently had many friends at court in spite of the king's displeasure. When Doeg the Edomite told how the priest Ahimelech had given David bread and Goliath's sword, Saul was convinced that a dangerous conspiracy was afoot and that the priesthood was deeply involved in it. Samuel the prophet had long ago forsaken Saul, and now if the priests, too, should array themselves with his enemies—he would not stand it. He would show them that he was king. Even their priestly sanctity should not save them. But Saul's servants would not, even at the king's command, commit such sacrilege as to lay hands upon the priests, and it remained for Doeg the Edomite to do the deed. Eighty-five priests were murdered that day, and their city of Nob was destroyed and all its inhabitants killed. Thus Saul added to the list of his enemies all the surviving priests of Israel, and gave added strength to David's reform movement.

In Hot Pursuit.

After an adventure against the Philistines who were attacking the city of Keilah, David went into the wilderness of Ziph with his band, which had now grown to six hundred. There he was visited by Jonathan, and they renewed their covenant of friendship. When Saul learned of David's whereabouts, he came down to capture him and was pressing hard upon his track when he was called to repel an attack from the Philistines. As soon as the Philistines were disposed of, Saul was back after David, who was now in the wilderness of Engedi. Here David spared Saul when he had opportunity to kill him in a cave (24:1-22) and cut off a piece of his garment as a proof. This episode for the time convinced Saul that David meant him no harm, and he went back home. But David, perhaps not having entire confidence in Saul's sudden profession of friendship, staid in the wilderness.

David and Abigail.

About this time Samuel died and all the people mourned for him. But it is not recorded that Saul took any official notice of the event. The story of David's relations with Nabal (chap. 25) throws light upon an oriental custom which is not extinct to this day. David and his six hundred men had been in the neighborhood of Carmel while Nabal's shepherds were keeping their flocks there. Instead of robbing, as they had full opportunity to do, David's men had acted as a voluntary guard for the shepherds and their charge. In return for this service, David asked a gift of provisions, which was refused. Angered by this refusal, David prepared to destroy Nabal and all his household and was prevented from so doing only by the arrival of Abigail, Nabal's wife, who, more generous or more prudent than her husband, brought a present and begged David to spare them. She recognized David as the coming king and was duly respectful. The gift was accepted and David rejoiced that he had been saved from shedding blood in vengeance. Shortly after this, Nabal died and David took Abigail as one of his wives.

The Lord's Anointed.

Again Saul pursued David into the wilderness of Ziph. One night when Saul had camped nearer David than he realized, David, with one companion, crept into the enemy's camp and, resisting the temptation to kill Saul on the spot, stole his spear and the cup of water at his head. David's protest against killing Saul is significant. "The Lord forbid that I should put forth my hand against the Lord's anointed." This conception of a civil ruler as the Lord's anointed has been a support to government from that day to this. Sometimes it has been a support to very bad governments; but, as it is in an important sense true that civil rulers are God's special agents, though often very fallible agents, the conception has done much to strengthen and uphold the forms of government which make peace and prosperity possible.

Saul's Confession.

When Saul saw that David had again spared his life, he did what was probably the hardest thing in the world for a proud, stiff-necked man like Saul to do—confessed that he was wrong. "I have sinned. . . . Behold, I have played the fool and have erred exceedingly." One can think better of Saul for his having made this full admission of his sin and folly. It was not a long-lived repentance, and David apparently did not take it very seriously, for as soon as Saul had left after protestations of affection, David said to himself: "I shall now perish one day at the hand of Saul." David knew the vacillating character of the king better than he knew it himself. He did not accuse Saul of bad faith. Probably Saul was sincere when he spoke. But it is as necessary to be firm and steadfast as it is to be sincere, and these were qualities which Saul had utterly lost. He was the creature of each moment's caprice.

OUR DUTY TO THE STRANGER.

Deut. 7:7-8. 2 Chron. 6:32-33.

(Home Missionary Service.)

It was one of the first principles of Israel's law* that "the stranger that is within thy gates" shall be subject to the same rules and shall enjoy the same privileges as the native. Hospitality was the first of the virtues among the primitive oriental peoples. But hospitality had two sides: it meant first that the stranger should submit himself to the customs and regulations of the household or community which entertained him, and second that the host should guard the stranger's life and welfare even at the risk of his own. These are the two elements which must be considered in the problem of dealing with the foreigners who are within our borders. We owe a duty to them; they owe a duty to us.

First, those who by reason of utter ignorance or confirmed criminality are unable to become respectable and useful members of a Christian community and citizens in a self-governing country, ought not to be allowed to enter at all. Such a measure of exclusion may seem harsh, but it is a practical necessity. Only so can we do our duty toward those who have in them the possibilities of citizenship. Such exclusion does not mean that they are not our brethren and children of a common father, nor does it free us from all responsibility for their welfare. It merely means that under present conditions the harm which they would do to others if admitted to this country is greater than the good which we could do to them. So to protect the others they must be kept out.

But what of the thousands of sober and honest foreigners who are coming to our shores? It is officially estimated that there will be a million immigrants to this country during 1903. Most of them are accustomed to neither political nor religious liberty. They want political liberty and they will find it. They want freedom from economic slavery and some of them will find this; some will not.

But they have not yet learned even to want the freedom that is in Christ—freedom from bondage to the flesh and freedom from tradition, superstition and priestcraft. They need this but they are not seeking it. We must take it to them. We must present it in such a way that they will want it.

The work among the foreign populations in this country has all the moving and pathetic appeal of foreign missions and all the patriotic imperative of home missions. Their appeal is urgent for their need is great. But our need for their conversion is equally great. It is a matter of self-preservation. The intelligent Christian population of this country must absorb or be absorbed by the ignorant and unchristian mass of foreign immigrants. They must be lifted up to the level of Christian citizenship or they will drag citizenship down to their level.

And they can be lifted up. The case is far from hopeless. In their openness to the gospel lies the hope of bringing them up to the level of good citizenship and making them a bulwark instead of a menace to our free institutions. But the situation must be dealt with in a much more serious manner than it has hitherto. We cannot afford to fail at this point, for failure here will be suicidal. The Church of Christ has a truly patriotic service to perform in saving the country from the flood of vicious and un-Christian immigrants—not by keeping them out, but by Christianizing them.

HOW A CHURCH BUILDING HELPS. (CHURCH EXTENSION.)—Luke 7:1-10. 2 Sam. 7:1-3.

A church building is a church home; to be without it is to be homeless, in all that drear word implies. Mistakes innumerable have been made in erecting church buildings, but the greatest of all mistakes is to have none.

1. It furnishes a convenient meeting place. The church itself is necessarily a group of people, and they must have their times and places of assembling, to worship the Lord; to hear his word; to preach the gospel; to encourage and assist one another. Upon the building in which their meetings can be comfortably held depends in large measure their success as an organization.

With but slight additional cost, the church building can be made much more helpful. Smaller rooms for frequent meetings of committees, boards, classes, etc., can be provided for; and these will be found a great help in carrying vigorously forward the detailed work of the church. The mere fact that the rooms are there is a stimulus to the meetings.

2. It is a pledge of permanency. Our population is migratory. A family may be living in Portland to-day and in Pasadena next week. This unsettled condition of the population makes church life precarious and permanency questionable, unless there is a good building, by the very possession of which a congregation becomes rooted in a community. The soul-winning work of the church is materially helped by it. Men involuntarily associate the fact of church membership with the edifice in which the congregation meets. If we ask them to join us in a tent, their allegiance may disappear when the tent does.

There is something about the ownership of real estate which dignifies; it develops responsibility; it gives form and substance to what otherwise would be intangible and well-nigh imponderable. The church building says to the people round about, "This church is here to stay; men may come and go, preachers may come and go, but this church and the great cause it pleads are here not for a day or a year, but as long as the stars shine, and the world needs divine love and mercy." And this assurance of permanency helps wonderfully in the growth of the church.

3. It is a bond of union. Much as we emphasize Christian union, eloquently as we preach it, we sometimes fail pitifully to give it adequate illustration. Anything that helps to unify our own ranks, to draw the disciples together and mobilize their forces, is a desideratum. And precisely this is what the church building does. It belongs to all alike; the mere fact of joint and common ownership unites. Its care and maintenance engage and occupy them all. With a building, however modest, discouraged stragglers become an organized force.

4. It is a means of grace. The very toil and sacrifice demanded in the erection of the building stimulate the religious life of the members. However much they may be helped, the initiative is with them; the enterprise is a challenge to their faith; it compels a measure of generosity; it develops magnanimity; it incites to heroism. Church extension is a means of systematically encouraging weak and helpless and homeless churches to build, with large faith in God and themselves and their brethren.

And with the erection of the building, the work of the evangelist and the pastor is made permanent; the scattered sheep are safely folded; the walls of the house shut out dissension and riot—shut in fellowship and love. By the subtle law of association, the building becomes itself a powerful reinforcement of the superb ideals for which it stands.

Prayer.

For the church, O God, we give thee praise. Bless her walls and foundations. May her windows pierce to the empyrean, and flood our hearts with heavenly light. Bless with generosity those who build, and greatly multiply these bulwarks of salvation, for Christ's sake. Amen.

A Great Railroad.

It may be truthfully said that railroads, more than any other medium, make a great city. St. Louis is truly great in her railroads, having some twenty-one important lines terminating within her borders.

One of the most important of these roads to St. Louis is the WABASH LINE, from the fact that it draws the commerce of nearly all sections of the country to this metropolis, as a magnet draws kindred metals to itself.

The great arms of this growing system reach to Kansas City, Omaha, Des Moines, Albia and Ottumwa, Ia.; Chicago, Toledo, Detroit and Buffalo, and attract business from beyond these important gateways, even from the remote Pacific Coast, the extreme Northwest, the Great Lakes and the Atlantic borders.

It is commercially aggressive, and in its never ceasing activity is to-day reaching its great steel tentacles toward Pittsburg, Pa., and Baltimore, Md. In a little more than a year these two beehives of industry and all their tributary territory will be bound to St. Louis by the continuous rails of the WABASH.

Its through-car system is perfect, running solid, fully equipped trains for night and day service to Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, Des Moines, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Toledo, Niagara Falls and Buffalo, and through sleeping cars to New York, Boston, Montreal, Denver, Portland, Ore., Los Angeles and San Francisco.

Its train equipment is modern in every particular, there having recently been placed in service many new passenger cars consisting of Observation-Cafe and Library Cars, Reclining Chair Cars, Dining Cars, Day Coaches and Combination smoking and Baggage Cars, which are models of beauty and neatness, representing the highest state of development in car building.

This road will be called upon to transport hundreds of thousands of visitors to the World's Fair in 1904, and its facilities will be found ample for so gigantic an undertaking.

THE WABASH is essentially a St. Louis line, having its General Officers, from the President down, located here, and has an army of employes, necessary to carry on this vast system, who are citizens of St. Louis.

It spends its money largely in St. Louis and it has the interest of St. Louis always in mind.

Truly this is "A GREAT RAILROAD," and above all things, it is a St. Louis railroad.

3% Interest per annum compounded twice a year on savings accounts.

$8,150,000 capital and surplus stands as security.

MISSISSIPPI VALLEY TRUST CO.

FOURTH & PINE STS. ST. LOUIS

Our Budget

—W. A. Moore begins a meeting with the South Side Church of Joplin, Mo., Sept. 6.

—E. O. Hamilton begins a tent-meeting with the Ellendale Church, St. Louis, Sept. 1.

—Joseph Gaylor writes that they expect to dedicate the new church at Russellville, Mo., in October.

—The church at Charleston, Ill., was recently damaged by fire to the extent of about $1,200. W. F. Shaw is the pastor.

—C. E. Pomeroy will close his work at Malvern, Ia., after a pastorate of 19 months. He has accepted a call to Murray, Ia.

—Revival services are in progress at Weldon, Ia., conducted by the pastor, C. L. Organ, who is assisted by Bro. Lineback.

—The Howard County (Mo.) Meeting of Christian Churches meets at New Franklin, Aug. 17-19. A. N. Lindsay is secretary.

—Louis S. Cupp and wife have returned to Platte City, Mo., after a month's vacation with relatives in Ralls and Lewis counties.

—Jno. L. Brandt, of St. Louis, recently lectured at the following Chautauquas: Lafayette, Ind.; Springdale, Ark.; Lincoln, Ill.; Ottawa, Ill.; Sycamore, Ill.

—The church at Pawnee, Okla., would like to correspond with some young preacher with small family or none. Fair salary. Address Elders of Christian Church.

—M. L. Buckley, of Harrison, O., recently gave his lecture on "England's Temple of Fame" at Bethany College Assembly, W. Va., Bethel Grove Chautauqua, Ky., Flushing, O. and Harmony, O.

—John Munro has accepted a call to the work in Rudolph, Ohio, to begin Aug. 23. While enjoying a vacation of a few weeks at Belwood, Ont., he has supplied the pulpit at Erin Center and Erin.

—W. R. Jinnett's new work at Earlington, Ky., is starting off very prosperously. The Earlington Bee prints a highly complimentary account of his career and an appreciative notice of his work there.

—H. G. Hill, of Omaha, gave two lectures at the David City Chautauqua, recently. His humorous lecture on "One-Sided People" and "The Wandering Jew" are highly commended by the David City management.

—J. M. Lowe is spending a short vacation at Camp Point, Ill., the home of his childhood. It is his first vacation in 13 years. After doing without for so long, it is his judgment that every preacher ought to take a vacation for his work's sake, if not for his own.

—W. J. Wright, eastern evangelist under the Home Board, will attend the New Brunswick and Nova Scotia convention at Pictou, N. S., Aug. 20-23, and at the close of the convention will begin a series of special meetings assisted by Miss Florence Robertson, of Scranton, Pa., as singer.

—A. T. Campbell, for three years pastor of the Rowan Avenue Christian Church, Pittsburgh, Pa., and for the past two months acting supply for the First Church, Allegheny, Pa., has accepted a call to the Cecil Street Christian Church at Toronto, Canada, and will enter upon his work there Sept. 1.

—R. Thomson, of Saginaw, Mich., writes: "The congregation at yesterday morning's services, with the exception of one lone voice, extended a unanimous call to our most worthy pastor, Bro. E. Everett Cowperthwait to remain with us indefinitely. His efficient ministrations have been greatly blessed among us."

—The catalogue of School of Pastoral Helpers for 1903-4 is before us. We note that type-writing has been added to the studies of previous years as a necessary equipment for this line of service. This school is doing good work and it has our best wishes. Let those who desire a catalogue write to A. M. Harvuot, Pres., 617 Richmond Street, Cincinnati, Ohio.

—We have received a little pamphlet entitled "Missouri at the World's Fair." It is issued by the publication department of the Missouri Commission and gives suggestions for collecting and preparing exhibits in agriculture, horticulture, mines and metallurgy. Farmers will find it interesting. It can be had free by addressing the Missouri World's Fair Commission, St. Louis.

—The Mississippi State meeting has been changed from Aug. 26-31 to Sept. 2-7. Meridian is the place. All railroads in the state have given reduced rate. Delegates and visitors will pay full fare going and will be entitled to rate of one-third plus 25 cent returning. Be sure to obtain certificate from each agent from whom you purchase tickets. W. A. Meloan, Cor. Sec., urges a large attendance.

—Some one, name unknown, sends the following paragraph of news: "I was called to La Harpe, Ill., Aug. 13 to assist in paying off a church debt of $775. We succeeded in getting a little more than $1,050. Most delightful jubilee services were held. Brothers Hill, of Carthage, Hughes, of Monmouth, Goos, of Old Bedford, and Ventner, of Hamilton, participated in the services. Bro. W. H. Willyard is the pastor. He is very efficient, and greatly beloved by all the community."

—The World's Fair boom in St. Louis is not an unmixed blessing. For example, the Mothers' and Babies' Home, which has been paying $60 a month rent, has had its rent advanced to $90 a month. This increase will put quite a strain upon the finances of this most worthy institution. The treasurer is Mrs. O. C. Shedd and her address is 4011 Pine Street, St. Louis. Anyone who feels disposed to help the babies pay their increased rent may rest assured that the money will be put to a good use.

—H. C. Patterson has left the hospital in Colorado and come to Tipton, Mo., where he has been confined to bed at his brothers. He is slowly convalescing, and the doctors think it will be weeks, possibly months, before he will be able to resume work. The doctors say his sickness was brought on by over-work. He has been called for his 4th meeting at Tipton and will conduct same as soon as able. The church at Leroy, Ill., as soon as they heard of his sickness, sent him a draft for $30 and accompanied same with "Bro. Patterson shall want for nothing. Another draft will follow next week." Many letters of sympathy have come to Bro. Patterson.

—We call special attention to Ashley J. Elliott's article headed, "A New Plan of Church Work," published elsewhere in this paper. Brother Elliott outlined this plan for the church at Peoria, Ill., of which he is a member, and presented it first to the official board and later to the congregation. It states clearly some present difficulties which will be appreciated by those who understand city work, and suggests one remedy. Whether the remedy would cure or not is another question. One thing is sure, however. The church in the cities does lose much of power and inspiration by failing to meet together often in large numbers for worship.

—Bro. Wren J. Grinstead, of Adelaide, South Australia, is giving a course of Bible Study, which is arousing considerable interest even outside of our own people. The plan may be seen from the following announcement, which was circulated in all the Protestant Sunday-schools in Adelaide and its suburbs: A course of Friday evening lectures on "How to Study the Bible," by Mr. Wren J. Grinstead, Evangelist of the Grote Street Church of Christ, beginning Friday, July 10, 1903, at 7 p. m., Grote Street Church of Christ Lecture Hall. The Bible will be taken as the inspired revelation of God, and the sole authority in religion. The studies will be projected upon a non-denominational plane. In grade, the work will be adapted to those who are capable of doing creditable work in a Sunday-school Bible-class. The hour (from 7 to 8 p. m.) will be divided as follows: 7 to 7:20, Consideration of difficulties in the current Sunday-school lesson. 7:20 to 7:40, Lecture. 7:40 to 8, Questions on the lecture of the preceding week. Enrolled members of the class will be provided with a summary of the lecture. To defray the expenses of preparation of these an enrollment fee of 6d. per quarter will be charged. Teachers and Bible-class students are invited to join the class. Visitors will be welcome at any time. Subjects for the first quarter: A Treasure in Earthen Vessels, Human Elements in the Bible, In Divers Portions, In Divers Manners, The Progressiveness of Revelation, How to Understand Bible History, How to Understand Parables, How to Understand Speeches in the Bible, How to Understand Bible Doctrine, How to Understand Hebrew Poetry, How to Understand Hebrew Prophecy.

—The religious paper to which we referred two weeks ago as criticising the President's message of respect for the late pope while approving the President's letter of encouragement to a missionary secretary of the said pope's own fold, points out a distinction between the two cases: The note regarding the pope was sent through the secretary of state, while the letter to the missionary secretary was sent direct. This does fairly well as an afterthought. That it was an afterthought is evidenced by the fact that the criticism was leveled against a direct message from the President regarding the late pope as much as against the one sent through the state department.

But even if the distinction is good (and we think the officialism of the President's message is greatly overestimated) there is another fact to be taken into consideration. Mr. Roosevelt did not, either personally or officially, express sympathy with the Catholic propaganda nor did he wish success to Catholic missions; he only spoke approvingly of the character of Leo. In contrast to this, the letter to the missionary secretary was not a matter of personal compliment, but a clear expression of approval for the missionary work in which he was engaged—"I wish you all success in your effort for Home Missions." Suppose the President had written, personally or officially, to the head of the College of the Propaganda: "I wish you all success in your effort for Catholic missions in America." Would there have been a roar of protest? We think yes. We would have been in it. But an expression of respect for the personal character of an old man who has just died and who had millions of admirers throughout the Christian world, can't do a great deal of harm even if it comes through the secretary of state. If the Sheikh ul Islam or the Grand Lama is as admirable a character personally and as well-known in this country we would not object to a message of regret for the death of either one of them, but we would much rather the President did not wish them success in their missionary work in this country.

C. P. Williamson.

Many have written concerning the life and work of Bro. C. P. Williamson much better than I can. Nevertheless there are some things which I have not seen mentioned that I want to say.

When Bro. Williamson went to Georgia, in October, '91, he had a difficult task before him. The Atlanta church, of which he was the newly-elected pastor, had been much torn by internal dissension, and its growth and influence greatly retarded.

The congregation, under Bro. Williamson's labors, grew in a short while to be too large for the building. Accessions were had at almost every service, harmony came out of discord, the membership was more than doubled, and the First Church of Atlanta was soon known as an aggressive, growing congregation throughout the whole brotherhood.

During the first year of his work, Georgia had no state paper, and hence no medium of communication between the churches. With his large faith in God and his untiring zeal, Bro. Williamson began the publication of the Southern Christian. How much of his time, energy, money and life he put into this enterprise, no one but God will ever know. The paper continued until the time of Bro. Williamson's severe illness in Atlanta about six years ago. Since that time the paper has been continued, but under a different name. So to him must be given the credit for our Georgia paper with all its influence for good.
